advanced by Exchequer, and ultimately to the extinction of the debt by means of a sinking fund. In 1846 an agreement was made between the Caledonian Railway Company and the Road Trustees and certain trustees for the private creditors by which the railway company agreed to buy the debts of the Road Trust to the private creditors for the sum of £15,000, payable at Martinmas 1846, when the right of the purchasers was to take effect. The agreement contained a stipulation that if the Government should be induced to abandon their claim to the surplus revenue funds accumulated in the hands of the treasurer of the Road Trust, the amount so abandoned should be divided equally between the Road Trust and the private creditors. But the railway company did not pay at the stipulated time, and the debts were not, in fact, taken over until Whitsunday 1852. This was the result of a variety of transactions, which it is unnecessary to consider in detail, because the parties are agreed as to the material fact. The pursuers state in the 10th article of the condescendence that the debts were taken over by the Caledonian Railway at Whitsunday 1852, and this statement is adopted and held as their own by the railway company. But at that date there were certain unsatisfied claims for past due interests, and also claims for dividends, which were not carried by the agreement to the railway company; and the funds specified 1st and 2d in the conclusions of the summons are, with accumulations, sums set apart to meet these unsatisfied claims. The fund first described of £232, 16s. 3d. represents the amount, with interest, unclaimed by sixty-three of the private creditors of their shares of the surplus revenue of the trust for the three years ending 30th June 1848. Half the surplus revenue was payable under the agreement to the railway company, and the other half to the private creditors, and the parties are agreed that the portion payable to each amounted to £1557, 15s. 3½d., that a scheme of division shewing the several debts and the respective shares of the various creditors was prepared by the Road Trust or its officials; that £1426 was claimed and paid according to this scheme; and that the balance was set apart or deposited in bank to meet the claims which had not been brought forward.

The second fund consists of unclaimed arrears of dividends which had been carried to the credit of the accounts of individual creditors between the 2d of April 1842 and Whitsunday 1852, with the addition of a sum of £77, 17s. 6½d. which had been carried to the credit of the general dividend account during the same period, and which had not been allotted. These sums amounted together to £1651, 13s. 9d., and with interest to 4th December 1883 they amount to £4165, 10s. 3½d.

These two funds are thus much in the same position. We are not told when or in what terms they were first deposited, and this is probably immaterial. It is clear that they were special sums set apart to meet specific claims. There can be no question as to the purpose to which they were appropriated, or that they would have been paid long ago to the creditors entitled to receive them, if they had come forward to make their claims.

When Mr James Grahame was appointed treasurer of the Road Trust in 1864, he found them to be funds set apart for the special purposes already mentioned. When the trust came to an end by the operation of the Roads and Bridges Act they were deposited with the interest which had accrued on deposit-receipts, the first being taken in favour of "the creditors of the Glasgow and Carlisle Roads, per James Grahame, Esq., treasurer," and the second in favour of "the Glasgow and Carlisle Roads dividend account, per James Grahame, Esq., treasurer."

The fund third described in the summons arose in a somewhat different way. In 1887 the attention of the Treasury was directed to this sum, which had accumulated then to £1148, 17s. It was part of a sum set aside to meet old claims and debts in Dumfriesshire. The Government had a claim upon it, but after some correspondence with the Caledonian Railway Company their claim was withdrawn, and the sum left in the hands of the Road Trustees. The sum third described is one-half of the sum so abandoned, the other half having been already paid to the Caledonian Railway Company in terms of the agreement that one-half of the sums to which Government might abandon their claim should be divided equally between the railway company and the private creditors.

It appears to me that if the competition had arisen before the Roads and Bridges Act came into operation, there would have been no reasonable dispute as to the rights of the competing parties. Each of the private creditors must have received his own share of each of these funds and nothing more, and the unclaimed balance, if any, must have remained in the hands of the Road Trustees subject to the emerging claims of the unpaid creditors. The creditors who first came forward could have no right to the shares of the others who had not yet appeared to claim, either because they did not know of the rights arising to them out of long past transactions, or because they did not know that funds were available for distribution. On the other hand, the trustees could not appropriate the funds to other purposes so as to relieve themselves of their liability to meet such claims as might afterwards be well established, because the deposit shews that they had money in hand to meet the claims in question, and also that no preferable claims existed. The claims of the compearing creditors to their several shares must therefore have been sustained, and the remainder of the fund must have been left in the hands of the Road Trustees subject to the legal claims affecting it. The railway company, so far as I can see, could have had no right to participate in any one of the three funds. They could have no more claim to dividends accruing before they took over the debt than the purchaser of land would have to arrears of rent accruing before the date of his entry, and they could have no claim to more than one-half of the surplus revenue or the special fund set free by the abandonment of the claim of the Treasury, because their agreement was that the amount so abandoned should be divided equally between them and the private creditors.

The question, therefore, is whether the rights of parties have been in any way altered by the Roads and Bridges Act of 1878, and it appears to me that the statute and the procedure which followed upon it make no difference whatever, except that the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow, and certain town-councils and county councils have come in place of the Road Trustees. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the rights of parties have been fixed by the determination of the Secretary for State and the Secretary for Scotland in so far as they fell within their jurisdiction, but I do not quite agree with him as to the effect of that determination. It appears to me to leave the rights of parties exactly as they were before the Act came into operation. The determination was made under the 90th section of the Act on a report of Commissioners appointed to value and allocate the debts of the Trust, because the roads were partly in England and partly in Scotland. The only debt valued, or which was subject to valuation under these proceedings, was that of the Caledonian Railway Company, who had purchased and taken over the rights of the private creditors. They accordingly appeared before the Commissioners as sole creditors, and in the course of the inquiry a question arose between the railway company and the Road Trustees in regard to the funds now in dispute, and we may look at the report of the Commissioners for the purpose of seeing what was the question raised for decision so that we may be enabled to construe the determination itself. It was argued for the Caledonian Railway Company that "in so far as the creditors did not come forward to claim these several funds they passed to the trust, and being trust assets are available for payment of the debts, which now belong to the Caledonian Railway Company." On the other hand the Road Trustees maintained that "as the funds consist of unclaimed shares of capital and dividend existing prior to the settlement with the railway company their title to these sums was expressly excluded, and that any rights they acquired were only rights subsequently emerging; that the money must be held in trust for the creditors who may claim it; that it has ceased to be part of corporation finance, and is only in the trustees' custody to be held for behoof of the parties to whom it may ultimately be found to belong." That was the position maintained by the Road Trustees, and it appears to have expressed the contention put forward by them for the benefit of the private creditors. The Commissioners' report on this point was in these terms:—"The Commissioners find that the three funds referred to do not fall to be paid to the road authorities as forming assets of the trust, and therefore do not fall to be taken into computation in valuing the debt." The Secretary of State and the Secretary for Scotland did not adopt this report in terms, and the variation which they made upon it appears to me to be significant. Their determination was that the funds in question "do not form assets of the trust to be taken into computation in valuing the debt." There may not be any substantial difference between the two findings, but the determination of the Secretary of State and the Secretary for Scotland expresses with greater precision and accuracy the point really decided, and makes it clear that the determination is limited to the question which was within the jurisdiction of the statutory tribunal. They decided that the funds did not form assets of the trust to be taken into computation in valuing the debt. They gave no decision on the question—it was not within the scope of their inquiry to decide—whether the road trustees had a title to continue to hold the funds or to what purposes they might be applicable in their hands. But the determination proceeded on the plea put forward by the Road Trustees that the three funds were not available to meet the claims of the Caledonian Railway Company, because they were not part of the funds of the corporation available for the general purposes of the trust, but had been set apart to meet particular debts; and indeed it is obvious that they could only be excluded from the computation on the ground that they were appropriated to a particular purpose excluding general creditors, and there can be no question at all as to what that particular purpose was. The effect, therefore, of the determination of the statutory tribunal was, it appears to me, to leave the rights of parties exactly where they were before the Roads Act came into operation. They have decided absolutely that these funds do not belong to the Caledonian Railway Company, for that is the meaning and effect of their determination, that "they do not form assets of the trust to be taken into consideration in valuing the debt." The Caledonian Railway Company are therefore excluded, and it appears to me that the rights of the private creditors are confirmed, not by the direct operation of the determination but because the determination of the statutory tribunal proceeds upon the acceptance of the contention put forward by the Road Trustees for behoof of the private creditors, and acted upon in such a way as to make it impossible for the Road Trustees to withdraw it if they desired to do so.

I think the right of the compearing creditors to share in each of the three funds must be maintained, and the claim for the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow and the other authorities repelled. They maintain that the private creditors have no substantial claim, because their rights were not valued in terms of the statute, and are therefore excluded by the statute. But the conclusive answer to that contention is that the claims in question are not claims upon the general funds requiring or capable of valuation, but specific claims to particular funds appropriated to a special purpose. These funds, therefore, could not pass to the new authorities created by statute except subject to the claims arising from the special appropriation previously made. If there were any question as to the effect of that appropriation I think it is removed by the procedure which took place under the Roads and Bridges Act, in which the trustees came forward to plead that the effect of the manner in which these funds had been treated was to give to the creditors for whose benefit they had been set aside exclusive right to the funds, so as to render them unavailable for the general creditors of the Trust. The only question which seems to me to remain is, what is to be done with the balance after payment of the compearing creditors' shares? I agree that neither the compearing creditors nor the railway company have any claim upon it. The compearing creditors have no claim, because their right is only to a proportionate share of the funds which are to be divided equally between them and those creditors who have not appeared to claim. They have no accruing right owing to the nonappearance of other creditors. The dividends were set apart for the private creditors, separately and individually, and I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the sums not specially allocated to the different creditors stand in the same position. The railway company has no claim, both for the reason already given, and because they could have no claim except through their right as purchasers of the debts due by the Trust, and the extent of that right has been finally determined by the statutory tribunal, and on the footing that they have no right to these funds.

The only question then is, whether the balance should remain in Court or be paid to the Local Authorities. It appears to me that the balance came into the hands of the real raisers as treasurer and clerk of the Road Trust, and in no other capacity. There is no evidence that they held the funds except as officials of the Trust. The funds were held no doubt by the officials for payment of the particular claims to which they were appropriated, but nevertheless they were held by them as representing the Road Trust. If the Roads and Bridges Act had not been passed, the proper holders would have been the Road Trustees. If the creditors had come forward, they would have received the shares of the money to which they were entitled. If they did not come forward, there was no one else entitled to a dividend. I think the sums stand in the same position now as they did before the Act passed. I see no advantage in keeping the funds in Court, because if that were done none of the creditors could obtain payment except by lodging a claim in this multiplepoinding. The Lord Ordinary has directed that the funds should remain in Court, because if they were handed over to the Road Authorities, creditors coming forward hereafter might be met with the objection that their debts had not been valued under the statute. But if that were a good objection, the claims already made for the compearing creditors should have been repelled. For the reasons which I have given, I consider that the view of the Lord Ordinary on this point is not sound, and that the private creditors who have not come forward to claim have not lost their right to claim. I think, therefore, that we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, so far as he repels the claim of the Road Authorities, and ordains the balance to be consigned in bank to await the orders of the Court. Otherwise, I propose that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and, in place of the finding which I have suggested should be recalled, find that the Road Authorities are entitled to payment of the balance of the fund, subject always to their liability to meet the claims of creditors who may establish that they had a good claim against the Road Trustees.

LORD M'LAREN and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor, in so far as it repels the claim No. 27 of process for the Town-councils of Glasgow and Hamilton and others, being the Road Authorities of their respective districts, and in so far as it ordains the balance of the fund in medio to be consigned in bank to await the orders of the Court: Find that the said Road Authorities are entitled to the balance of the fund in medio, subject always to their liability to meet the claims of such creditors as may hereafter establish their rights, and to that extent rank and prefer them in terms of the second alternative branch of their claim: Quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor, except in so far as regards the finding for expenses, and decern," &c.

Patent—Validity—Prior Use.—A paint manufacturer took out a patent for a gold paint made by mixing dissolved liquid pyroxylin with metallic substances in a powdered state. In an action for infringement against a person who was proved to have sold a gold paint of the same chemical composition, the defender pleaded that the patent was invalid by reason of prior use, and proved that prior to the date of the patent he had publicly used and sold his gold paint, which he had made by mixing a compound known as "Hartley's kristaline," of the composition of which he was ignorant, with metallic substances in a powdered state. It was proved that "Hartley's kristaline" was dissolved liquid pyroxylin. Held that the patent was invalid by reason of prior use.

Observed that when the validity of a patent is challenged on the ground of prior use, it is sufficient to shew that the invention has been publicly used without proving sale.

Jurisdiction—Sheriff—Interdict—Patent.—A paint manufacturer in Aberdeen brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against a paint merchant there, to have him interdicted from making, using, and selling a paint which the pursuer alleged was an infringement of a patent which he had taken out. After the action was raised a paint manufacturer in Birmingham craved to be sisted as a defender, on the ground that he was the manufacturer of the paint sold by the defender, and thus had the real interest in defending the action. The Birmingham manufacturer was sisted accordingly. Thereafter the original defender withdrew from the action, interdict being pronounced against him, of consent and with the concurrence of the Birmingham manufacturer, and a record was made up between the pursuers and the Birmingham manufacturer, in which the latter raised the question of the validity of the pursuers' patent. After a proof, the Sheriff affirmed the validity of the patent, and granted interdict against the Birmingham manufacturer.

In an appeal, held (diss. Lord Young) that the Sheriff had jurisdiction to pronounce this interlocutor.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff.

IN July 1893 Alexander Gill and William Smith Gill, of the firm of Farquhar & Gill, paint manufacturers, North of Scotland Colour Works, Aberdeen, brought an action against William Coutts & Sons, painters, 216B Union Street, Aberdeen, praying the Court "to interdict the defenders by themselves or by others from infringing the letters-patent number 22610[91], dated and sealed the 28th December 1891, granted to the pursuers for 'improvements in and relating to paints and lacquers,' and in particular to interdict the defenders by themselves or others from making, offering for sale, selling or using without the consent, licence, or agreement of the pursuers a paint in which collodion or dissolved liquid pyroxylin is used as the essential element, this being combined or mixed with bronze or other metallic or alloyed substances in a powdered state, to form a paint or a lacquer for gilding purposes manufactured in the manner described in the said letters-patent and the specification relative thereto,†

† The subject of the patent was thus described in the specification:—"A paint in which collodion or dissolved liquid pyroxylin is used as the essential element, this being combined or mixed with bronze or other metallic or alloyed substance, in a powdered state, to form a paint or a lacquer for gilding purposes."

or in manner substantially the same, and from further or otherwise infringing the said letters-patent, and to grant interim interdict," &c.

Immediately after the action was raised William Cutler, manufacturer, Cannon Works, Constitution Hill, Birmingham, lodged a minute, in which he craved to be sisted as a defender, alleging that he was the person really interested in the action, as being the manufacturer of the permanent gold enamel paint which the pursuers sought to have Coutts & Sons interdicted from selling.

Cutler was sisted accordingly.

Thereafter Coutts & Sons lodged a minute, in which they stated that as they had no interest in the letters-patent in question, they, with the concurrence of Cutler, consented to decree of interdict being pronounced against them without damages or expenses. Decree, accordingly, was, on 10th November, pronounced against Coutts & Sons, and the action proceeded thereafter against Cutler as the defender.

A record having been made up, the pursuers averred that they were the inventors of the paints and lacquers known as "Bonaccord Liquid Gold" or "Gold Paint," and that these were duly patented by the pursuers under the letters-patent specified in the prayer of the petition;—(Cond. 5) " . . . A preparation called 'Patent Permanent Gold Enamel Paint,' or 'Permanent Gold Enamel Paint,' and purporting to be manufactured by the defender William Cutler, who describes himself as 'Patentee and Sole Manufacturer, 89 Snow Hill and Cannon Works, Constitution Hill, Birmingham,' has in contravention of the Patents Act of 1883 been made up in style similar to those used by pursuers, and extensively sold throughout Great Britain by defender Cutler, and in Aberdeen by defenders Cutler and Coutts & Sons. . . ." (Cond. 7) "The defender William Cutler has been manufacturing in Birmingham or elsewhere, and selling and using the said preparation throughout England and Scotland in infringement of the pursuers' said patent; in particular, he refuses to desist from the manufacturing, selling, or using of the said 'Patent Permanent Gold Enamel Paint,' or 'Permanent Gold Enamel Paint' . . ."

The defender Cutler did not deny that his gold paint was practically identical with that of the pursuers', and that an infringement of patent had been committed if the pursuers' letters-patent were valid, but he pleaded that pursuers' letters-patent were invalid, in respect that the alleged invention was publicly used, or at least was publicly known, prior to the date of the said letters-patent.

A proof was allowed. The evidence of prior public use founded on by the defender consisted in the evidence that he had publicly used and sold his own paint prior to the date of the pursuers' letters-patent, and in the evidence relating to a similar paint made by James Denham, of Ballantine & Company, painters, Edinburgh. It appeared that about the year 1887 the defender became aware of a preparation called "kristaline," sold by a Mr Hartley of Birmingham, as agent for an American company. Kristaline was in fact pyroxylin, or gun-cotton, dissolved in amyl acetate, and, when mixed with bronze or other metal powder, produced a substance identical with the pursuers' paint. The defender at first used the kristaline, which he bought in open market, as a lacquer, but in March or April 1888 it occurred to him to mix it with bronze powder in order to see how it would act as paint, and finding it successful, he continued to make such paint for use on articles made and sold by him in the ordinary course of his business. There was also evidence that, prior to the date of the pursuers' patent, he sold small quantities of the paint to the public—see note of Sheriff-substitute, infra. It further appeared that, until after the date of the pursuers' patent, the defender was ignorant of the chemical constituents of kristaline.

The evidence with regard to Denham's paint was in all material respects the same as that relating to the defender's. Denham also was ignorant of the chemical constituents of kristaline.

On 16th January 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) pronounced this interlocutor (after findings in fact:)—"Finds with reference to annexed note that the defender has failed to prove as contended by him (1) that there has been prior use or prior knowledge in the sense of the patent laws of the invention set forth in pursuers' said patent either by defender himself or by anyone else." [The Sheriff-substitute then dealt with other grounds of defence.] "Finds that the pursuers are the first and true inventors of the invention as described in said patent, and that defender has infringed said patent; therefore repels the defences, declares the interim interdict already granted perpetual, and decerns: Finds further that the defender is liable in damages to the pursuers; assesses same at the sum of £5 sterling, for which decerns against the defender William Cutler: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses against the said William Cutler," &c.*

* "NOTE.— . . . There is no prior publication alleged, but the defender avers, and says he has proved, (1) that he himself made and used and gave to the public his paint, which was an anticipation of pursuers' prior to the date of pursuers' patent; and (2) that the witness Denham, of Ballantine & Company, of Edinburgh, had also used this paint in the sense of the patent law prior to pursuers' patent. (1) As regards defender himself, the facts as proved seem to me to be as follows:—About the year 1887 defender came to know of a preparation called 'kristaline,' sold by a Mr Hartley, in Birmingham, as agent for an American company. Kristaline was sold as a lacquer or varnish, and for about a year after he knew it first defender used it as a lacquer over metal. He was in the way then of using in his business a gold paint made of terebene and bronze powder, and about 1888 he began to coat this with the kristaline. About March or April 1888 accident, more or less, led him to try mixing the kristaline with bronze powder to see how it would act as a paint, when it was found to act very well indeed. From that time up to March 1892 defender states that he continued to make small quantities of gold paint with kristaline. He has only brought evidence of one actual sale of the paint during that period, namely, 5s. worth to the witness Bendall, and that was rather to try as an experiment than in the ordinary course of business; but I think in addition it is clear he gave a certain number of bottles to the French Wreath Company without charge, in order that they might touch up and renew metal-bound glass cases, &c., got from him. Defender's son also (the witness Walter Cutler) speaks to getting 5s. from a Mr Hope for regilding some frames, but that was rather as a gratuity than actual payment. Defender was in the way of using this kristaline as a lacquer as well as a paint, and I find that for both purposes the quantity he got from May 1888 to September 1890 was sixteen quarts, and he continued at about the same rate down to March or April 1892. Keeping in view the amount and nature of prior use so spoken to, and the further fact that when the paint was applied no one could tell what it was composed of, I think, upon the authorities, a nice question might have arisen, whether what defender had done had gone beyond the region of experiment, and was sufficient prior use to exclude a subsequent patent, whether this was 'use in public, so as to come to the knowledge of others than the inventor.' But this case presents another feature, which to my mind seriously alters the complexion of Gill v. Cutler.

The defender Cutler appealed.

At the hearing a doubt was suggested from the Bench as to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court to entertain the action against the defender Cutler, and argument was, at the desire of the Court, heard on that point.[1]

The arguments on the merits sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Trayner, and from the note of the Sheriff-substitute.[2]

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The question in this case upon which the parties are at issue is the validity or invalidity of letters-patent granted to the pursuers on 28th December 1891. The subject of the patent was a certain gold paint and lacquer, of which the pursuers claim to be the first and true inventors, and this action was brought to have the defender interdicted from making, selling, or using (without the pursuers' licence) a gold paint which the pursuers allege to be an infringement of their patent right.

the alleged prior use. Defender was using kristaline to combine with bronze, &c., powder, but, in point of fact, up to and even after the date of pursuers' patent, in fact, up to the end of March 1892, defender did not know what kristaline was. He no doubt knew it was a lacquer, and that it was called a celluloid lacquer by the sellers, for that appears on some of the invoices, but as to how it was composed he was absolutely ignorant. I think we may take it now as proved (though as to this the proof is not very satisfactory) that kristaline is pyroxylin dissolved in amyl acetate, and that a paint made with it is identical with pursuers' (but even as to this we are pretty much dependent on the analysis of one sample). But at the time when pursuers took out their patent, all that defender knew was that a lacquer with a fancy name, the composition of which he was quite unacquainted with, but which was sold by an American company in Birmingham, made a good gold paint when combined with bronze powder. If the company that sold the kristaline had failed, defender's paint was put a stop to, or if for some reason they had slightly altered the nature of kristaline, it might quite well be that it would have been useless for a paint, and defender would have been helpless. It seems to me that a good test of the matter is this: Had the defender at the date of pursuers' patent discovered enough to take out a patent himself, and had he made this discovery known to the public? I think there can be no doubt this question must be answered in the negative. Defender could not have patented the combination of kristaline and bronze powder without knowing what kristaline was, and if so, his prior use of the article was not of the intelligent and understanding nature which in my opinion would be necessary to come in the way of the pursuers, who had unquestionably honestly invented the paint for themselves. The defender himself was quite conscious of this, for we find both him and his son stating that they were most anxious to find out the composition of kristaline, even

Gill v. Cutler.

Before dealing with the question of the validity of the patent, I must advert to a matter not raised by the parties, but upon which some discussion took place before us. The pursuers carry on their business in Aberdeen, and having found that Messrs Coutts & Sons, painters there, were using or selling a gold paint got by them from the defender Mr Cutler, who is a manufacturer in Birmingham, they brought this action originally against Messrs Coutts. As an interdict against them in the terms prayed for would, if granted, interfere very materially with what Mr Cutler regarded as his interests, by practically excluding his gold paint (said to be an infringement of the pursuers' patent right) from the Scotch market, he appeared and craved leave to sist himself as a party to the cause. This leave was granted, and Mr Cutler was duly sisted as a party. Thereafter Messrs Coutts, having no interest to discuss the question of the validity of the pursuers' claims, consented to interdict being pronounced against them, and retired from the case. The case thus came to be an action of interdict at the instance of an Aberdeen firm against a defender resident in Birmingham, and in this state of the facts it was questioned whether this Court could grant any interdict against a defender not subject to its ordinary jurisdiction, whether there was a relevant case for granting such an interdict, and whether such an interdict could be to any extent effectual. Parties were ultimately heard before us on the merits of the cause, without any decision being pronounced on the questions I have just indicated, but it is necessary now to deal with these questions, and I will do so before entering upon what I have said is the question on which the parties are at issue.

going the length of asking Mr Hartley, the agent for the sale, what it was; and the moment that the son by accident did so, about March 1892, the defender at once applied for a patent. . . .

"On this point, therefore, of prior use by the defender, my opinion is that the prior use even if sufficient in extent to void the patent, which is at least doubtful, was not of a character to anticipate pursuers' patent, in respect the person using had no knowledge or understanding of the composition of kristaline, and therefore did not know the actual materials of which the paint he was making was composed. . . .

"Mr Denham seems to me to have been practically in the same position as Mr Cutler with regard to the matter. He discovered exactly what Mr Cutler did, namely, that kristaline with bronze powder made a good gold paint, and his use of what he discovered up to December 1891 was even less than Mr Cutler's. His whole evidence as to dates is vague, but it is certain he used a very small quantity, and of that he sold nothing, and in no way made his discovery public prior to the date of pursuers' patent. No doubt he spoke to Mr Ballantine about it, but he was his partner, and that was not in any sense making it public. No more was the making of presents of a few articles covered with it, for as already stated, no one getting these articles would know what they were painted with. On this ground, therefore, I should be inclined to hold that Mr Denham had made no public use of the combination prior to December 1891. But further, to my mind exactly the same objection applies to Mr Denham's knowledge as I have found fatal to Mr Cutler's. I don't think he knew what he was using, and I don't think that if the sale of kristaline had been stopped he could have made the paint, at anyrate at first, or without experiments, which, as he is not a chemist, he apparently could not have made himself. . . ."

Gill v. Cutler.

In ordinary circumstances, no doubt, Mr Cutler would not be subject to the jurisdiction of this Court, being an Englishman carrying on his business and residing in England. But where he voluntarily submits himself to our jurisdiction, or the jurisdiction of any Court in Scotland, I cannot doubt that he is as much subject to that jurisdiction as if he were a native or resident Scotsman. This has long ago been decided, and of this the cases of White[1] and Longmuir[2] may be cited as examples. So far as jurisdiction is concerned, Mr Cutler, having voluntarily appeared in the Scots Court as a defender to try the question with the pursuers of the validity of their patent (and that was the question which the pursuers and Mr Cutler joined issue upon), is in the same position as if he had raised in Scotland a reduction of the pursuers' patent. In the latter case he would have been the pursuer of the action; in the present case he is the defender—but the jurisdiction of the Court is the same in either case. Mr Cutler could not be compelled to appear in our Courts in either character, but having voluntarily appeared in our Court, in the one character or the other, the Court has jurisdiction to try and determine the question he submits to the Court, and having such jurisdiction is bound to exercise it. With regard to relevancy, it appears to me sufficient to refer to the fifth article of the pursuers' condescendence, in which it is distinctly averred that the defender Cutler has extensively sold throughout Great Britain and in Aberdeen the particular gold paint which is said to be an infringement of the pursuers' right. If sold illegally in Aberdeen, the Sheriff of that county had the right to interdict it,—the defender charged with the illegal act being competently before him, as in this case I have shewn he was. Nor have I any doubt as to the interdict, if granted, being effectual. The interdict of the Sheriff of Aberdeen, if affirmed by us, would in practical effect be an interdict applicable to all Scotland,—all inferior Judges would follow the judgment pronounced by us. The effect of our judgment, however, goes farther even than that. For the defender Mr Cutler and the pursuers having submitted to a competent Court the question between them as to the validity of the pursuers' patent, any judgment pronounced on that question will be res judicata between the parties, and finally determine that question, certainly in Scotland, and probably throughout the United Kingdom. That being so, I have no hesitation in proceeding to the decision of the case from any anticipation that such judgment would be ineffectual. I admit that we could not enforce our interdict by sentencing an Englishman to suffer punishment by imprisonment for breach of interdict, unless we could apprehend him in Scotland. But the interdict granted against him here causa cognita could easily be made effectual against him elsewhere. Besides, the question of interdict is a minor question. The real question submitted to us under this application—the question the parties have agreed in asking us to decide—is whether the patent is valid or not, and an application for interdict is a competent and usual mode for raising such a question.

Proceeding now to the merits of the cause, I observe that the defender does not seriously deny that the gold paint manufactured and sold by him is the same as the pursuers', and that an infringement of the pursuers' patent has been committed if that patent is to be regarded as valid. The pursuers' invention is thus described by them in their complete or final specification:—"A paint in which collodion or dissolved liquid pyroxylin is used as the essential element, this being combined or mixed with bronze or other metallic or alloyed substance, in a powdered state, to form a paint or a lacquer for gilding purposes." The paint manufactured by the defender, which is said to be an infringement of the pursuers' patent, is composed of a liquid called Hartley's kristaline, combined with bronze or other metallic substance in a powdered state. Hartley's kristaline has been well known and been sold commercially from a period considerably anterior to the pursuers' patent. If this kristaline is not "dissolved liquid pyroxylin," then obviously there has been no infringement, for dissolved liquid pyroxylin is the "essential element" in the pursuers' invention. The pursuers, however, say that it is, and one of them in his evidence states that he has analysed the kristaline and found "that it was pyroxylin dissolved in amyl acetate." It follows that kristaline and bronze power combined produce the pursuers' patented paint. It is the pursuers' case that this is so; it is this combination of which they complain as an infringement. Now, I think it is abundantly proved that in the year 1888 the defender made a paint of this combination, and used it both as a paint and as a lacquer in the ordinary course of his business, that the special articles sold by the defender to his customers in trade were painted with this paint; that he has ever since continued to make, use, and sell the same kind of paint; that on more than one occasion prior to the date of the pursuers' patent the defender sold the paint so made by him to persons desiring to use the same, and who did use it as a paint, and that he furnished it, without charge, to trade customers (I refer to the French Wreath Company) at their request, prior to the date of said patent, to enable them to touch up or re-paint articles sold and supplied to them by the defender, which, originally painted by the defender with the same kind of paint, had got tarnished or damaged. I think it is also proved that the witness Denham made the same paint by combining kristaline and bronze powder in February 1891—a date anterior to the patent—and that he and his firm have "continued ever since using this combination." Mr Denham says,—"My company have sold this mixture," but by some oversight, which it is difficult to explain, neither party asked Mr Denham when such sale began to be made. While, therefore, it cannot be said to be proved that Mr Denham or his firm sold this paint before the date of the patent, it is proved that Mr Denham painted or decorated a pair of vases "with this combination," which he gave to a friend in June 1891. It is unnecessary, in support of what I have said, to refer to passages in the proof; they have all been read over by the counsel for the parties more than once, and commented on at length. It is the less necessary to do so, because the Sheriff-substitute's judgment does not proceed on any view of the facts materially different from what I have stated, the only difference probably being that the Sheriff-substitute doubts whether it has been sufficiently established that the defender ever sold the paint which he has made. He does not doubt that he used it himself, and that he gave it away to customers and friends. The question then comes to be, whether, taking the facts as I have stated them (or even subject to the Sheriff-substitute's doubt), they amount to proof of prior user. On this question the Sheriff-substitute's judgment is favourable to the pursuers, and I am of opinion that that judgment is erroneous.

I think the Sheriff-substitute has proceeded upon a mistaken view of what it is that constitutes prior use. He seems to think (1) that the pursuers' alleged invention could not be anticipated by the defender's paint unless the latter had been sold to the public; and (2) that it could not anticipate the pursuers' patent unless the public had knowledge "what it was composed of." Neither of these elements are essential to that prior use which will anticipate and so void a patent. In Betts v. Neilson[1] Lord Chelmsford said that it was not "necessary that the patented article should have been previously manufactured for sale," and it is the result of several decisions (see Edmonds on Patents, 43), and writers on patent law are agreed, that actual sale of the article said to anticipate the patent need not be proved in order to constitute prior use. The words of the letters-patent themselves, indeed, lead to this view, for there the patent is declared void if the invention has been in prior "public use," which, of course, might very well exist without public sale. Then as to the notion that the public must know what the article is "composed of" before it can anticipate a patent, I think the Sheriff-substitute has fallen into error by misapprehending the statement often made that there must be disclosure as well as use. But that disclosure does not mean that the public shall know as much about the article used as the maker of it knows. It means that the thing must be disclosed to the public and not kept by the maker of it to himself. It is the use of the thing in public, as distinguished from the use in private by the inventor—public user involves disclosure. In the case of Carpenter[2] a patented lock was held to have been anticipated by the fact that a similar lock had been used by "an individual on a gate adjoining a public road." There was no suggestion in that case that the lock on the gate had been examined by any member of the public so as to ascertain its peculiar construction, or that any such examination or knowledge arising therefrom on the part of the public was necessary to constitute public use. Public use, as Lord Abinger said in Carpenter's case[2] (and the dictum is quoted with approval by Lord Chelmsford in the case of Betts v. Neilson[1]), "means a use in public, not by the public." I think there is no room for doubt that the use by the defender of his own paint was of this character. It is quite true (and perhaps this may be what was passing through the mind of the Sheriff-substitute) that in order to obtain letters-patent the inventor must disclose his secret to the public in return for the temporary monopoly conferred upon him. But such a disclosure as that is not necessary to the prior use, which will anticipate and so void a patent. The Sheriff-substitute, however, does not proceed to his conclusion in favour of the pursuers upon the ground that prior use had not been sufficiently established with so much confidence as he does upon another ground. He says,—"The prior use, even if sufficient in extent to void the patent, which is at least doubtful, was not of a character to anticipate pursuers' patent, in respect the person using had no knowledge or understanding of the composition of kristaline, and therefore did not know the actual materials of which the paint he was making was composed." In this opinion I cannot concur. The defender found in the market an article called kristaline, and he found another called bronze powder. He combined them, and got a gold paint. But, according to the view of the Sheriff-substitute, the combination is not his invention, nor can its use anticipate the same invention by another, because he cannot tell what are the constituents, chemically or otherwise, of the articles he has combined. How far back is his knowledge to go? Suppose he had analysed the kristaline and found that it was dissolved pyroxylin, must he then proceed to find out what pyroxylin is, and what the solvent was? If this is required from the defender for anticipation, what is to be required from the pursuers for their patent? They are in the dark as to the chemical constituents of their pyroxylin. They supply a formula descriptive of it, but the pyroxylin so described will not dissolve in ether or alcohol, or other solvent of that type (for so I think the words "or other solvents" in the specification must be read), as they say it will. But if it was enough for them, as I think it would have been, without giving any formula, to say that their invention was dissolved pyroxylin combined with metallic powder, why should it not be enough to anticipate the patent for the defender to say that he had used or sold paint composed of metallic powder combined with kristaline—kristaline and dissolved pyroxylin being the same thing? That the defender did not know the composition of kristaline was of no importance to the public who took and used his combination, and who could have bought kristaline under that name in the market; it was of no use to the defender beyond this, that if he had known the constituents of kristaline he could have made it for himself instead of buying it ready made. The Sheriff-substitute does not seem to notice that neither the pursuers nor defender is asked how they make bronze powder, the other substance used in the combination, or whether they know of what it is composed. I suppose, however, a knowledge of that is as essential—or non-essential—as a knowledge of how to make kristaline.

[2] 9 M. and W. 300.

I am of opinion that the prior use by the defender of his gold paint was an anticipation of the pursuers' patent, and that that patent is consequently void.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuers hold a patent for a paint for gilding. It specifies as an essential element of the composition that collodion—that is, pyroxylin or gun-cotton—dissolved in ether or some other solvent named, is used by mixing with it bronze or other metallic powder to form a paint or lacquer for gilding purposes. They petitioned for interdict against a firm—Messrs Coutts of Aberdeen—to prohibit them from selling a certain gold paint in infringement of their patent rights. These defenders did not consider that they had any sufficient interest to impugn the validity of the pursuers' patent, and consented to interdict, but the defender Cutler, who was the maker of the paint sold by them, craved leave to be sisted as a defender to defend the action, and he was accordingly sisted, and the case proceeded before the Sheriff-substitute.

His defence truly takes the form of an attack upon the pursuers' patent

No. 74.

Gill v. Cutler.

as having been anticipated by prior user of the combination which they claim. The case went to proof on this defence, and the Sheriff-substitute has upheld the pursuers' patent and granted interdict. I am unable to agree with the judgment he has pronounced, and am of opinion that the defence based on allegation of prior user has been sufficiently established.

The materials used in the paints of the pursuers and the defender are the same. It is not disputed that Hartley's kristaline which the defender uses is just dissolved pyroxylin—indeed it is proved by the pursuers that Hartley's preparation is just pyroxylin dissolved in amyl acetate, and it is of course on the ground that they are the same that they maintain infringement of their patent.

The defender, admitting that his article is the same, maintains that the pursuers' patent was anticipated, as he made and publicly used the paint in 1888, and up to the time of the taking out of the pursuers' patent in 1891 continued to do so. I am of opinion that the defender has proved that he made this material and used it in his business, that he sold articles made in the ordinary course of trade which had been gilded by it, and that he supplied the mixture itself to customers for practical use in touching up articles gilded by him with this paint and supplied by him in the course of business, also that he gave a bottle of it to a customer to gild a frame with it. The evidence upon this part of the case seems to me to be conclusive, and indeed the view of the Sheriff-substitute himself upon this matter is in accordance with what I have expressed. I would only make this additional remark, that the law as laid down in the decided cases does not require that there should be actual sales to the public, but only such public use as brings the subject of the patent to the knowledge of members of the public, as distinguished from mere secret and experimental use, such as a private trial, with a view to consideration of the value of the invention before taking out a patent. I hold also that it is established that Mr Denham also made and used the same article prior to the pursuers' patent.

But the Sheriff-substitute seems to have been led away by the idea that even if the defender used publicly a combination the very same as that afterwards patented by the pursuers, such use would not invalidate the patent if the defender were at the time ignorant of the analytical details of any substance they used in making their combination. He expresses this very distinctly. I cannot agree with this view of the Sheriff-substitute, which seems to have been a view that the defenders themselves also had in their minds. I hold without doubt that if anyone discovers a useful and valuable combination of substances for some purpose of trade, and uses and sells that combination publicly, then such user is sufficient to prevent any other person from afterwards effectually protecting the same combination by a patent as being a new invention of his own. There is no novelty, and therefore there can be no good patent, which must be the disclosure of an invention of novelty. If a known article that can be bought in the market is called by a patentee by its own name in describing a combination of it with other materials as being his invention, it would not be a good objection to his patent to aver that the patentee did not know the chemical ingredients of the article named, nor disclose its chemical composition in his specification. Equally it must hold that if such a combination is publicly used, it is an anticipation of a subsequent patent, although the person who made it up and used it was not aware of the constituent elements of a particular article obtainable in the market, which formed one ingredient of the combination. I have no doubt in holding that if public user is made of a combination of articles purchaseable in ordinary trade, that is public disclosure of the combination, so as to make the obtaining of effectual rights by patent for the combination at any subsequent time impossible,—it is a use in a public way of the combination which is in question, and not a conveying to the public mind of minute details about the composition of ingredients. Here the defender put together certain articles obtainable in the market, and produced a useful article by the combination, and he used this combination in his business, and sold and gave it for practical use to his customers. That seems to me to make the validity of a subsequent patent for an article which is made by precisely the same combination not maintainable. I therefore would move your Lordships to recall the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and to pronounce findings to the effect that the alleged invention of the pursuers was publicly used and known prior to the date of the letters-patent founded on by the pursuers, and accordingly that the prayer of the petition falls to be refused.

LORD YOUNG.—I have given all the attention in my power to this case, all the more so because my opinion and views differ, not only from those of both parties, but also from those which both of your Lordships have adopted regarding the regularity of these proceedings. I think that it is material that attention should be directed to the irregularity of these proceedings almost from the first. The petitioners are paint manufacturers in Aberdeen, and in 1891 obtained letters-patent for a certain paint which they believed they had invented. The appellants, who became the respondents in this petition, are paint manufacturers in Birmingham, carrying on the same kind of business in Birmingham as the pursuers carry on in Aberdeen. It appears from all the statements of the petitioners before us and their averments on record that the respondents, the Birmingham manufacturers, made and put into the market paint which the petitioners thought was an infringement of their patent—(Here his Lordship read articles 5 and 7 of the condescendence as quoted in the narrative). Now, I think that it is quite distinctly stated, and it is apparently in accordance with fact, that Cutler had for a considerable period before 1893 been manufacturing paint in Birmingham, which the petitioners believe, I have no doubt on plausible grounds, to be an infringement of their patent, and that he has put that into the market in England, in Scotland, and abroad. One would have supposed that a patentee, whether he was in Aberdeen or in Birmingham, or wherever he was, if he wished a legal remedy, would proceed in the ordinary way by action in a proper Court which could effectually try the question and give the proper remedy. But the Aberdeen patentees selected one particular retail dealer in Aberdeen, and they might equally well have selected a dealer in Kirkwall, and said,—"You have got some of the paint of the Birmingham infringer, and we will try the question of his infringement with you here in Aberdeen." I do not for a moment question the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court of Aberdeen to try the validity of a patent right, and whether there has been an infringement of a patent right by a retail dealer. I quite understand that the Sheriff of Aberdeen has jurisdiction to restrain any infringement of a patent, though I do not think he could decide as to the validity of this patent. The Sheriff, in the exercise of his discretion, should have granted interdict on caution, but should have sent the petitioners to try the validity of their patent elsewhere with the real infringer.

I quite appreciate what Lord Trayner said, that when this extraordinary, I do not say irregular, petition was presented, the man really interested in this petition, viz., the manufacturer in Birmingham, might have come forward and said that the interdict would interfere with his business, and that he would appear and defend, so that no interdict would be pronounced. That is indeed the only rational ground for the Birmingham manufacturer's appearance in the case at all. But the first thing he does after appearing is to consent to the interdict prayed for being granted against the original defenders, therefore he was not there to prevent interference with his business by Coutts & Sons being interdicted. Then what reason was there for his appearance? It could not be to prevent interdict against himself; there was no question of that. Was it to get this case tried in Aberdeen? I have not been able to find any rational ground for his interference, unless it be that the Birmingham manufacturer was sagacious enough to know that if the other firm was so foolish as to expose their whole case in Aberdeen, it would be the best possible thing for him. He would have the case tried, and his opponent's case disclosed, before a Judge who was absolutely incompetent to deal with him, and who could not prevent him from selling the paint in Birmingham.

Cutler cannot have sisted himself to defend Coutts & Sons, because the first step taken was to interdict them by a now absolutely final judgment; they are absolutely interdicted, therefore no one could by sisting prevent that—the only interdict asked—being granted. I think that this was as irregular a proceeding as could be. It is said that there was a conclusion for damages and that this transferred to Cutler. But there was no conclusion for damages against Cutler as the petition originally stood, so that the only damages could be against Coutts & Sons for what Coutts & Sons sold. What did they sell? There is no evidence on the point, but it is said a few shillings' worth. There is no allegation against Cutler for which damages could be given. Suppose an action of damages brought against the retail dealer who sells the paint. I suppose the action could be brought in the Small-Debt Court, but whether there or in the Sheriff Court, the idea of the inferior Court entering into the question of the validity of the patent, or as to whether it had been infringed by a firm in Birmingham, in an action of damages against one of a thousand retail dealers who sold a bit of it—is that rational? I altogether condemn this course of procedure. There is no precedent for it. Such a thing never occurred before, and I hope will never occur again. I think that the only regular course was for the Aberdeen manufacturers to proceed against the Birmingham manufacturer who manufactured and put in the market paint which was an infringement of their patent, and to proceed against him before a Court which could deal with him and restrain him from doing what was wrong.

Gill v. Cutler.

This procedure would lead to this, that a patentee in Birmingham might arrange with another manufacturer in the next street to try the question in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeen against some Aberdeen retail dealer to determine the validity of his patent.

I feel so strongly that this case is so unprecedented and so inexpedient that I must express my strong condemnation of it. Holding this view, I think it more in accordance with my duty to refrain from expressing any opinion on the question whether the manufacture in Birmingham of the paint in question was an infringement of the patent rights of the Aberdeen manufacturer.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the interlocutor appealed against: Find in fact (1) that the pursuers have obtained letters-patent dated 28th December 1892, numbered 22160[91], for improvements relating to paints and lacquers; (2) that the invention for which said letters-patent were granted is described in the complete specifications by the pursuers as a paint in which collodion or dissolved liquid pyroxylin is used as the essential element, this being combined or mixed with bronze or other metallic or alloyed substances in a powdered state to form a paint or a lacquer for gilding purposes; (3) that the defender Cutler in the year 1888, and from that date down to the 28th December 1891, made, sold, and publicly used, both as a paint and a lacquer for gilding purposes, a paint composed of dissolved liquid pyroxylin combined or mixed with bronze powder or other metallic substances, and that he has since said 28th December 1891 continued to make, sell, and publicly use the same; and (4) that the paint so made, sold, and publicly used by said defender was the same as that for which said letters-patent were granted: Find in law that the pursuers' letters-patent foresaid are invalid and void on the ground of prior public use: Therefore assoilzie the defender Cutler from the whole conclusions of the action, and decern."

1st Division. Dean of Guild Court, Leith.

In July 1895 a petition was presented by the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh to the Leith Dean of Guild Court for a warrant to erect a temporary cholera hospital on the lands of Quarryholes, within the burgh of Leith, which they alleged belonged to them. The First Division of the Court, upon 29th October 1895 (vide supra, p. 44), recalled an interlocutor of the Dean of Guild Court refusing the petition, and remitted the cause to that Court to proceed.

On 22d November 1895 the Local Government Board for Scotland, who by section 3 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. c. 58), came in place of the Board of Supervision, dealt with the application by the Edinburgh Corporation for approval of the site and plans in the manner set forth in the following minute:—"Temporary Hospital at Quarryholes.—The application of the Local Authority of Edinburgh for the approval of the Board to the site and plans of a temporary hospital to be erected at Quarryholes, within the boundaries of the burgh of Leith, as shewn in the Ordnance Survey map, was further considered by the Board. Having made inquiry, the Board, in terms of section 39 of the Public Health Act,* approve of the site, subject to the following conditions:—1. That the approval of the Board is, in the meantime, limited to a period of three years only. 2. That the hospital is to be used for the treatment of cases of cholera only. 3. That the drain from the hospital joining the main in Easter Road is to be used for non-infected matter only. 4. That all infected matter (other than clothing, which, if to be used again, must be duly disinfected) is to be disposed of by means of an incinerator, to be placed in a convenient situation. The Board approve of the plans, subject to provision being made for the proper disinfection of clothing."

Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Magistrates of Leith.

The petitioners averred,—(Cond. 5) "The said ground lies within a convenient distance of the burgh of Edinburgh, and is within the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild Court of Leith, and the respondent William Beatson, master of works, who is cited for the public interest, has alone any interest in the operations proposed to be executed. The said hospital is to be used for the treatment of cases of cholera only. The drain from the hospital joining the main in Easter Road is to be used for non-infected matter only. All infected matter (other than clothing, which, if to be used again, will be duly disinfected) is to be disposed of by means of an incinerator on the premises."

The respondents averred,—(Stat. 6) "The petitioners, the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of Edinburgh now propose to erect an hospital for infectious diseases upon a site which is outwith their own burgh and within the burgh of Leith. The site so chosen is unsuitable. . . ."

They further averred that the petitioners had not received any sufficient approval of the situation and construction of the proposed hospital by the Local Government Board under section 39 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867.

The petitioners pleaded;—(4) The respondents' answers are irrelevant. (5) The site of the proposed hospital being within a convenient distance of the burgh of Edinburgh, and the hospital being required for public health purposes, warrant for its erection ought to be granted. (6) The Local Government Board having approved of the site and plans of the proposed hospital, and no valid objections having been stated by the respondents to the structures, the petitioners, the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the city of Edinburgh, as representing the community thereof, are, in the circumstances condescended on, entitled, as Local Authority foresaid, to warrant to erect as craved.

The respondents pleaded;—(1) No title. (3) It being illegal for the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of Edinburgh to erect an hospital within the burgh of Leith, the prayer of the present petition should be refused, with expenses. (4) The approval of the Local Government Board not being in conformity with the provisions of the Public Health (Scotland) Acts, the petitioners are not entitled to obtain warrant for the erection of the proposed hospital buildings until said approval is obtained in terms of the statute, and produced to the Court. (5) The approval of the Local Government Board, being ultra vires, is inept and insufficient as a warrant for the erection of said hospital buildings.

On 16th December the Dean of Guild sustained the first, third, fourth, and fifth pleas in law for the respondents, and dismissed the petition.*

* "NOTE.— . . . The fourth and fifth pleas in law for the respondents raise a different question, and one of general importance. . . .

"It appears plain that, if the result of the petitioners' application had been a refusal by the Local Government Board to approve of the situation and construction of the hospital for the erection of which warrant is craved, the Court would have had no option but to dismiss the petition. Does its conditional approval, as expressed in these letters, satisfy the provisions of section 39? The Court are of opinion that it does not. There is no authority in the Act for the approval of the Board of the situation and construction of a proposed hospital being for a limited time or for the treatment of one class of infectious diseases only. The situation and construction must

No. 75.

Jan. 11, 1896. Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Magistrates of Leith.

The petitioners appealed, and argued;—(1) It was incompetent for the Dean of Guild to decide questions of nuisance. The jurisdiction of his Court was confined to questions of building. Interdict was the respondents' proper remedy.[1] (2) It was true that the approval of the petitioners' scheme by the Local Government Board was an approval subject to conditions, but it was sufficient under section 39 of the Act of 1867. Under that section the Board had right to give an absolute approval, and that involved the right to give a qualified approval. (3) The Public Health (Amendment) Act, 1890, placed no restriction upon the territory which a burgh might invade except only that it must be within a convenient distance of the burgh.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The Dean of Guild was quite entitled to decide the cause upon the grounds set forth in his note.[2] (2) The approval of the Local Government Board must, under section 39, be an absolute approval. It was, however, conditional (a) on something being done which was not shewn on any of the plans, and (b) on a certain use being made of the hospital after it was built. The Board had in short given their approval to what was upon their own be such as the Board can unconditionally approve; and the mere fact that the Board have limited their approval to a period of three years seems to indicate that they were not in a position to give an approval in terms of the Act. The district in question is known to the Court to be one in which a considerable amount of feuing has recently been going on, and which might reasonably be expected, in ordinary course, to be entirely built upon within a comparatively short period. The site of the proposed hospital is within a comparatively short distance of Easter Road, which is rapidly becoming an important thoroughfare in Leith; and the Court infer, from the terms of the minute in question, that the Local Government Board did not feel themselves in a position to give an unqualified approval of the site for the purposes of an infectious diseases hospital, on that, among other grounds. The petitioners' agent expressly refused to make any restriction or amendment on the prayer of his petition, and accordingly, if warrant were granted as prayed for, the petitioners would obtain something more than, on their own shewing, they are entitled to demand. It may also be noted that, if warrant were granted in the form prayed for, the Local Authority of Leith would, apparently, have no power to insist upon the conditions laid down by the Local Government Board being implemented, more especially in reference to the use of their drain in Easter Road, which, it is proposed, should receive the discharges from the proposed hospital. The Court accordingly have sustained the fourth and fifth pleas in law for the respondents, which embody these contentions.

"The third plea raises the question whether the Local Authority of one burgh is entitled to erect an hospital for infectious diseases which it deems necessary for the use of its inhabitants within the precincts of another burgh which happens to be in close proximity. Had section 39 of the Act of 1867 alone fallen to be considered, there would be no dubiety upon this point; but the petitioners contended that, by the Act of 1890, any restriction as to the invasion of the districts of neighbouring Local Authorities was entirely removed, whether that Local Authority was a burgh or a parish, provided only the site selected was 'within a convenient distance' of the district whose Local Authority desired to erect the hospital. If the words are construed literally, and without regard to the presumed intenminute an incomplete hospital. (3) The theory of the Public Health Amendment Act, 1890, was that burghs might be too densely populated to admit of an hospital being built within their own district, and section 1 contemplated their invasion of the territory of thinly populated landward districts for the purpose.

The respondent abandoned his first plea.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Local Authority of the burgh of Leith have stated objections to the prayer of this petition being granted, and the grounds of these objections are brought together in six pleas in law. My opinion is that each and all of these are ill founded. It was conceded by the respondents that the sustaining by the Dean of Guild of the plea of no title to sue was an error, and, accordingly, I do not further comment upon that point than to say that I think the respondents are extremely well advised in the course they have followed.

The next question is whether the Local Authority of Edinburgh have obtained the approval of the Local Government Board, which is an indispensable pre-requisite of their proceeding to build an hospital under section 39 of the Public Health Act of 1867. My opinion on that point is, that they have obtained the approval of the Local Government Board of the situation and construction of this hospital. As regards the situation, there can be no doubt, because the Board of Supervision in express terms approve of the site. The only question, therefore, raised is whether they have approved of the construction of the proposed hospital. Now, that stands in this position: On the face of the minute of the Local Government Board to which I have referred it appears that the Board had before them the plans of this hospital, and the Board approved of the plans, subject to provision being made for the proper disinfection of clothing. From the fourth articulated head of their tion of the Legislature, there is no doubt that the site in question fulfils this condition. It appears, however, to be equally plain that such a result was not contemplated by the amending statute, the object of which was to enable a burgh which within its own precincts could not find a convenient site for an infectious hospital to go into the surrounding country with a view of obtaining a site there. The enactment applies only to burghs, and no reason was suggested why it should have been passed other than that above stated. If, however, the contention of the petitioners is sound, the position of Leith, which, in common with other burghs was entitled to the benefit of section 1 of the amending statute, is considerably altered for the worse. Under the previous Act, while Leith was bound to find accommodation within its own district for its own hospitals, it was entitled to exclude the hospitals of other Local Authorities. On the petitioners' contention, however, the amending statute would enable the Magistrates of Edinburgh to plant all the hospitals they proposed to erect within the precincts of the burgh of Leith, subject only to the control of the Local Government Board. The Court does not think that this could have been the intention of the Legislature, and that the second clause of section 1, which provides that 'for the purpose of the said Act, any hospital or temporary place for the reception of the sick, provided within a convenient distance of a burgh, shall be held to be within the burgh,' sufficiently shews that the sites contemplated by the statute were sites outwith the boundaries of any burgh. In short, that the object of the amending statute was to enable the Local Authorities of burghs to invade landward districts for the purposes of the Act, but not to invade each other's territories."

conclusions, which precede what I have read, it appears that the infected matter other than clothing which must be duly disinfected, is to be disposed of by means of an incinerator.

Now, I do not think that it is necessary, in order to satisfy the terms of section 39, that the Board of Supervision should have before them detailed plans of every minute particular of the hospital as it is to be carried out. In the present case they, accustomed to the use of such things, and knowing the Local Authorities of towns to be accustomed to their use and provision, say merely,—"We approve of the plans, but you must have an incinerator." That, I think, is a good approval of the hospital in question,—this adjunct or detail being one which is to be provided by the Local Authority, but which does not enter as a vital element into the construction of the proposed hospital.

But the matter does not rest there, because on this expression of the opinion of the Local Government Board the Local Authority of Edinburgh present their application, or rather I should say amend their application, so as to completely square with the requirements of the Local Government Board, for the Dean of Guild Court of Leith is now asked not to approve of the construction of the plans without an incinerator but with an incinerator. How that is to be worked out will manifestly be a matter for the good sense and business habits of the parties who have to deal with it.

It may be that it would be convenient if the petitioners were to submit detailed plans of the incinerator to the Local Government Board, in order that they may indicate their views upon that matter. But even supposing that, as a matter of convenience or expediency, to be the course adopted, that does not enter into what we have now to consider, viz., whether the petitioners have not obtained the antecedent approval of the construction of the hospital which is required under the 39th section. I think that they have.

I should say that the other so-called conditions of the Local Government Board seem to me to stand in a different position altogether. I do not think that they are in any sense at all conditions of the approval of the site and the construction of the hospital. They are merely a very well-timed notice, given by the Local Government Board to the Local Authority, that, in the use of this hospital which is to be constructed, they must attend to certain particulars of use and administration. The Local Government Board has complete power to enforce their views upon such matters on a Local Authority, and the mode of doing it is brought out quite clearly in the Public Health Act. If they thought that their views were not being given effect to in this hospital, they would ask for explanations from the Local Authority, and if these were unsatisfactory or were refused, they have power under the Public Health Act to send down some skilled person to make inquiry into the matter, and on his report being obtained, if the Local Authority were in fault, the Local Government Board have power to come to this Court by summary petition to obtain an order requiring fulfilment of the prescribed duties in that regard. And accordingly, so far as matters other than an incinerator are concerned, I treat them not as conditions of the approval of the construction, but merely as a timely intimation that in the use of this hospital certain things will be required.

Now, the next plea which has been sustained by the Dean of Guild relates to the construction to be put upon the Act of 1890. Under the 39th section of the Act of 1867, which I have hitherto alone referred to, the Local Authority were entitled to provide hospitals, but they must confine themselves to their own district.

But the Act of 1890 enables burghs to pass out of their own district and take ground for an hospital within a convenient distance of such district. Now, it is said that because this power to invade a neighbouring district is conferred upon a burgh, it therefore follows that the invaded territory must necessarily be a landward district. I confess that seems to me a complete non sequitur. What is required is merely that the burgh is to be enabled to take ground, subject, of course, to the approval of the Board of Supervision, where ground is to be had more easily or conveniently. As we know, many burghs, except in the matter of jurisdiction, are really, as regards part of their area, country districts, and many burghs also have more free land than their contiguous neighbour burghs; but to say that you must go to the country to get land seems to me to interpolate into the statute a limitation which is certainly not expressed in it, and which does not seem at all congenial to the theory of expediency and convenience which animates the enactment.

Now, I think that that is the last of the pleas which have been maintained in argument at the bar, and I consider that the proper result is that all the pleas stated by the burgh of Leith should be repelled.

I suppose your Lordships will necessarily, in repelling these pleas, remit to the Dean of Guild Court to proceed as shall be just. The remaining matter, therefore, will be the examination and approval of the plans, and I cannot doubt that these matters will be treated in the business-like spirit proper to the Dean of Guild Court.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the interlocutor of 16th December 1895, repelled the pleas in law for the respondents, and remitted to the Dean of Guild Court to proceed as shall be just.

Appeal to the House of Lords—Interim execution pending appeal—Application for leave to appeal in forma pauperis.

(SEQUEL of case reported supra, p. 294.)

The First Division of the Court, by their interlocutor, dated 29th November 1895, adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, which assoilzied the defender and found him entitled to expenses, and found the defender entitled to additional expenses. The pursuer having appealed to the House of Lords on 17th December 1895, the defender presented a petition for execution pending appeal in terms of the Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 151, sec. 17, and referred to the undernoted authorities.[1] The pursuer opposed the petition on the ground that it was entirely within the discretion of the Court to grant or to refuse execution, and that it was premature and inexpedient to grant it here, as the pursuer had presented an application to the House for leave to prosecute his appeal in forma pauperis, and the application had not been disposed of by the Committee.

THE COURT, holding that the rule of practice was clear, and that there was nothing in the present case to take it out of the rule, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the petition of the defender, John Gilchrist Clark, for execution pending appeal, and heard counsel for the parties, remit the account of expenses found due by the interlocutors of 27th June and 29th November 1895 to the Auditor, to tax, and to report."

Religious Tract and Book Society v. Inland Revenue.

RELIGIOUS TRACT AND BOOK SOCIETY OF SCOTLAND, Appellants.—Cook. R. S. FORBES (Surveyor of Taxes), Respondent.—Lord Adv. Sir Charles Pearson—A. J. Young.

Revenue—Income-Tax—Profits arising from Trade—Trade carried on by Religious Society—Deductions—Losses not connected with Trade—Income-Tax Act 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 34), sec. 2, Sched. D.—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35), sec. 100, Sched. D., Case 1, Rule 3.—A Society whose object was to promote religion by the circulation of tracts and books, carried on the business of booksellers in a shop, and earned profits therefrom. The Society also sold books by colporteurs, but the colportage work could not by itself be carried on at a profit as a commercial undertaking, and the Society was able to continue it only by means of the profits earned in the shop and of voluntary subscriptions. Held that the profits earned in carrying on the business of booksellers were trade profits and fell to be assessed for income-tax, and that the losses arising from the colportage agencies did not fall to be deducted therefrom, the colportage being essentially distinct from the bookselling business, and not being of the nature of trade.

1ST DIVISION. THIS was a case stated for the Religious Tract and Book Society of Scotland by the Commissioners of Income-Tax.

The case set forth the following facts:—"At a meeting of General Commissioners of Income-Tax for the county of Midlothian, held at Edinburgh on 2d July 1895:—

"The Religious Tract and Book Society of Scotland appealed against an assessment under Schedule D. of the Income-Tax Acts,* for year 1894-95 on £532, 12s. 6d., as profits derived from bookselling at the Society's Central Depository, 99 George Street, Edinburgh (after deducting £210, 18s. 6d., loss on business of the Society's depository at Belfast), on the average of three years to 20th September 1893.

"The constitution of the Society provides (Article 2) that 'the object of the Society shall be, by the circulation of religious tracts and books, to diffuse a pure and religious literature among all classes of the community,' and (Article 3) 'This object shall be carried out by the establishment of central and branch depositories and of auxiliary societies and by means of colportage and other agencies.'

* The Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35), sec. 100, Sched. D, First Case, Rule 3, enacts—"In estimating the balance of profits and gains chargeable under Sched. D, no sum shall be . . . deducted from such profits or gains . . . on account of loss not connected with or arising out of such trade. . . ."

"Separate accounts are kept of the receipts and expenditure of each of the depositories and of the colportage department. The accounts for each of the three years immediately preceding the year to be assessed (1894-95) shew a profit on the business of the Edinburgh depository, but a loss on the Belfast depot, and a loss upon the colportage department. The result is, that placing the loss upon the Belfast depot and the colportage agencies against the profit on the Edinburgh depository, there is overhead a considerable loss on the Society's operations, which is only made good by subscriptions and donations from the public. As stated in the annual reports of the Society, the business of the depositories is conducted on strictly commercial principles, no subscriptions being received or sought on their behalf. . . . The following is a statement of the facts admitted by the parties:—

"1. The colportage agencies, the Edinburgh depository, and the Belfast depot, are alike integral parts of the Society's machinery.

"2. The colportage business, estimated by sales, is much larger than that of the Edinburgh depository and the Belfast depot put together. The sales in all three departments are of the same goods, at the same prices, and for the same object; also there is only one stock out of which the salesmen at them all are supplied, and the Society is responsible for the expenses of all the departments alike.

"3. The Society's colporteurs are to a certain extent cottage missionaries, . . . and the directors attach importance to that portion of their work. But this does not represent the chief part of a colporteur's duties. The first instruction put into the hands of every applicant for service as a colporteur, after referring to cottage visitation, declares explicitly that 'as the Society exists to spread the knowledge of the Gospel, and promote the kingdom of Christ by means of the press, and to circulate pure and healthy general literature, a colporteur's chief duty is to sell Bibles and the books and periodicals which are supplied to him.'

"4. The two departments of the Society's work (the depository and the colportage) are alike missionary in character, as stated in the constitution of the Society, and are alike carried on by selling to the public at ordinary retail prices; but the colportage agency could not by itself be carried on at a profit as a commercial undertaking, and required the aid of subscriptions. Before the colportage agencies were added, and when the Edinburgh depository stood alone, even the latter was carried on at a loss, and the Society required and received subscriptions. That depository continued to shew financial loss for many years, both before and after the addition of colportage.

"On behalf of the Society it was maintained that its business, which consists, according to its constitution, of the purchase and sale, from the same stock, and at the same prices, of Bibles, books, and periodicals, at the depository in Edinburgh, the depot in Belfast, and colportage agencies throughout the country, should be treated as a whole, and any loss made on one department should be deducted from profit made in others before striking the balance on which an assessment of income-tax is made.

"In support of the assessment, the Surveyor of Taxes, Mr R. S. Forbes, maintained that the profits from the business of bookselling, carried on by means of the depositories on strictly commercial principles, could not be distinguished from ordinary profits of trade, and the application of such profits to religious or charitable purposes did not exempt them from assessment. . . . He also maintained that the deficiency on the colportage agencies being due to their expenses as missionary and philanthropic undertakings, and such agencies not being of the nature of trade, losses arising from them could not be set off against profits from the depositories."

The commissioners were of opinion that the business of the depositories was of the nature of trade, and must be distinguished from the operations of the colportage agencies, that the application of the profits to religious purposes did not exempt them from assessment, also that the loss by colportage agencies could not be set against such profits. They therefore refused the appeal and sustained the assessment.

"The question of law for the opinion of the Court is—In ascertaining whether the Society has earned profits assessable under schedule D, does the deficiency on its operations in the colportage agencies fall to be set against its profits in the Edinburgh depository?"

The appellants argued;—The business and work carried on by the Society must be regarded as a whole, and the loss arising on one branch must be deducted from the gain arising on another, before profits could be assessed for income-tax.[1] The principle contended for by the appellants was recognised by the Inland Revenue, for they allowed the loss on the Belfast business to be deducted from the gain on the Edinburgh business. In the same way the deficiency arising on the colportage business should be deducted. The net result of the whole operations carried on by the Society was loss, the deficit being met by voluntary subscriptions. The Society ought to be exempted from income-tax in any view, for it did not exist for the purpose of making gain in the sense of distributing its profits among its members. It was substantially a charity, and its whole income was devoted to philanthropic work. It should make no difference that profits were earned in a particular department of that work.[2]

Argued for the respondent;—The bookselling business in the shops was a trade, and was essentially distinct from the work done by the colportage agencies. The latter was in no sense a commercial undertaking. That was clearly shewn by the fact that it required the support of voluntary subscriptions to enable it to be carried on at all. It did not make the profits derived from the bookselling business any the less trade profits that they were entirely devoted to a philanthropic object.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It may be conceded to the appellants that the object of their Society is not that of making profit but the diffusion of religious literature among all classes of the community. But incidental to that large and beneficial purpose they engage in trade, and this assessment proceeds upon the very intelligible theory that the business of bookselling cannot be taxable or not taxable according to the motive of the bookseller. Now, quite consistently in that businesslike view, the Revenue find that this Society has a bookseller's shop in Edinburgh, and a bookseller's shop in Belfast, that it is the same business, and accordingly they allow the loss on the shop in Belfast to be deducted from the gains of the shop in Edinburgh. But then they are moved to bring into the account of this bookselling establishment the accounts of the colportage which is carried on by the Society. Now, the legitimacy of the importation into the account of the colportage must depend entirely on whether it, as well as the shops, is a business, trade, or adventure carried on on commercial principles. It seems to me that the statements in the case entirely negative that view. It appears that the colportage agency could not be carried on at a profit as a commercial undertaking, and is persevered in merely because the Society find that by appealing to the religious public, they are able to obtain subscriptions which enable them to fill up the deficit. When we turn to the methods of the colportage, it appears that they are not commercial methods, —that is to say, that the business carried on is not purely that of pushing the sale of their goods, but that on the contrary the duty of the salesman is to dwell over the purchase and make it the occasion of administering religious advice and counsel. Now, under these conditions, it seems to me to be impossible to hold that this is a business, trade, or adventure which is unfortunately resulting in loss. It is really a charitable mission, in which the sale of the Scriptures is made the occasion for doing something more than merely effecting the sale of books. And accordingly, while I completely assent to the view that the establishment and conduct of the shops and the establishment and conduct of the colportage all rest upon the same ultimate motive, yet at the same time the two operations seem to be essentially distinguished. The shops are simply booksellers' shops, the other is a combination of the sale of books with a missionary enterprise, and therefore I think the judgment is perfectly right.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I think this question arises upon the matter of striking the balance-sheet of the trade or business carried on by this Society. If this colportage business be a proper part of the trade or business carried on by them along with the two shops which they keep, then the loss arises from the business, and falls to be taken into account in striking the balance under the first rule of Schedule D. I do not think the case raises any question about loss connected with or arising out of some different concern altogether. Now, I think the Society is carrying on the trade of bookselling. It keeps two shops—I do not care whether you call them depositories or shops—for the sale of books, the one in Edinburgh and the other in Belfast. That being the trade carried on by this Society, the Crown very properly put these two parts of the business of bookselling together, and seeing there is loss on the Belfast shop, they deduct that from the gain on the Edinburgh shop. That is according to ordinary practice. I agree with your Lordship that if a party takes to selling books, it does not matter to the Crown what his object is in doing so—whether it is to put profit into his own pocket, or, having made profit, to expend it in charity or donation. It makes no difference therefore in this case what is the object with which these two shops are carried on, or the purpose for which the Society expend the profits made in these shops. I think the true question is, whether this colportage system to which the profits of the shops are applied is or is not part of the trade of bookselling carried on by the Society.

Religious Tract and Book Society v. Inland Revenue.

Now, this colportage system is not a commercial system at all. It is not carried on for the purpose of making profit. It is not carried on as a trade speculation, because, as we are told in this case, it could not be carried on at a profit. It appears to me to be a very remarkable trade, as to which those who carry it on admit that they could not possibly make any profit out of it. That shews clearly that it is not carried on as part of the business of bookselling; but the Society carry on the business of bookselling for the purpose of making profit, and having made profit, they expend it on the charitable purpose for which this Society exists, namely, the sale of books by colporteurs.

LORD M'LAREN.—This Society, as we are informed, is constituted for the purpose of promoting the circulation of the Scriptures and of religious books, and its objects are carried out in two ways,—first, by keeping retail shops in Edinburgh and Belfast for the sale of their books, and secondly, by sending colporteurs about the country for the purpose of bringing the Bible and religious publications to the homes of the poor. It is stated that the shops if taken together are carried on at a profit, but that the colportage business results in a loss, and, as I read the case, it results in an intentional loss, because there is one element which appears to me to be decisive of this case, and that is, that not to meet an occasional loss, but as part of the system on which the Society's operations are carried on, the public are appealed to for subscriptions to make up so much of the loss arising on the colportage business as is not covered by the profits arising on the shop sales. Now, in their reports as stated in the case the Society disclaims the intention of asking the public to contribute towards meeting loss or reduced profits upon their proper commercial business, and one understands the reason why this disclaimer should be entered in the Society's reports, because it is unlikely that the public would contribute money in order to allow the Society to undersell other dealers. But the subscriptions are asked expressly to meet the loss arising on the colportage business, which is of a combined missionary and charitable character. It appears to me therefore that these two branches of the Society's operations cannot be identified as one and the same trade, adventure, or concern, and therefore that under the third rule for estimating profits under schedule D the Society is not entitled to set off the loss arising from the colportage business in reduction of the profits upon which they fall to be assessed for their commercial business. The two being clearly separable, I think income-tax is payable upon the remunerative part of the Society's business.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordships. I think that the Society carries on the business of booksellers in Edinburgh and Belfast, and that their operations in disseminating books by the system of colportage do not constitute a trade, adventure, or concern in the nature of a trade at all, but form one of the purposes to which the profits derived from their trade of booksellers are applied. I agree that it is entirely in accordance with this distinction, and very significant, that they say they carry on their trade of booksellers on purely commercial principles, and do not seek or receive the aid of subscriptions for the purposes of that business, but on the other hand that they do ask and obtain subscriptions, most legitimately, in aid of the purpose to which their profits are applied. No. 77.

Process—Decree in absence—Mandate to lodge defences.—In an action by A against a Danish company defences were lodged on the instructions of a person resident in Scotland. The pursuer on the case appearing in the Adjustment Roll objected that the defences had been lodged without the authority of the defender, and moved for decree in absence. The Lord Ordinary, after adjourning the adjustment of the record on three occasions in order to allow a mandate to be produced, but without pronouncing an order for the production of a mandate, refused a minute craving further delay alleged to be necessary to allow a meeting of the company to be called for the purpose of granting a mandate, and granted decree in absence.

In a competition between A and another creditor of the company, held that the decree in absence was irregular, and could not receive effect.

Arrestment—Arrestment on the dependence—Amendment of summons—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 29.—An action was raised at the instance of five pursuers, on separate grounds of action, concluding for payment to each of separate sums, and arrestments were used on the dependence of the action. Subsequently, on the motion of the pursuers, the names of four of the pursuers were deleted from the summons, together with the conclusions applicable to them respectively. The remaining pursuer afterwards obtained a decree.

Held (1) that the original summons was incompetent; and (2) that the alteration on the summons was an amendment in the sense of the Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29, and did not validate the arrestments so as to confer a preference on the remaining pursuer in competition with other creditors of the defender at the date of the arrestment.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Moncreiff.

IN July 1895 H. Fischer & Company, shipbrokers, Grangemouth, raised an action against the Aktieselskabet Tremastet Skonnert "Molly"—the company registered as owners of the three-masted schooner "Molly" of Svendborg, Denmark, which had been arrested by the pursuers at Grangemouth—concluding for the judicial sale of the "Molly," and for the division of the price.

The ship was sold under judicial warrant on 3d September 1895 for £675, and parties were thereafter ordained to lodge their condescendences and claims on the price. Claims amounting to about £400 in all were found to be preferable claims, and were ordered to be paid out of the price accordingly. Competing claims for the balance were lodged (1) by J. R. Andersen, who founded on an arrestment of the "Molly," dated 8th April 1895, used on the dependence of an action against the registered company, and on a decree in that action for the sum of £311, 15s. 7d.; and (2) by the pursuers, Fischer & Company, who founded on an arrestment of the "Molly," dated 7th May 1895, used on the dependence of an action in the Sheriff Court at Falkirk, against the registered company, and on a decree therein for £292, 3s. 2d. The competition depended on the validity and priority of Andersen's arrestment. The material steps of procedure in the action, upon the dependence of which that arrestment was used, were as follow:—

The summons in the action, which was signeted on 8th April 1895, was at the instance of Andersen and of four other tradesmen in Svendborg, against the company registered as owners of the "Molly," and also against H. Fischer, sole partner of Fischer & Company, and two other members of the registered company, and concluded first for payment of £311, 15s. 7d. to Andersen, and secondly, thirdly, fourthly, and fifthly, for payment of other sums specified to each of the four other pursuers.

The arrestment on the dependence was, as already mentioned, dated 8th April. The execution of arrestment bore that the ship should remain arrested until caution should be found "that the same shall be made forthcoming to the said pursuers as accords with law, conform to the said summons in all points."

The summons was served edictally on the registered company.

Defences were lodged on behalf of all the defenders by instructions of H. Fischer, in which it was pleaded, inter alia, that the action was incompetent.

Before the case was called the pursuers annexed a minute of restriction, in which they restricted the summons to the conclusions against the registered company, in respect that they were informed that that company was capable of being sued in its own name.

When the case was called in the Adjustment Roll the pursuers objected that Fischer had no mandate to lodge defences on behalf of the registered company. Thereafter the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) on three successive occasions continued the adjustment of the record for a period in all of three weeks extending to 22d June, in order to admit of a mandate from the company being obtained.

On 22d June a minute was tendered for Fischer, setting forth that he was managing owner of the company, and held a majority of the shares, and craving that the time for lodging a mandate from the company should be extended till a meeting of the company could be held. The Lord Ordinary refused to receive this minute.

On 25th June the pursuers lodged a minute (No. 40 of process), in which they "craved leave of the Lord Ordinary to strike out of the summons the names of the pursuers" other than Andersen, and the conclusions of the summons applicable to these pursuers respectively, "and on this being done to grant decree in favour of the pursuer the said J. R. Andersen in terms of the first conclusion of the summons."

On the same day the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the pursuers, decerns in absence against the defenders Aktieselskabet Tremastet Skonnert 'Molly,' in terms of the first petitory conclusion of the summons, as restricted by minute annexed thereto, and by minute No. 40 of process, with expenses."

In the present action the claimants Fischer & Company pleaded, inter alia;—4. The claimants are entitled to be ranked and preferred for all their claims in priority to the claim of the said J. R. Andersen in respect (1) the decree in absence on which he founds was irregular and should be set aside, and (2) in any event, the decree proceeded on an amendment which was subsequent in date to the arrestments at the instance of the claimants.

On 27th December 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the claimants H. Fischer & Company and others, and J. R. Andersen, pursuer did not do, but he founds on his arrestment as having been made good by reason of the amendment of the summons to which I have referred. But if, as I submit we must, we take as an amendment of the summons this correction of the error, without which the action could not have proceeded, and would have been dismissed, the section of the Court of Session Act applies. The section provides that no amendment of the summons shall have the effect of validating diligence used on the dependence of the action, so as to prejudice the rights of creditors interested in defeating such diligence, or, as I read it, no amendment of the summons shall have the effect of making a diligence used on the dependence of the action prior to the amendment of the summons good, so as to give the pursuer a preference over other creditors. I am therefore of opinion that the second branch of the fourth plea in law should be sustained.

We have also had an argument on the first branch of the plea that the decree in absence is irregular. Mr Aitken stated that if we decided against him on the second branch of the plea, that disposed of the case and rendered it unnecessary to pronounce a decision in the first branch. But as we have heard an argument on this matter I think it proper to express an opinion upon it. I am of opinion that the decree in absence is quite irregular. Defences to the action were given in, bearing to be by those who were called as defenders. On the back of the defences is the name of a practising agent, and the defences are signed by counsel. The action is therefore a defended action. No doubt it was open to the pursuer to say that the defences were lodged without the authority of the defenders. On this being stated it was explained that the authority was derived from a mercantile gentleman at Grangemouth, who was the owner of the ship to the extent of three-fourths or four-fifths, and that he had the authority of the other owners. An offer was made on his behalf to produce a mandate from these other owners if time was given him to get it sent from Denmark. I think it perfectly clear in the ordinary course of procedure that where the authority of the agent and counsel is disputed, or where the authority of the party defending an action on behalf of himself and others is disputed, time should be given so as to permit the production of a mandate. This was not done here. The Lord Ordinary proceeded to deal with the case as an undefended action, and gave decree in absence. Such a course is quite irregular, and ought not to have been followed.

In order to dispose of the case it would be sufficient to sustain the second branch of the fourth plea. But if your Lordships agree with what I have said on the first branch, what I suggest we should do is to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and sustain the whole of the fourth plea in law.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with Lord Young.

The soundness of the first branch of the fourth plea, viz., that the decree in absence was irregular, is made apparent by consideration of the pleadings. This decree is pronounced against a defender whose defences were lodged in process and have been considered. In such circumstances it appears to me that a decree in absence is entirely out of the question. And decree by default was also excluded, because no order on the defender was no common right of action. Douglas v. Tait, founded on by the Lord Ordinary, was not in point—the question there was between debtor and creditor, not between competing creditors. Further, the summons authorised arrestments at the instance of the whole pursuers, and the arrestments used were for behoof of the whole pursuers. Andersen could not therefore, merely by amending the summons, convert the arrestment into an arrestment for his individual behoof. The whole arrestment necessarily became inoperative as soon as the summons on which it proceeded had been altered. (2) The decree in the former action had been improperly pronounced as a decree in absence. The defences lodged were prima facie regular, and on Fischer's authority to act for the company being called in question the proper course would have been to pronounce an order requiring him to produce a mandate from the company within a time specified. It was not necessary to bring a reduction of that decree; it was competent to object to it by way of exception.[1]

Argued for Andersen;—(1) The decision of the Lord Ordinary was well founded. The former action was simply a congeries of five actions. It might be that judgment could not be obtained in such an action, but it was not an incompetent action, and there was no incompetency in four of the pursuers giving up the action and the conclusions applicable to them, and in the fifth proceeding with the action;[2] nor was the arrestment affected by such a procedure, which was not an amendment, but merely a restriction of the summons. (2) The decree in the former action was not irregular, but even if it was the Lord Ordinary was right in thinking that it must stand until reduced.

Lord Young.—This is a question dealing with the law of diligence, and it is quite true that all such questions must be dealt with strictly. The Lord Ordinary has held that Mr Andersen's arrestment being prior in date to the arrestment of his competitor he is entitled to prevail, and in order to reach that conclusion the Lord Ordinary has repelled the second branch of the fourth plea in law stated by the reclaimer.

Andersen's diligence was used on the dependence of a summons at the instance of five different pursuers for five distinct debts brought against the owners of a vessel called the "Molly." It occurred to those representing the pursuers that the action was incompetent as it stood, and that it would require correction before it could proceed. So a minute was put in, in which it was proposed to make this correction by striking out four of the pursuers and the four conclusions applicable to the debts of these pursuers, and to proceed with the case at the instance of one of the pursuers alone. Now, I am of opinion that this amendment—for I think that is the proper name for a correction of an error committed when the summons was framed—was competent. But I greatly doubt whether an arrestment can stand which has been used on the dependence of an action in its original incompetent form, although the action may have been subsequently amended so as to become competent. It would have occurred to me that the proper course would have been to use new arrestments on the dependence of the action after the summons had been amended. This, however, the shares getting that stock in the proportion of 90 per cent of their holdings. In this way the capital of the company would be reduced from £154,651 to £145,679, 18s. The company having by a majority of votes passed and confirmed a resolution to reduce the capital from £154,651 to £145,679, 18s. by cancelling the existing preferred stock and deferred shares, and issuing ordinary stock to the smaller amount, presented a petition for confirmation of the proposed reduction of capital.

Question, whether it was within the power of the company under the cover of a resolution to reduce capital to reconstruct the company on a basis essentially different from that on which it was constituted.

2D DIVISION.

THE CITY PROPERTY INVESTMENT TRUST CORPORATION, LIMITED, was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, on 9th January 1890.

By section 5 of the memorandum of association the capital of the company was declared to be £230,000, divided into 20,000 preferred shares of £10 each and 30,000 deferred or founders' shares of £1 each. The holders of preferred shares were declared to be entitled to a preferable dividend of £5 per cent per annum out of the profits of each year, and to preferable repayment of their capital in the event of a liquidation. Subject to these rights, the profits and assets of the company were declared to belong to the holders of deferred or founders' shares. It was further provided that the preferred shares, when fully paid up, should be converted by the directors into stock, and that the directors might, with the sanction of the shareholders, convert any paid-up shares into stock.*

* Among the objects of the company as defined by the memorandum of association (sec. 3) were the following:—

"(p) From time to time by special resolution to modify the conditions contained in the memorandum of association so as to increase the capital of the company by the issue of new shares of such amount as may be thought expedient, or to consolidate and divide the capital into shares of larger or of smaller amount than the amount hereby fixed, or to convert the paid-up shares into stock, or to reduce the capital to such an extent and in such manner as may by such resolution be determined. (q) From time to time to create and issue the shares of capital, original, increased, or reduced, or any part thereof, as ordinary, preferred, guaranteed, deferred, or founders' shares. (r) From time to time to convert or subdivide the shares of capital into shares of different nominal amount, and also from time to time to convert the shares of capital, or the stock of the company in the event of shares being converted into stock, or any part of such shares or stock, into shares or stock of one class and with like privileges, or of several classes and with different privileges, and of the same or different amounts, and respectively with any fixed, fluctuating, contingent, preferential, perpetual, terminable, deferred, or other dividend or interest, and as regards shares subject to calls, subject to the payment of calls of such amounts and at such times as the company from time to time thinks fit; and in the case of shares and stock, with such rights in the distribution of the assets of the company, and with a special or without any right of voting, and subject to such other conditions and restrictions as may by the company in general meeting be from time to time determined. . . ."

The articles of association contained, inter alia, the following provision: —"(10) The company may at any time reduce its capital and subdivide or consolidate its shares in any manner permitted by law, and, when requisite, the directors may apply for the sanction of the Court to any such reduction."

The articles of association further provided that each holder of shares

The leading business of the company was that of investment in heritable, and especially city, property, and it had also wide general powers of investment.

On the formation of the company there were issued of its authorised capital 12,988 preferred shares of £10 each, afterwards converted into £129,880 preferred stock, and 24,771 deferred or founders' shares of £1 each, fully paid, amounting together to £154,651. The remaining 7012 preferred and 5229 deferred shares were not issued.

On 9th July 1895 the company presented a petition for an order confirming a reduction of its capital. The petition contained the following statements:—"In pursuance of its objects the company acquired various heritable properties, and also conducted a general investment business. Certain losses have been made, and depreciation in value has taken place on the general investments of the company, estimated together at £10,500 or thereby. Each class of the capital of the company shews a considerable depreciation, judged by market quotations, amounting, in the case of the preferred stock, to £11,039 or thereby; and in the case of the deferred, to £12,385 or thereby.

"Hitherto any losses made by the company have been made good out of the profits of the year, but doubts have arisen whether this is in accordance with the articles of association, and in the working of the company it was found that questions arose in which preferred and deferred shareholders' interests came into conflict. The directors were satisfied that it would be of advantage to merge the whole interest of the shareholders in one stock.

"With this object the directors submitted for the approval of the shareholders a scheme for meeting the depreciation on the investments, and for merging the rights of the two classes of shareholders in one stock. Under this arrangement the capital of the company is reduced to the extent of £5 per £100 stock in the case of the preferred capital, and 2s. per share in the case of the deferred shares. The effect of this arrangement is to make the capital £145,679, 18s. instead of £154,651, thus cancelling capital to the extent of £8971, 2s. This reduced capital it is proposed to issue as consolidated ordinary stock, apportioned between the holders of preferred stock and deferred shares, in the proportion of 95 per cent of their present holdings to the former, and of 90 per cent of their present holdings to the latter.

"The resolution for effecting such reduction of capital and unification of the two classes of capital was duly passed at a meeting of the company held on 28th March 1895, and was confirmed as a special resolution at a meeting of the company held on 27th April 1895. In each case the resolution was passed by a majority largely exceeding three-fourths of each class of the shareholders present personally or by proxy. The said special resolution is as follows:—

"'The capital of the company shall be reduced from £154,651 to £145,679, 18s., and such reduction shall be effected by cancelling capital which has been lost or is not represented by available assets in manner following, that is to say,—The whole of the preferred stock amounting to £129,880, and the whole of the deferred shares, amounting to £24,771, which together amount to said sum of £154,651, shall be cancelled, and in lieu thereof there shall be created and issued ordinary stock to the amount of £145,679, 18s., and the same shall be apportioned amongst the holders of the preferred stock and deferred shares as follows:—(1) The holders of the present preferred stock shall receive of the ordinary stock 95 per cent of their present holding; and (2) the holders of the present deferred shares shall receive of the ordinary stock 90 per cent of their present holding.'

"The minute proposed to be registered is in the following terms:—

"'The capital of the City Property Investment Trust Corporation, Limited, is from henceforth £145,679, 18s. ordinary stock, instead of £129,880 preferred stock and 24,771 deferred shares of £1 each fully paid up.'"

The petitioners prayed the Court to confirm the reduction of capital effected by the special resolution passed on 28th March and confirmed on 27th April, and to approve of the minute quoted in the petition.

Answers were lodged by Mr M. G. Thorburn, Glenormiston, Innerleithen, who stated that he was a holder of £1500 preferred stock of the company, and of 113 deferred shares, and that he represented shareholders holding £11,200 preferred stock and 1731 deferred shares; and further, that he and several of the shareholders whom he represented had appeared at a meeting at which the special resolution was passed and voted against that resolution. He maintained that the prayer of the petition ought to be refused, on the grounds (1) that the proposed alteration in the status of the two classes of shareholders was incompetent; (2) that no sufficient reasons were averred or existed for such alteration, and that it was unfair to the deferred shareholders, who had looked forward to profit from the realisation of the heritable property of the company; (3) that with regard to the proposed reduction of capital, it had not been ascertained that the company had suffered any loss on capital account; that, on the contrary, there was a strong presumption that the company's heritable property had risen in value since its purchase by the company, the general increase in the value of heritable property in Glasgow, where the company's property was situated, having been from 10 to 15 per cent; and (4) that in any event the method adopted of writing down the capital was arbitrary and not founded on any intelligible principle.

On 22d August 1895 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Low) remitted to Mr Donald Mackenzie, W.S., to inquire and report as to the regularity of the proceedings, and the reasons for the proposed reduction of capital.

From Mr Mackenzie's report, it appeared, inter alia,—"In pursuance of its objects, the company has expended large sums in the purchase of heritable properties in Glasgow, and in particular, on its inception in 1890, it acquired the Blythswood Holm property, now known as the Central Chambers, at the price of £125,800, and has subsequently made great improvements thereon. In the last balance-sheet of the company, for the financial year ending on 31st January 1895, the heritable properties owned by the company taken at their cost and the amount expended thereon to date are entered at £170,450, 4s. 10d.

"The company has also, in exercise of its general powers of investment, . . . invested large sums in various securities. The total amount of these at the date of the last balance-sheet, as therein stated, was £78,311, 13s. 7d.

Answers were lodged by Mr M. G. Thorburn, Glenormiston, Innerleithen, who stated that he was a holder of £1500 preferred stock of the company, and of 113 deferred shares, and that he represented shareholders holding £11,200 preferred stock and 1731 deferred shares; and further, that he and several of the shareholders whom he represented had appeared at a meeting at which the special resolution was passed and voted against that resolution. On 22d August 1895 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Low) remitted to Mr Donald Mackenzie, W.S., to inquire and report as to the regularity of the proceedings, and the reasons for the proposed reduction of capital.

From Mr Mackenzie's report, it appeared, inter alia,—"In pursuance of its objects, the company has expended large sums in the purchase of heritable properties in Glasgow, and in particular, on its inception in 1890, it acquired the Blythswood Holm property, now known as the Central Chambers, at the price of £125,800, and has subsequently made great improvements thereon. Jan. 17, 1896. City Property Investment Trust Corporation, Limited, v. Thorburn.

"On only one occasion, viz., on the accounts for the year closing on 31st January 1892, has the preferred capital received its full dividend of 5 per cent. It has received dividends at the rate of 4 per cent in respect of the years closing on 31st January 1891, 1893, and 1894, and an interim dividend at that rate has been paid during the year closing on 31st January 1895. No dividend has ever been paid on the deferred shares."

It further appeared from Mr Mackenzie's report that the chairman of the company had prepared two statements shewing the valuation of the company's general investments, not including heritable property, as at 31st January 1895 and 1st November 1895 respectively, and the report further stated that the respondent adopted these valuations for the purposes of the present application. The statement for 31st January 1895 brought out a depreciation on the company's general investments of £10,533, 0s. 6d. in all; while the statement for 1st November 1895 shewed that the depreciation had fallen to £8113, 12s. 6d., being less than the amount of the proposed reduction.

There was no evidence, in the report or otherwise, to shew that the company's heritable properties had fallen in value, or that they had not increased in value as averred by the respondent.

Argued for the petitioners;—The question whether or not there had been a loss on a company's capital was a question which it was for the company to determine, and not for the Court. If the company were satisfied that there had been in fact a loss necessitating a reduction of capital, the Court would approve of a resolution to reduce the capital, provided that the resolution was not prejudicial to the creditors of the company, or to the shareholders, or classes of shareholders. In the present case it was not suggested that the creditors of the company had any interest to oppose the reduction of the capital; but with respect to the shareholders it was said that the reduction was carried out in an incompetent, or at least in an unfair manner. The incompetency was said to consist in this, that under the cover of a resolution to reduce capital a fundamental alteration in the status and rights of the different classes of shareholders was effected. But section 3, subsections (p), (q), and (r) of the memorandum of association, read in conjunction with article 10 of the articles of association, contemplated just such a change as that now proposed. It was these provisions which distinguished the present case from the cases founded on by the respondent, in which there were no similar provisions. If then the shares had been issued subject to the condition that a change like the present might be carried out, it would require a very clear case of unfairness to entitle the Court to interfere when it was proposed to carry out the change. There was, however, no unfairness. Each class of shareholders gave up something—the preferred shareholders their preferences and the deferred shareholders their preponderant voting power, and their right to the surplus assets and profits—in order to effect a unification of the capital—a change which a majority of shareholders of both classes thought to be of advantage to the company. If the proposed reduction of capital was in itself reasonable, there was no statutory objection to the manner in which it was proposed to effect it.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—It had not been shewn that the capital of the company had suffered any loss—permanent loss that was to say. Upon the general investments of the company there might be a small depreciation, but there was nothing to shew that this depreciation was permanent; while as regarded the heritable properties of the company, it was not suggested that they had depreciated; the respondent maintained, on the contrary, that they had appreciated. The petition ought therefore to be refused on that ground. But assuming that a reduction of capital was necessary, the loss ought not to be thrown on the preferred shareholders, who under the memorandum of association had a preference with respect not only to the income, but also to the capital of the company. Further, it was incompetent to carry out the reduction in the way proposed, by completely altering the status of the shareholders. Such a change was ultra vires of a company, whatever the powers in its memorandum of association might be,[1] and in any case the powers in the memorandum here did not justify so extensive a change. Such a change could be brought about only by the liquidation and reconstruction of the company, giving shareholders who objected the right to have their shares repaid out of the assets of the company.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—I have the greatest doubt whether it was within the competency of the petitioners to pass the resolution of which they ask our approval. It seems to me that under the disguise of a reduction of capital the pursuers are seeking to reconstruct their company on a basis essentially different from that on which it was constituted. The resolution before us infringes the rights alike of the preference and the deferred shareholders, and I am not surprised that it has met with opposition from both classes of shareholders. It is enough, however, for the decision of the question now before us, to say that the petitioners have entirely failed to satisfy me that any capital has been lost, or that there is any good reason for sanctioning at present a reduction of that capital, and therefore I am for refusing the petition.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT refused the petition.

Church—Burgh—Minister—Stipend.—In 1809 the magistrates and town-council of a burgh and certain of the proprietors of a chapel of ease in the burgh, brought a summons in the Court of Teinds, concluding for the disjunction of certain portions of an existing parish, partly burghal and partly landward, the erection of these disjoined portions into a new parish under the proviso that the landward portion should be annexed quoad sacra only, and concluding further for declarator that the magistrates should be bound to provide the minister of the new parish in a "competent stipend."

In this action the Court pronounced an interlocutor, by which they decerned, "in the disjunction, erection, and annexation quoad sacra as libelled, on the magistrates . . . engaging to be answerable for a stipend of £200 per annum."

The magistrates thereupon by an act of council undertook to be answerable for a stipend of "not less than £200 per annum."

In 1895 the minister of the parish brought an action for declarator that the magistrates were bound to provide him in a competent stipend suited to the circumstances of the time and the position of the benefice, and for decree for payment of £400 a-year as such stipend, contending that the words "as libelled" applied, inter alia, to the conclusion for declarator that the magistrates should be bound to provide the minister "in a competent stipend."

The Court (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) assoilzied the defenders, holding that the Court of Teinds had decerned "as libelled" only in regard to the conclusions for disjunction, erection, and annexation quoad sacra, and that the magistrates were liable for a stipend of £200 a-year only.

Peters v. Magistrates of Greenock, 19 R. 643, aff. 20 R. (H. L.) 42, distinguished.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

IN June 1895 the Reverend Thomas Reid Thomson, minister of the East Church and Parish of Greenock, with consent of the Presbytery of Greenock, raised an action against the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Greenock, concluding for declarator "that the pursuer, as the minister serving the cure of the East Church and Parish of Greenock and district thereof, within the burgh of Greenock, was and is entitled to be furnished and provided by the defenders, and that the defenders were and are bound to furnish and provide the pursuer, with a competent stipend, suited to the circumstances of the time, and the position and duties of the benefice, to be paid out of the revenue of the burgh, or out of the other funds, property, and revenues held and enjoyed by the said Magistrates and Town-Council for the special use and behoof of the minister serving the cure of the said church, parish, and district, from the date of his ordination and induction to the said cure, and in all time coming, during his lifetime and serving the said cure." Then followed a conclusion for decree ordaining the defenders to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £400 per annum as a competent stipend for the period from Whitsunday 1893, or of such other sum, less or more, as should in the circumstances appear to the Court a competent stipend.

The pursuer set forth the proceedings and decree in a process of disjunction and erection in the Teind Court after mentioned, and pleaded, inter alia;—(1) According to the terms and meaning of the conclusions of the summons of disjunction and erection of the East Church and Parish of Greenock, the decree pronounced in the process following thereon, the extract of said decree, and the usage and prescriptive use and enjoyment following thereon, the defenders, as representing the community of the burgh of Greenock, are liable in payment of a competent stipend to the pursuer, as minister of the said church and parish; and decree should accordingly be pronounced in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the present action.

The Magistrates and Town-Council lodged defences, in which they pleaded, inter alia;—(2) On a sound construction of the proceedings and decree of the Teind Court, the defenders are not bound to furnish the pursuer with a stipend exceeding £200 (with Communion elements). (3) The decree pronounced by the Teind Court not being a decree to furnish the pursuer with a competent and legal stipend, but a decree for a fixed sum of £200, the action cannot be maintained.

The procedure connected with the disjunction and erection of the parish, upon which alone the question raised by the declaratory conclusion of the summons came to turn, was to the following effect:—

In 1809 the Magistrates and Town-Council of Greenock and the members of a committee of managers appointed by the proprietors of the East Chapel of Ease of Greenock brought a summons against the heritors and minister of the Old Parish of Greenock and the Officers of State for disjunction and erection of a new church and parish, to be called the East Church and Parish of Greenock.

Prior to the raising of this action a resolution had been passed at a meeting of the Magistrates and Town-Council of Greenock on 30th January 1809, which bore that the magistrates "agree to execute, as representing the town, the necessary bond for the payment of such stipend as the Commissioners for Plantation of Kirks may fix upon, not exceeding £150, and the usual allowance for Communion elements, and on the conveyance and renunciation above mentioned being procured [i.e., a conveyance of the chapel by the proprietors thereof, and a renunciation of all claim to patronage by Sir John Shaw Stewart and others], authorise the clerk to prepare the requisite bond." A bond for £150 embodying this obligation was lodged in the teind process.

The summons, which narrated the resolution of the Magistrates and Town-Council, but with the omission (or erasure) of the words "not exceeding £150," concluded for the disjunction of certain portions of the Old or West Parish of Greenock, and the erection of the same into a new parish, to be called the East Church and Parish of Greenock, and for declarator "that the Magistrates and Town-Council of Greenock for the time being, and a committee of seven to be named by and from the proprietors of seats reserved in the said chapel, shall in all time coming have the sole and undoubted right of patronage of the said church, and the right of presentation and calling a minister to serve the cure thereat, and as oft in time coming as any vacance shall happen, and of modelling and disposing of the said church and haill seats thereof and bounds within the same, under the exceptions before and after mentioned, and of setting the said seats, and uplifting the rents thereof, and of naming and appointing the beadles," &c. "from time to time as they shall think fit, and of disposing during any vacancy of the fund which shall be provided by them for a stipend to their minister, or for Communion elements, manse, or schoolhouse." Then followed an exemption of the patron and heritors of the old parish from liability for stipend, &c. to the new parish, the reservation of certain existing rights, and a proviso that "the landward part of the said new parish,—that is, the lands and others before described included therein, not forming parts of the said towns of Greenock and Crawfordsdyke,—shall only be held as annexed quoad sacra, and not quoad civilia." The summons further contained this conclusion,—"And in order that the said church may be kept in repair and the minister supplied with a proper stipend, it ought to be found and declared by decreet foresaid that the said Magistrates and Council of the said burgh and barony of Greenock, and their successors in office, and the corporation and community of the said town, shall be bound and obliged in all time coming, not only to keep in repair the said church and rebuild the same when necessary, and to relieve the heritors of all claims on this account, or at the instance of the minister thereof for a manse or glebe, and of the expense of a schoolhouse, school salary, and other parochial burdens, but also to provide the minister of the said church in a competent stipend, with a sufficient sum for furnishing Communion elements, payable at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, with interest of each term's payment from the time the same falls due and until payment."

On 8th March 1809 the Court of Teinds pronounced the following interlocutor:—"M'Cormick and Connell for the pursuers repeated the libel, and craved the Lords would decern conform to the conclusions thereof—Alt. absent.—The Lords having advised the libel and writings produced, and heard the procurators for the pursuers thereupon, they decern in the disjunction, erection, and annexation quoad sacra as libelled, on the Magistrates and Council of Greenock engaging to be answerable for a stipend of £200 sterling per annum, besides Communion elements, and appoint them to lodge in process a minute of Council binding themselves in the above terms, and decern, and remit to Lord Robertson to examine the said minute when lodged, and to approve thereof before extract."

The Magistrates and Town-Council thereupon, on 10th March, adopted a minute in the following terms:—"At Greenock, the 10th day of March 1809 years.—The Magistrates and Town-Council of Greenock being duly convened in council, it was stated that decree had been pronounced as libelled in the summons of disjunction and erection referred to in the former minutes of Council, on the Magistrates and Council engaging to be answerable for a stipend of not less than £200 sterling per annum besides Communion elements, and lodging in process a minute of Council binding themselves in the above terms; and the Magistrates and Council being now willing to be answerable for such stipend, they bind and oblige them and their successors in office, and the funds of the community, for payment of such stipend accordingly, besides Communion elements, and authorise the clerk to give out an extract of this minute to be lodged in process."

On 11th March 1809 Lord Robertson, by docquet written upon an extract of this act of Council approved thereof, and thereafter the decree of disjunction and erection was extracted.

The extract decreet bore, inter alia, that the Lords of Session as Commissioners for Plantation of Kirks "have found and declared, and hereby find and declare, that the said Magistrates and Council of the said burgh of barony of Greenock, and their successors in office, and the Corporation and community of the said town, shall be bound and obliged in all time coming, not only to keep in repair the said church, and rebuild the same when necessary . . . but also to provide the minister of the said church in a competent stipend, with a sufficient sum for furnishing Communion elements, payable at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, with interest of such term's payment from the time the same falls due until payment; and declaring that the minister of the said new erected parish shall not be entitled in any time to come to insist for a manse or glebe; and have found, and hereby find, the Magistrates and Council of Greenock answerable for a stipend to the minister of the said new erected parish of two hundred pounds sterling per annum, besides Communion elements, and that conform to their bond and obligation, dated the tenth day of March one thousand eight hundred and nine years, lodged in process," i.e., the minute of Council last above mentioned.

* "OPINION.—The question here raised is said to be similar to that lately decided in the case of Peters v. The Magistrates of Greenock, 19 R. 643; and certainly, as in that case, the controversy relates to the stipend of one of the parish churches of Greenock—churches which were erected during the last and present century, on the foundation of former chapels of ease. As in that case also, the decision depends on the construction of what was in effect a judicial contract, embodied in a decreet of disjunction and erection pronounced by the Court of Teinds.

"The terms, however, of the decreet of the Court of Teinds (which in this case was obtained in the year 1809), and the tenour of the other documents which have to be construed, differ, I think, not immaterially from those which the Court had to construe in the case of Peters; and the question I have now to decide is, whether, giving due effect to those differences, I can here pronounce a similar judgment, viz., a judgment to the effect (as claimed by the pursuer) that the defenders, the Magistrates of Greenock, are bound—without prejudice to a bond for £200 per annum, which they granted at the time of the erection, and to which the decreet refers—to provide the pursuer and his successors with a competent and legal stipend suitable to the circumstances of the time and the position and duties of the benefice.

"Now, there is no doubt that up to a certain point the terms of the obligation for stipend, in this case undertaken by or imposed upon the magistrates, bear a considerable resemblance to the terms of the obligation which the Court had to construe in the case of Peters, and also in the older case of Cæsar v. The Magistrates of Dundee, 20 D. 859, to which the judgment in the case of Peters refers. In the Dundee case the magistrates were taken bound to provide to the minister 'a competent and legal stipend not under the sum of £1000 Scots money yearly.' In Peters' case the obligation was to provide the minister with 'a competent and legal stipend not under 950 merks, with 50 merks for Communion elements.' In the present case, the decreet, following the terms of the summons, finds and declares that the Magistrates and Town-council 'shall, inter alia, be bound and obliged, in all time coming, to provide the minister of the said church in a competent stipend, with a sufficient sum for furnishing Communion elements.' Up to this point there is certainly a close resemblance between the several obligations.

"In the present case, however, the decreet (that is to say, the extract decreet) goes on to add to the above general declaration a special finding in the following terms:—'And [the Commissioners foresaid] have found, and hereby find, the Magistrates and Council of Greenock answerable for a stipend to the minister of the said new erected parish of £200 sterling per annum, besides Communion elements, and that conform to their bond and obligation, dated 10th March 1809, lodged in process.'

"This makes it necessary to look a little more closely into the proceedings the effect of which the extract decreet purports to set forth. These proceedings are narrated in the decreet itself; and the interlocutors and documents to which the decreet refers are to be found in the process, which has been transmitted from the Register House, and to which both parties appeal.

"Now, it is, I think, clear to begin with, that what was contemplated by the several bodies and persons interested, before they came into Court, was not an obligation for stipend the extent of which was to vary from time to time, but an obligation the extent of which was to be fixed once for all by the Court. That appears from the documents narrated in the decreet, and indeed from the narrative part of the summons. The agreement of the

The pursuer reclaimed.

At the hearing in the Inner-House both parties treated the extract decree as open to construction by reference to the interlocutor of 8th March 1809, the pursuer contending that the extract was unauthorised, if and in so far as it restricted the obligation of the Magistrates to payment of a stipend of £200 a year, and the defenders contending that it was unauthorised in so far as it found the Magistrates liable in payment of a "competent" stipend, i.e., a stipend varying with the circumstances of the time. Neither party moved that the cause should be sisted in order to bring a reduction of the extract decree.

The pursuer argued;—The interlocutor of the Court of Teinds of 8th March 1809 decerned "as libelled," and looking to the conclusions of the summons that imported a decerniture for a competent stipend, and so brought the case within that of Peters.[1] The obliga-

Magistrates was, as expressed in their minute of 30th January 1809, 'to pay such stipend as the Commissioners for Plantation of Kirks may fix upon, not exceeding £150 a year, with the usual allowance for Communion elements.' And a bond for £150 a year was in fact prepared and lodged in process prior to the first calling of the cause.

"It is therefore clear enough what was at least contemplated. In the summons, however, the Magistrates' agreement is narrated with the omission of the words 'not exceeding £150'—at least these words appear to have been erased—and the conclusion of the summons, as I have already said, is for declarator simply that the Magistrates shall be bound to provide 'a competent stipend'—the amount being left indefinite, and nothing being at least expressed as to its fixture by the Court. If therefore the Court had decerned simpliciter in terms of the conclusion thus expressed, I do not at present see that there could have been much doubt.

"But the interlocutor of Court was in fact as follows:—[His Lordship quoted the interlocutor]. In other words, the Court did not decern simpliciter, but subject to a condition or qualification, the exact effect of which is, as it seems to me, the point on which the case turns. The pursuer says that the Court's requirement of a bond or minute for £200 was a superadded condition, not derogating from the Magistrates' general obligation to pay a competent stipend, but fixing a minimum, and defining the obligation for the immediate future.

"The defenders, on the other hand, say that the adjected clause operated as a qualification of the decreet, and was intended as a definition of the obligation which the Court had been asked to declare indefinitely.

"There is, I am bound to admit, much to say for both of these views. The pursuer's construction is perhaps more in accordance with the practice of the Court of Teinds, which is accustomed to fix stipends subject to augmentation from time to time. On the other hand, the defenders' view is, I think, more in accordance with the natural construction of the writings, and is certainly more in accordance with what we may gather, from the course of the process and the writs produced, to have been the true intent and contemplation of parties. What I have to do is to endeavour to balance these considerations as best I may. In doing so, I have hesitated a good deal, and am not confident that I have reached the right conclusion. On the whole, however, I have come to prefer the defenders' construction of the writings, which constitute or express the judicial contract, and accordingly my judgment must be in the defenders' favour. I propose to pronounce an interlocutor sustaining the defences and assoilzieing the defenders from the conclusions of the summons."

tion of the Magistrates to pay £200 a year was thus collateral merely, and did not derogate from the general obligation to provide a competent stipend. If the interlocutor was ambiguous it was competent to construe it by reference to the terms of the Magistrates' minute of 10th March, by which they came under an obligation to provide a stipend of "not less than" £200. Lord Robertson approved of that, and this obligation was embodied in the extract decree. The presumption was that these later documents correctly expressed what the parties and the Court meant. It was to be remembered that the decree was a decree in absence at the instance of the Magistrates themselves. It was to be assumed, therefore, that the extract decree correctly expressed what they wanted; and the extract decree, on a sound construction, imported a general obligation on the Magistrates to provide the minister in a competent stipend, the amount varying with the circumstances of the time, and a particular obligation, applicable to the circumstances as then existing, to provide him in a stipend of £200 a year. The Magistrates' minute of 10th March shewed plainly that that was what they thought, and there was nothing to the contrary. The case was indistinguishable from Peters' [1] case and the subsequent case of Newton-on-Ayr.[2]

Argued for the defenders;—The case of Peters decided that a decree of the Court of Teinds erecting a new parish in a burgh might embody a judicial contract under which the magistrates of the burgh became bound to provide a reasonable stipend to the minister; and the judgment in that case proceeded on this governing consideration, that the Court of Teinds would not create a new parish without being satisfied that there was a sufficient endowment of it. The endowment was not to depend on the uncertain will of others, nor could it be held to consist of a trifling provision, such as 950 merks. There must be a better security and a larger endowment. Hence the Court held in Peters' case that the sum mentioned in the decree in that case was not the measure of the magistrates' obligation for all time coming. If, however, the sum mentioned in the decree was one which could be regarded as a reasonable endowment, that sum, prima facie, was the limit of the magistrates' obligation. Coming now to the decree in the present case, it was in marked contrast to that in Peters' case. In Peters' case there was an operative decree for "a competent and legal stipend," here there was no such operative decree. If, indeed, the decree here had simply decerned "as libelled," and then proceeded to set forth the obligation of the Magistrates, it might have been difficult to say that the principle of Peters' case did not apply, for the summons undoubtedly concluded for declarator that the Magistrates should be bound to provide "a competent stipend." The decree, however, was studiously expressed so as to avoid giving decree in terms of that conclusion. It decerned "in the disjunction, erection, and annexation quoad sacra as libelled," but with respect to the stipend all that the decree did was to make it a condition of granting decree of disjunction, erection, and annexation, that the Magistrates should become bound to pay a stipend of £200. In short, this was an example of a class of cases of which there were everyday instances in the recent practice of the Court of Teinds, and of which the Kil- marnock[1] case was an earlier example, in which the Court fixed the amount of the endowment once and for all; Peters'[2] case, on the other hand, and the Dundee[3] and Newton-on-Ayr[4] cases, were examples of the other class of cases, in which the Court did not fix the amount but merely satisfied themselves that there was a sufficient security for a proper endowment, leaving the amount to be determined and varied according to circumstances. Such being the unambiguous construction of the interlocutor of the Court, it was incompetent to modify that construction either by reference to the minute which the Magistrates and Town-Council subsequently adopted, or by reference to the terms of the extract decree.

LORD TRAYNER.—The case of Peters[2] referred to by the Lord Ordinary presents, in its general features, considerable similarity to the case now before us. But as the judgment in that case proceeded upon the view which the Court took of the construction and import of the judicial contract there in question, it does and can form no necessary precedent for the decision of the present case. Of course, if the contract there construed and the contract in this case were the same, the judgment would be repeated. The defenders however, contend that this is not so, and say that the contracts are materially different. The Lord Ordinary has given effect to the defenders' contention, although, as he says, with hesitation. I have come to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary, and without the hesitation he has felt and expressed. In reaching the opinion which I have formed, I have not, however, taken into account, as the Lord Ordinary has done, any writings or other evidence of a date anterior to the contract itself, tending to shew what the parties intended by their contract. That course may legitimately be resorted to to throw light upon a contract which is ambiguous, but I do not think this contract is of that character. I think it is explicit enough, and that the rights and obligations thence arising must be determined on the contract as expressed, the contract itself being taken as the final expression of the intention of the parties to it.

The contract or obligation now to be considered is contained in the interlocutor of the Court dated 8th March 1809, whereby the Court decerned "in the disjunction, erection, and annexation quoad sacra as libelled, on the Magistrates and Council of Greenock engaging to be answerable for a stipend of £200 sterling per annum, besides Communion elements," and appointed them to lodge in process "a minute of council binding themselves in the above terms." Now, it does not appear to me to be open to any doubt that the decree I have just quoted was pronounced on the condition that the defenders should undertake liability for "a stipend of £200 sterling per annum, besides Communion elements," and nothing more. In Peters'[2] case it was different. The condition of the decree and the obligation undertaken by the defenders there was to provide a legal and competent stipend, not less than a certain fixed sum. What was or might be a legal and competent stipend depended largely on circumstances as they might emerge; but a legal and competent stipend, whatever that might come to be, was the extent of the obligation undertaken. Here, the amount of the obligation is fixed once for all. I do not understand that the pursuer objects to this view, if there was no other consideration in the case. But he thinks he can assimilate this case to Peters'[1] case in respect of two circumstances, to which I shall now advert. The first of these is, that the interlocutor of the Court in which the obligation is expressed, "decerns in the disjunction, erection, and annexation quoad sacra as libelled." These last words, according to the pursuer's contention, import into the interlocutor the conclusions of the summons, and among these conclusions there is one that the defenders should be bound and obliged "to provide the minister of the said church in a competent stipend," &c. But that conclusion is not one of those for which decree was given. The decree of disjunction, erection, and annexation "as libelled" does not cover the conclusion as to stipend at all. The decerniture as libelled only applied to the conclusions (1) that certain lands should be disjoined from an existing parish; (2) that these lands should be erected into a new parish; and (3) that the disjoined lands should be annexed quoad sacra to the new parish. Decree as libelled was certainly pronounced so far as these conclusions went, but no further. With reference to the conclusion as to stipend, quite separate from the three I have alluded to, no decree was pronounced by the interlocutor of 8th March 1809. If there had been—if, as the pursuer says, there was then pronounced a decree against the defenders for payment of a competent stipend—it would have been superfluous to stipulate, as the interlocutor does, that the interlocutor erecting the new parish should only become operative on the defenders engaging to be answerable for a fixed stipend of £200 per annum. But, as I have said, the words "as libelled" have only reference to the conclusions of the summons relative to disjunction, erection, and annexation. The interlocutor is so limited in distinct terms. The Lords "decern in the disjunction, erection, and annexation quoad sacra as libelled"—they decern as libelled in nothing else.

The second matter on which the pursuer specially relies is this, that in the minute of council lodged by the defenders in compliance with the order contained in the interlocutor above quoted, the defenders undertook to be "answerable for a stipend of not less than £200 sterling per annum," &c. This, he says, shews that the stipend for which the defenders became answerable was a competent stipend, and not less than £200 a year. I think this is not an admissible reading of the defenders' undertaking. The words "not less" were certainly unnecessary as matter of compliance with the order of Court, and I think the undertaking should be read in connection with the order in obedience to which it was lodged. The defenders were only ordered to lodge a minute in which they undertook to be answerable for £200 a year. That they undertook to be answerable for not less than £200 a year cannot in any reason be read as an undertaking that they undertook to be liable for more. The words "not less" had a different signification in the case of Peters,[1] but they were there used in a very different connection.

I think the pursuer has failed to shew that the defenders are liable to him in any stipend beyond £200 a year, and that therefore the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary assoilzieing the defenders should be adhered to.

Bill of Exchange—Proof—Parole—Competency—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61), sec. 100.—In defence to an action for the amount due under a promissory-note, the debtor stated that, under an arrangement between him and the creditor, the promissory-note was to be renewed when due, and from time to time thereafter until he should be in a position to repay it without detriment to his business engagements, and that he had been assured by the creditor that the date of repayment would be left to himself so long as interest was paid.

The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney) held that the defender was not entitled to a proof of his averment, on the ground that if the agreement meant that the defender was not bound to pay the principal sum, but an annuity, it contradicted the written obligation; and that if the agreement meant a promise by the creditor not to press for payment, the agreement not being in writing, it was not binding on his executors.

Opinion reserved whether it would be open to an obligant to prove a verbal agreement that a bill should be renewable for a definite time, or that the debt should subsist for a definite time, the bill being treated as a mere security for its ultimate payment.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

THOMAS GIBSON, of Bainfield, lent a sum of £200 to William Harry Galloway, Leith, for which Galloway granted a promissory-note. The promissory-note was renewed from time to time, the last renewal being granted on 1st June 1894 by a promissory-note payable three months after date.

Thomas Gibson died on 1st October 1894, and thereafter his testamentary trustees brought an action against Galloway for payment of £200, with interest from 1st September 1894.

The pursuers produced and founded on the promissory-note of 1st June 1894.

The defender (answer 2) admitted that he had received the advance of £200, and granted his promissory-note therefor, but explained "that under an arrangement between the defender and the said deceased, made on 1st June 1894, the said loan was to bear interest at the rate of five per cent per annum, and the said promissory-note was to be renewed when due, and from time to time thereafter, until the defender should be in a position to repay same without detriment to his business engagements. The defender was assured by the deceased that the date of repayment would be left to himself so long as interest was paid, and Mr Gibson further undertook that this arrangement would subsist even after his death. The defender has understood, since this arrangement was come to, that the contract could be terminated only on his initiative."

Gibson's Trustees v. Galloway.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) No relevant defence.

On 27th November 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) allowed a proof.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The defence was irrelevant. It was an attempt on the part of the defender to negative his liability under the promissory-note by evidence of a parole agreement. In allowing proof the Lord Ordinary had proceeded on section 100 of the Bills of Exchange Act, but that section did not entitle an obligant in a bill to make any such defence.[1] Further, section 16 of the same Act provided a perfectly convenient way for attaining the purpose which the parties were alleged by the defender to have had in view, by the insertion in the note of some qualification of the obligant's liability.

Argued for the defender;—The defence was not a denial, but only a qualification of the defender's liability under the note, and was admissible to proof under section 100.*

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an action by testamentary trustees on a promissory-note for £200 granted by the defender to the truster, which, according to its terms, is payable three months after date. The defence is contained in the answer to the second article of the condescendence, in which the defender admits the advance of £200, and states:—(His Lordship read the answer quoted above). It is not easy to reduce this statement to a definite proposition, and the difficulty is probably due to the inherent indefiniteness of the arrangement described rather than to any want of care or precision on the part of the defender's legal advisers. It appears to me that the statement can have only two meanings; either it means that the defender was not liable in payment of the principal sum in the bill, but was only to pay an annuity to his creditor equal to the interest on that sum, or it means that Mr Gibson, having made this advance as a favour to the defender, represented to him that he should not press him for payment at the end of the three months, but would expect the defender to pay interest on the loan.

On the first hypothesis, I think that the defence is irrelevant, because it is contradictory of the defender's written obligation, and it is an established rule of pleading that a party cannot avoid his written obligation by merely averring and offering to prove that it was not binding on him. The second alternative amounts to this, that Mr Gibson was willing to give his debtor indulgence. But such an arrangement not reduced to writing, and especially where it is wholly indefinite as to time, is not binding on executors, whose duty is to ingather the estate which they are administering with the least possible delay.

To say that the arrangement was to bind the executors, and that the loan could only be terminated on the defender's initiative, is just another way of saying that the defender was not legally compellable to pay his bill, and for the reason stated I think that this is an inadmissible defence.

Jan. 22, 1896. Gibson's Trustees v. Galloway.

I do not think it is necessary to consider the provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act as to the admissibility of parole evidence to prove facts relevant to the defender's liability.

The question may hereafter arise whether it would be open to an obligant to prove a verbal agreement that a bill should be renewable for a definite time, or that the debt should subsist for a definite time, the bill being treated as a mere security for its ultimate payment. I offer no opinion on the competency of proving such an agreement qualifying the obligation on the bill. But, on the most liberal reading of the enactment, it cannot be held to authorise the admission of proof to set aside the bill altogether, which, as I think, is the effect of this defence. I am accordingly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, that the defence should be repelled, and that decree should be granted in favour of the pursuers for the principal sum and interest at the rate of 5 per cent.

LORD ADAM, LORD KINNEAR, and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, repelled the defences, and decerned in favour of the pursuer for payment of £200, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent from 1st September 1894.

2D DIVISION.

JAMES STEWART, of Clydebank, Greenock, died on 11th November 1837, leaving two testamentary deeds, the first dated 19th July 1827, and the second dated 2d June 1830. By the first deed he left his whole estate to trustees. The deed provided,—"In the fifth place, after setting aside such a sum of money as will secure the payment of the foresaid annuity to my wife, I hereby direct and appoint my said trustees to redispone, convey, and make over to the issue of my present marriage the whole of my means and estate, heritable and moveable, in the event of there being only one child of the said marriage; but in the event of there being more than one, then to the said children, equally among them, share and share alike; and in either case, I appoint the said conveyance to be made at the periods, and subject to the conditions following, namely, if a son or sons, upon his or their attaining the age of twenty-five years complete, but not sooner, a reasonable yearly allowance being made to him or them by my said trustees for their education and support, from the time of my death, or after they shall have attained the age of ten years, until they shall have arrived at the age of twenty-five years,—and if a daughter or daughters, upon her or their severally attaining majority; but my said trustees are in this last case hereby directed and required to reinvest the share or shares of my estate, heritable or moveable, coming to her or them, on such security as they shall see proper, taking the conveyances or securities thereof in favour of my said daughter or daughters in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and to the child or children to be lawfully procreated of her or their bodies in fee, an allowance being also to be made by the said trustees for their support similar to the above, until they shall have attained majority as aforesaid. . . ."

By the supplementary deed the testator provided,—"In the third place, I hereby appoint and direct my said trustees, upon my daughters attaining majority or being married, or upon my sons attaining the full age of twenty-five years, to denude themselves of their my said daughters' and sons' respective portions of my estate, in terms of the fifth proviso of the said deed of settlement; and in the event of any of my said children dying without lawful heirs of their own bodies, I direct and appoint the share or shares of the deceaser or deceasers to be equally divided among, or invested in the name and for the behoof of the survivors or survivor, share and share alike, in terms of the said deed of settlement. . . ."

The testator was survived by eight children. Of these, three died in minority prior to the periods of division, and it was held (13 D. 1386), that their shares had not vested in them. The following five children survived that date, viz., James Stewart of Blackhouse; Captain Daniel Shaw Stewart; Miss Helen Love Stewart; Miss Margaret Stewart; and Mrs Mary Stewart or Kennedy, wife of the said Robert Alexander Kennedy. In 1849 certain questions having arisen as to the division of the trust-estate, an action of multiplepoinding was brought by the trustees in the Court of Session. One of the questions then decided was that in investing in terms of Mr Stewart's deeds of settlement the shares provided to his daughters, no substitution could competently be added to the truster's directions to invest said sums in favour of his daughters "in liferent for their liferent use allenarly and to the child or children to be lawfully procreated of their bodies in fee."—(14 D. 298.)

nominated trustees, to whom her father's trustees conveyed her share for her behoof in liferent for her liferent use allenarly, and the child or children to be lawfully procreated of her body in fee.

Miss Helen Love Stewart died unmarried on 17th June 1895, leaving a will, dated 10th June 1895, by which she appointed William Norman Stewart and others trustees, and directed them to divide among her surviving nephews and nieces her whole estate, including her share of her father's estate.

The trustees under the trust-deed granted by Miss Stewart in 1852 refused to pay over the trust funds without judicial authority.

This special case was accordingly presented, in order to ascertain whether Miss Stewart had power to dispose by will of her share of her father's estate. There were nine parties, of whom the first were the trustees of Miss H. L. Stewart under her trust-deed of 16th December 1852. The second was Miss Margaret Stewart, the last surviving child of the testator. The third, fourth, and seventh parties represented brothers and sisters of Miss H. L. Stewart, and the fifth parties were the trustees under Miss H. L. Stewart's will of June 1895.

The fifth parties maintained that the testator gave an absolute gift of a share of his estate to each of his children, which vested in each of them respectively, not later than the period of division of the estate, that the destination in favour of a child's children was a mere burden on the fee which flew off upon her death without leaving issue, that, in any view, Miss Helen Love Stewart having survived the period of division, to which alone the destination to children's children was referable, was entitled to dispose of the fee of her share, and that the said fee was therefore validly conveyed by her to the fifth parties to be administered by them in terms of the said trust-deed in their favour.

The third and fourth parties maintained that the testator made no absolute gift of a share of his estate to each of his daughters in fee, but that their right in such shares was confined to a mere liferent; that Miss Helen Love Stewart had no power to dispose of the share of her father's estate liferented by her; that the said share, upon Miss Helen Love Stewart's death, fell into intestacy of the testator, and must be divided among his next of kin as at the date of his death.

The first question was,—"Had Miss Helen Love Stewart power to dispose by will of the share of her father's trust-estate bequeathed to her by his trust-disposition and settlement?"

Argued for the fifth parties;—There was conferred on Helen an absolute gift in the event, which happened, of her dying without issue.[1] A contrast was presented by the case of Muir's Trustees,[2] where the terms of the deed were very clearly those of a gift, qualified by such restrictions as to exclude vesting. The case of Fulton's Trustees[3] appeared hostile, but it was overruled by Lindsay's Trustees.[1] This also appeared from Lord Lee's opinion in Dalglish's Trustees.[1]

Argued for the third, fourth, and seventh parties;—There was no valid disposition of the fee of the share to Helen. It was limited to a liferent, and at her death this share became the intestate succession of her father. They did not need to question the authority of the cases cited, for it was clearly settled that a fee was only recognised when there was a conveyance of the fee to the beneficiary first of all. So in the cases of Lindsay,[1] Dalglish,[2] and Logan[3] there were absolute gifts, subsequently modified by some provisions which did not take effect. Besides, in these cases, there was present the feature of repugnancy, which did not occur here. The case of Muir's Trustees[4] was applicable to this case, for the only right given to his daughters by the testator was a liferent. Fulton's Trustees[5] should be followed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If this question were open there would be great room for argument on both sides, but I have no doubt that it is already decided by the case of Lindsay's Trustees,[1] and the other cases following it which have been cited. I think therefore that we should answer the first question in the affirmative.

LORD YOUNG.—I think so too. The question in the case of Lindsay[1] and following cases was one which was at that time reasonable to raise, argue, and have decided, but it has been settled, and, if I may be permitted to say so, in my opinion reasonably decided. At any rate we must follow these decisions. I think that Miss Stewart's share was so vested in her as to be liable for her debts and deeds, and it must go according to her will. I think we shall best dispose of the case by answering the first question in the affirmative, and leaving the other questions unanswered.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I think this case is ruled by the decisions in the case of Lindsay's Trustees,[1] and the cases following it, which have been cited to us.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative.

MISS JANET YOUNG, Complainer (Respondent).—C. J. Guthrie—W. Thomson.
LEOPOLD GORDON, Respondent (Reclaimer).—W. Campbell—Graham Stewart.

Bill of Exchange—Value—Promissory-notes granted for one day's delay in exacting payment of debt.—On 5th June 1895 a money-lender lent a lady £104, in return for two promissory-notes for £100 and £24, 16s. respectively, payable on demand. On 3d July 1895, the borrower being called on to pay, and being unable to do so, the lender induced her in consideration of twenty-four hours' delay, to grant him three additional promissory-notes payable on demand, for a further sum of £250. On 23d July the lender registered protests for non-payment of the five notes, and charged for payment of £200, the amount of two of the notes. In a suspension of the charge, in which the above facts were admitted, the suspender tendered payment of the first two promissory-notes for £124, 16s.

In respect of this tender, and of the fact that no value had been given for the three promissory-notes for £250, the Court suspended the charge, and found the respondent liable in the whole expenses of the cause, and directed the Clerk of Court to deliver to the complainer the five promissory-notes.

2D DIVISION.

MISS JANET WOODBURN YOUNG, who was formerly a schoolmistress, and who lived at Claremont, Bridge-of-Allan, where she kept furnished apartments, presented this note of suspension and interdict against Leopold Gordon, a money-lender, at 144 Bath Street, Glasgow, praying for suspension of a charge for payment of £200, contained in certain promissory-notes.

The complainer stated:—(Stat. 2) On 5th June 1895 the complainer granted to the respondent two promissory-notes, payable on demand, for £100 and £24, 16s. respectively, and received in exchange £104, the balance of £20, 16s. representing interest. "This sum of £124, 16s. the complainer has already offered in full of the respondent's demands, and the same is again tendered." (Stat. 3) On 3d July 1895 the complainer was unable to pay, and she called upon the respondent, and asked for delay. In return for a delay of twenty-four hours the respondent prevailed on the complainer to grant him three promissory-notes, one for £100, and two for £75 each. (Stat. 6) "On 23d July respondent protested the whole of the notes for non-payment, registered the protests, and thereafter charged the complainer thereupon to the extent of £200, and has threatened to charge on the remaining registered protests."

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The said bills, with the exception of the bill for £100, dated 5th June 1895, and the bill for £24, 16s. of same date, having been granted for no value received, the suspension craved should be granted.

The respondent stated;—"On 2d July 1895 the respondent wrote the complainer for payment of the £124, 16s. contained in the promissory-notes mentioned in article 2 of the statement of facts for the complainer. The complainer replied asking for an extension of time. On 3d July 1895 the complainer called on the respondent and pressed for delay, which the respondent at first refused to give . . . The complainer then offered the respondent, as an inducement to him to give the delay asked, to grant him new promissory-notes for £250, on the footing that, if payment was not made by her to the respondent of the said sum of £124, 16s. by noon of the following day, the respondent would have an absolute right to insist on payment of the sum of £250 contained in the said three bills, in addition to the said sum of £124, 16s. The respondent agreed to this, and the complainer accordingly granted to the respondent the three promissory-notes bearing that date, which are herewith produced. . . . The complainer at the same time, along with said three promissory-notes, delivered to the respondent the holograph letter dated 3d July 1895, in the following terms:—'144 Bath Street, Glasgow.—I have this day granted to Mr Leopold Gordon, Glasgow, three bills, one for £100, and two (each) for £75, and making the total £250, that I have granted him bills for this day, payable on demand, which I read over, signed, and clearly understood; that I have granted him those three bills as further security and in consideration of him, the said Leopold Gordon, having granted me an extension of time till 12 o'clock noon to-morrow, Thursday 4th now next July 1895, to pay him the £124, 16s., being the amount of my two bills I have granted him on Wednesday, the 5th of last month, which I am duly and justly indebted to him, and which is due and payable to him this day; but if default shall be made by me in paying him the £124, 16s. by the time named above to-morrow, I hereby authorise and empower him, the said Leopold Gordon, to proceed against me forthwith for the recovery of all the five bills that I have granted him, amounting to altogether £374, 16s., to receive and to share an equal dividend on my estate in the case of bankruptcy, cessio, or sequestration, without any hindrance or prejudice to him, and without any objections either by myself, my trustees, or trustee. Dated this 3d day of July 1895. Written and signed by myself. (Signed) JANET WOODBURN YOUNG.' The complainer failed to implement the said agreement to pay the sums contained in said promissory-notes, dated 5th June 1895, on the following day, and the respondent thus became entitled to payment of £374, 16s."

The respondent pleaded;—(2) The complainer's statements are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the prayer of the note. (3) The present action is excluded by the said letter of 3d July 1895 granted by the complainer to the respondent. (4) The sums contained in the said promissory-notes being due by the complainer to the respondent, the note ought to be refused.

On 3d December 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the respondent is entitled (1) to the sum of £100 contained in the promissory-note dated 5th June 1895; and (2) to the sum of £24, 16s. contained in the promissory-note of like date, and that the complainer is not bound to pay, and the respondent is not entitled to recover, the amounts in the bills dated 3d July 1895 for £100, £75, and £75 respectively, mentioned on record, and in respect of the offer made by the complainer in her second statement of facts, and of the consignation by the complainer of £100, suspends the charge and warrants thereof simpliciter, and decerns: Grants warrant to the Bill-Chamber Clerk to pay to the respondent the sum of £100 consigned in his hands on 7th October last, and that on production of a certified copy of this interlocutor, to be applied by him in payment pro tanto of the foresaid bills, dated 5th June 1895: Finds the complainer entitled to expenses," &c.

The respondent reclaimed. Counsel for the complainer were not called upon.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a case of a somewhat extraordinary kind. The complainer admits that she signed two promissory-notes, one for £100, and one for £24, 16s., payable on demand, and that the cash she received from the respondent for these two bills was only £104. After that the respondent induced her, in consideration of his giving her twenty-four hours' delay in repayment of that sum, to sign other bills amounting to £100, £75, and £75,—£250 in all. The Lord Ordinary has found that the respondent is entitled to £100, and £24, 16s., and that is not disputed. This is a most unconscionable and a most disgraceful transaction altogether, but there is no dispute about that part of it. There is no doubt that the complainer got value to the extent of £104, and that the rest was stipulated for to the advantage of Gordon. The Lord Ordinary has held that Gordon is not entitled to recover the sums contained in the three bills for £250. I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary. It cannot be said that the complainer received anything for these bills, and the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that the reclaimer has no right to enforce payment under them.

LORD YOUNG.—The case before us discloses very startling conduct on the part of a man who says he is a financial agent in a business which he carries on in Glasgow. The financial business consists in lending money to persons who will deal with such a person. He took two names, one being Leopold Gordon, and the other B. Edwards, and he gives no explanation of his doing so. A poor lady, formerly a schoolmistress at Bridge of Allan, unfortunately applied to this man. I do not like to introduce the term which in my opinion would best describe him. It was in the month of June last, and she got from him in loan a sum of £104. For that he took from her a bill for £100, and another bill for £24, 16s., payable on demand. In the month of July he demanded payment, and she was not able to give it. He then induced her to subscribe three more bills, one for £100, and two for £75 each, making the bills or promissory-notes which he had received from her amount in all to £374, 16s. He got these in the month of July, she having got the £104 in the month of June, about four weeks before. Then he wrote out and made her copy, or dictated to her, a letter which is a most scandalous letter for any man to dictate to or write out for a poor woman to whom he had lent a small sum of money—the most scandalous letter I ever saw. Then he proceeded to do diligence upon these three bills amounting to £374, 16s., for which he had only advanced £104. It is entirely out of the question to expect that this Court, or any Court of law, will aid such a creature in recovering payment of these bills for £250. He gave nothing in return for these bills, although the letter bore that they were for delay in exacting payment of the bills for £100 and £24, 16s. for twenty-four hours. I agree that diligence must be suspended upon the bills for £250.

The bills for £100 and £24, 16s. are in a different position. These bills were given by the borrower, who received £104, upon which the lender only charged £20, 16s. of interest. I should have been very much disposed to have refused the aid of this Court to recover upon the £24, 16s. bill, beyond a reasonable interest for a month's use of the £100 which was lent, but I have not to consider that, because payment has been offered not only of the £100 but also of the £24, 16s. I therefore agree that while this creature should have that money, the diligence which he got on the other three bills should be suspended. The expenses of these proceedings however, must be paid by the respondent, and while he gets the £124, 16s., that sum will be available to the debtor for the expenses in which the respondent will be found liable here. I think the Court should also order that the whole five promissory-notes which are in the hands of the Clerk of Court, together with the letter of 3d July, should be handed over to the complainer.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. Putting out of view the complainer's statement, and simply taking that of the respondent, I find in it a confession of a most iniquitous transaction. I cannot but regard the demand for payment of these bills as a most impudent attempt to defraud this poor woman of money to which the respondent was not entitled. The only regret I have is that this gentleman's conduct did not go just a little further, and lead him into the audience of a different Court, and prevent him, at least for some time, from carrying on a business which is disgraceful. I agree that the bills should be handed over to the complainer, and the respondent found liable in the whole expenses of the case.

THE COURT adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, with additional expenses, and directed the Clerk of Court to deliver to the complainer the five promissory-notes and the letter of 3d July 1895.

Sec. 4, which empowers heirs of entail to grant provisions to children, contains a proviso that the provisions shall not exceed certain proportions of the free yearly rents or free yearly value.

£6000, or such other sum as should not exceed one-third part of the yearly rental of the estates, and to his children, if three or more, a sum not exceeding three years' free rent or value of the estates. Lord Belhaven died upon 6th September 1893, survived by his wife and by seven daughters.

On 6th November 1894 Alexander Charles Hamilton Lord Belhaven and Stenton, who succeeded as heir of entail to the Wishaw estates, presented a petition to the Junior Lord Ordinary under section 7 of the Aberdeen Act, in order to have the provisions granted by his predecessor restricted so far as they exceeded the amount authorised by the statute, and for authority to charge the entailed estate with the provisions so restricted.

The petitioner stated that the free rental of the estate was £4424, and that the utmost amount with which this predecessor could competently under the statute burden the entailed estate was (1) £1297, 17s. by way of annuity to his widow, and (2) £9379, 18s. 6d. by way of provisions to his children.

Answers were lodged by the Dowager Lady Belhaven and the children, in which they averred that, in addition to the rental of the lands given in the petition, there were mineral rents and lordships amounting to between £8000 and £9000 a year, which fell to be taken in computo in fixing the amount of the provisions. "The respondents submit that the proper and correct mode of computing the said provisions is by taking the average of rental of a number of years previous to the date of the death of the granter, and in the present case five years is a reasonable period to take for this purpose. The statute does not take into consideration the probable value of the mineral field, and of the estate generally, in the future, but directs attention to what is the existing free yearly rent or value of the estate at the date of the granter's death, and it is on this income that the widow's annuity and provisions to children must be computed."

The petitioner did not dispute that the coal had in the past been, and was at Lord Belhaven's death being, worked to a large amount under current leases; but he averred, by reference to a minute,* in

* The following reference to the minute is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary:—

"1. Green Colliery.—The last lease of this colliery expired at Whitsunday 1893, and the tenant is now sitting from year to year. There is no fixed rent, only lordships. The minerals will be exhausted in the present year. The amount of the lordships paid for the year during which the late heir died was £666. If an average of years prior to that was taken the amount would be considerably larger.

"2. Clydesdale Colliery.—There is a lease of this colliery which does not expire until 1911, but there is a break every third year after 1893. The fixed rent is £500, and the lordships 7d. per ton. It is estimated that only 370,000 tons of coal remain in this colliery, which, at the average rate of working during the last four years, will be exhausted in seven years. The return for the year 1893-94 is stated at £2225, but in previous years the amount was less, in 1890-91 being only £247.

"3. Glenclelland and Knownoble.—It is stated that a lease of these collieries and also of part of the adjoining mineral field of Ravenscraig was executed in 1893 for a period of twenty-one years from Whitsunday 1892, with a break every third year in the tenant's favour. There is a fixed rent and also lordships. The rent is to be £1000 for the first two years of the lease, and then £750 until the Knownoble coal and the main and splint coal in Glenclelland are exhausted, when the rent is to be reduced to £500.

which the position of the different collieries on the estate was set forth, that the minerals in most of them were nearly approaching exhaustion.

In these circumstances the petitioner maintained "that the claim made by the respondents, that the said mineral rents and lordships must be computed as part of the free yearly rent or value of the said estate, is entirely untenable, as such a claim might well result in the exhaustion of the whole rental by the jointure and interest on children's provisions, leaving nothing whatever for the heir of entail. Lord Belhaven submits that if the mineral returns are to be taken into account at all in computing the amount of provisions for widow and children, the fairest way of dealing with an exhaustible subject of that kind is to include in the rental of the estate interest at a fair and reasonable rate on the capital value of the minerals let at the date of death. But if and so far as it may be found necessary to base any calculation upon the mineral rental, he submits that the rental to be taken is that for the year from Whitsunday 1893 to Whitsunday 1894, being the year current at the date of the death of the said late James Hamilton, Lord Belhaven and Stenton."

On 25th June 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Low) reported the petition and answers to the First Division of the Court.*

It is estimated that the Knownoble coal will be exhausted about 1897, and as the main and splint coal in Glenclelland are said to consist only of pillars containing some 48,000 tons of coal, it cannot be long before they also are worked out. It is also estimated that the whole coal in Glenclelland will be exhausted in seven years.

"4. Over Johnston, Nether Johnston, Meadowhead, and Ravenscraig.—There seem to have been difficulties in regard to these collieries. They were let to a Mr Cameron in 1892 upon a lease of nineteen years, with half-yearly breaks. The lease was terminated at Whitsunday 1893, when the collieries were again let upon a lease of nineteen years to the Messrs Watson. There was, however, a break at Martinmas of the same year, which was taken advantage of. Since that date the collieries have been in petitioner's own hands.

"It is stated that Over Johnston contains coal sufficient to last for sixteen years at the same rate of output as in the years 1890-92, and that Nether Johnston and Ravenscraig will be exhausted in thirteen years at the average rate of working for the last five years. No information is given in regard to the amount of coal in Meadowhead, and probably that colliery has been worked all along with some of the others which I have mentioned.

"5. The remaining collieries upon the estate are North and South Netherton, Shieldmuir, Station, and Sunnyside. These collieries appear to have been worked together under a lease until 1889. South Netherton, Shieldmuir, and Station are said to be now exhausted. North Netherton and Sunnyside are now being worked by the Glasgow Iron and Steel Company, and it is said that at the average rate of output the former will be exhausted in six years, and the latter in five years."

* "OPINION.— . . . In these circumstance, the petitioner contends that if the method which has hitherto been adopted of ascertaining the free yearly rental or proceeds of an estate in minerals, namely, taking the average returns for a certain number of years prior to the death of the granter of the provisions, was adopted, there would not be secured to the heir of entail in possession the two-thirds of the free rental or proceeds, to which under the Aberdeen Act he is in all circumstances entitled. The petitioner therefore suggests that the amount to be brought in computo in fixing the provisions should be arrived at by ascertaining the capital value

Jan. 23, 1896. Lord Belhaven and Stenton.

On 18th July the First Division pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the report by Lord Low, and heard counsel, appoint the case to be argued before the Judges of this Division, with the assistance of three Judges of the Second Division."

Argued for the petitioner;—The first question which arose was whether the minerals in an entailed estate could be taken into account at all in ascertaining the free yearly rent of the lands and estate in the sense of the Aberdeen Act. On principle there was much to be said in support of the negative of the proposition, and useful analogies tending in this direction were to be found in other rights of a similar nature.[1] In face, however, of the judgments in Wellwood's,[2] Douglas',[3] and Christie's[4] cases, the petitioner did not press the Court to decide the point, although he reserved right to state it in the House of Lords if so advised. Assuming then, in the second place, that the proceeds of collieries were to be treated as part of the annual rent or produce of an entailed estate, the petitioner submitted that looking to the fact that the minerals were more or less nearly approaching exhaustion, it was equitable, in order to avoid of the minerals unexhausted at the time of the late Lord Belhaven's death, and allowing interest at a fair rate upon the capital sum.

"The respondents, upon the other hand, contend that it is incompetent to inquire what is the life of the coalfield, and that it being admitted that at the date of Lord Belhaven's death, and previously, rents and lordships were being received from the collieries, the mineral rent must be fixed at the average amount actually received during a reasonable period of years prior to the date of death.

"In the well-known case of Wellwood (10 D. 1480 and 11 D. 248), it was settled that the produce of a coal mine is for the purposes of the Aberdeen Act a part of the rents and proceeds of the entailed lands and estates. It was also held that where lordships are paid—the amount of which varies from year to year, and depends upon the quantity of coal which the tenant chooses to put out in any year—the yearly value may be fixed by taking the average returns over such a period of years as in the circumstances may be reasonable.

"The respondents argued that although the judgment in Wellwood's case allowed an average of past years to be taken, it did not authorise any investigation as to what the mineral yield would be in the future. That view apparently was taken by Lord Benholme (in a case to which I shall presently refer), but taking the case of Wellwood alone, I find nothing to sanction the idea that the probability or certainty of the exhaustion of the minerals in the immediate future cannot be taken into consideration. It was there laid down that where the proceeds of an entailed estate varies from year to year as in the case of mineral lordships, the duty of the Court is to ascertain what is the yearly value of these proceeds taking one year with another. Prima facie it is difficult to see how the yearly value can perfectly obvious hardship to the petitioner, that the calculation should be made by ascertaining the capital value of the minerals unexhausted at the date of his predecessor's death, and by allowing interest at a fair rate upon the capital sum. Now, in previous cases, the Court had held that it was not bound in all circumstances to consider the amount of the royalties in "the year of the death of the granter," as expressed in the statute. While in Wellwood's[1] case the Court took an average of the lordships for seven, and in Douglas'[2] case for three preceding years, the case of almost total extinction of the minerals was foreshadowed by Lord Jeffrey[1] in Wellwood's case, by Lord Cowan and Lord Neaves[2] in Douglas' case, and by Lord Shand and Lord Adam[3] in Christie's case. The cases in regard to the produce of minerals in questions of testamentary succession depended on the intention of the testator as appearing from a construction of the particular deed in each case. Little light, therefore, was to be derived from them on the question here. The decision, however, in Ferguson's[4] case formed a direct analogy to the petitioner's argument, and Lord M'Laren's observations in Strain's case[5] (which, though be fixed upon that basis without considering the future in a case in which it appears that there will soon be no estate from which any proceeds can be derived. And I find that in the earlier report of Wellwood, Lord Jeffrey did refer to the possibility of minerals being almost exhausted when the granter of the provisions died. He said,—'The annual value is a mere measure, and in such a case we must reduce it to something like the average production of an ordinary year. If the coal has been almost wrought out when the provision was made, and it was offered to be proved that a year afterwards there was a final cessation of all profit in working it, it would be hard to put upon the Act so rigorous a construction as to hold that we were bound to take it as producing that last rent for all the years that the widow might survive, and, as if we had goggles on, look neither behind nor before, but fix our regards upon the one year alone.'

"In the case of Douglas (8 M. 360), the method of taking an average of years prior to the date of death was also followed. Various methods of fixing the yearly value, and among others a valuation by a man of skill, appear to have been suggested. The Lord Justice-Clerk (Moncreiff) said that although Wellwood settled that the question might be solved by an estimate, it did not follow that that estimate is necessarily to be calculated by an average. 'I could imagine,' his Lordship added, 'cases in which it would be right to arrive at the result by a valuation conducted on ordinary principles.' His Lordship, however, did not indicate what kind of case he had in view.

"Lord Cowan expressed the opinion that where minerals, extensively worked up to the date of death, were almost or altogether exhausted, they should not be taken in computo in ascertaining the amount of the provisions.

"Lord Benholme, on the other hand, said (and this is the opinion to which I have already referred):—'After some doubt as to the applicability of a valuation by scientific men to a question of this kind, to fix the value of difficult to reconcile with Ferguson's case, did not expressly overrule it), might fairly be appealed to as justifying the introduction into the law of Scotland of a principle well established in England[1] as regards wasting subjects. The cases regarding the fixing of the amount payable as composition for an entry in respect of minerals under the old Statute of 1469, c. 36, formed an analogy directly in point, shewing that the Court was at liberty to use any means in its power to do justice in the particular case.[2]

Argued for the respondents;—It being conceded that for the purposes of the Aberdeen Act going collieries formed part of the entailed estate, section 1 of the Act required in unequivocal terms that their "yearly rent" should be calculated as it happened to be at the death of the granter. The fact that the rents might fluctuate from year to year was not taken into account by the statute, which laid down as a standard the amount actually obtained during a given year without any consideration as to permanency or exhaustion of the subjects. Such a method of calculation, although rough-and-ready, was prefer-the minerals as at the date of the granter's death, I am unable to see that such a principle of valuation could in any case be applicable. The elements on which the average to be struck depends are what is, and in time past has been, the annual value of the mineral yield, and I do not think that the Court is entitled to give effect to a valuation, for that would be to introduce considerations of what the value of the minerals will be in time to come. There are doubtless questions in the solution of which the element of prospective rent may be taken into account, but I cannot think that such an element can be allowed to influence us in a case like this. To do so would be to supersede a calculation intended by the statute to be founded on events that had happened by a calculation proceeding on events that were to happen.'

"There is next the case of Christie (6 R. 301) which is a most important decision as regards the present question.

"In that case a lease was current at the death of the granter of an annuity to his widow under the Aberdeen Act of the freestone in the lands at a yearly rent of £200. The lease continued, and the rent was paid for five years after the granter's death, and during that year the heir in possession paid to the widow an annuity equal to one-third of the rental including the mineral rent. He subsequently, however, presented a petition to have the annuity restricted, on the ground that the lease had come to an end; that as matter of fact no stone had ever been worked under it, as it was found that it could not be worked to a profit, and that there were not then, and never had been, stone or minerals in the estate capable of being worked to a profit. He therefore asked that the old mineral rent should be struck out in fixing the amount of the widow's annuity.

"The Lord Ordinary (Adam) took the view that, assuming the petitioner's averments to be true, to take the mineral rent in computo would be to give to the widow and to deprive the heir in possession of more than one-third of the free yearly rent or proceeds. His Lordship therefore reported the case to the First Division, with the opinion that there should be inquiry in regard to the alleged impossibility of working the minerals to a profit.

"The learned Judges of the First Division, however, took an opposite able to the large field of inquiry which would be opened by the petitioner's proposal. If the heir of entail thought he was being unfairly treated, he could appeal to the 13th section, and ask the Court to reduce the provisions so far as they deprived him of more than one-third of the estate. Accepting the authority of Wellwood, Christie, and Douglas, as shewing that the Court had in some cases allowed a computation on the basis of an average of past years, these cases were no authority for the proposition of the petitioner (which was outside any decided case), that future years were to be taken into account. The concession allowed by these cases must not be extended further. The cases founded upon by the petitioner regarding wills, and which were of course questions of the intention of the testator, had no application in a case regarding the interpretation of a statute. Ferguson's Trustees[1] could not stand in face of the judgment in Strain's Trustees.[2] The English rule, as deduced from Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth[3] had no application in Scotland.[4] In England it applied to wasting subjects, such as terminable annuities, which could have no analogy to minerals, the fruits of an estate. The considerations involved in the composition cases were entirely different. These cases were based view, and held that as the lease continued and rent was paid under it for five years after the granter's death, the mineral rent had at that date such a reasonable permanence that inquiry was excluded, and the rent fell to be taken in computo in fixing the amount of the widow's annuity.

"If it was the case that the minerals were not workable to a profit, the rental of the estate was only £700 a year, and yet the result of the judgment was that the heir in possession was compelled to pay the widow £300 a year during her life.

"I may observe that Lord Shand, in his opinion, expressly saved the case of minerals which had been worked, being exhausted at the time of the granter's death.

"I do not think that there is any difference in principle between a case in which there are no minerals which can be made available and one in which all the minerals have been taken out. It therefore seems to me that the case of Christie is an authority for saying that the question whether the annual proceeds of the collieries which were being worked, or capable of being worked, when Lord Belhaven died, should or should not be brought in computo, depends upon the degree of permanency of the proceeds. In such a case as the Green Colliery, which the petitioner avers had only a life of two years at the date of the death, it may be clear enough that the necessary degree of permanency is not present, while the reverse may be equally clear in the case of Over Johnston which has admittedly sixteen years to run. But between the two there are a variety of cases in which it is very difficult to find any principle upon which to determine what is a reasonably permanent source of annual proceeds and what is not so.

"I am unable to assent altogether to the view pressed either by the respondents or the petitioner. The respondents argued that, as there was admittedly a large return from minerals when Lord Belhaven died, and as, upon the petitioner's own shewing, the minerals in the estate will continue to be of an annual value for many years to come, it is incompetent to inquire as to the state of the mineral field, and that all that can be done is not upon the construction of a particular statute, but on "use and wont." In estimating casualties it was the custom always to rate as low as possible, while provisions relative to a widow's annuity were to be construed as liberally as possible for her.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The minerals to which the present question relates form part of the entailed estate of Wishaw. When the late Lord Belhaven died, on 6th September 1893, these minerals were being wrought by tenants under leases of various terms of duration. In each case the return actually made to the landlord was in the form of lordships. It was not maintained in argument by the petitioner that in no case are the minerals of an entailed estate, which are actually worked by the heir in possession or his lessees, to be taken into account in ascertaining the amount of the provisions which may be made by him under the Aberdeen Act. The nature of mineral property, which is consumed by use, gave rise, in former days, to the contention that the proceeds of collieries were not to be treated as part of the annual produce of an entailed estate. The learned counsel for the petitioner expressly stated that they could not ask the Court to adopt that conclusion, and accordingly we heard no argument on the subject. If, then, the yield of going collieries is not to be left out of account in questions under the Aberdeen Act, the mode of dealing with it must be found in the first section, and no other section has been pointed to. The section distinguishes between lands let and lands unlet. If the lands are let, then it is the free yearly rent that is to be taken; if they are unlet, then it is the free yearly value. In either case certain deductions are to be made from rent or value alike, and the whole is to be calculated as things may happen to be at the death of the

to take the average of the proceeds for a suitable number of years prior to Lord Belhaven's death.

"Now, if that course was adopted, and the petitioner's averments are true (as at this stage they must be assumed to be), the result would be that almost immediately the widow's annuity would become, by reason of the exhaustion of coal, more than one-third of the free rental, and would be increasingly greater than one-third of the free rental as years went on, until at last it might absorb the whole free rental. I do not think that a course which would probably lead to that result can be within the statute.

"On the other hand, the petitioner's proposal that the annual value should be taken to be the interest upon the capitalised value of the coal remaining, is one for which there is no authority. Further, I doubt if it would be within the provisions of the statute, because the result would probably be that at first the widow would get much less than one-third of the actual annual proceeds, while as time went on she would get a great deal more.

"The case appears to me to be one of great difficulty. It is also a case of importance, not only to the parties, but as a question of law and practice which is not unlikely to occur again, seeing the extent to which the minerals have been worked out in many parts of Scotland. Further, if the view taken by the respondents is sound, nothing more will be necessary than to take an average of the lordships for a suitable number of years, while if the petitioner's averments are relevant, a wide and expensive inquiry will be necessitated.

"In these circumstances I have thought it right to follow the course adopted by Lord Adam in the case of Christie, and to report the matter to the Inner-House."

granter. Now, assuming, what is conceded, that for the purposes of the Aberdeen Act collieries form part of the entailed estate, this is the rule, and the only rule applicable. The collieries in question were let, and therefore it is the rent that is to be taken, and it is the rent as it happens to be at the death of the granter. That the word "rent" covers royalties has been decided, and the decision seems clearly sound, as the system of royalties is merely the way of calculating the rent to be paid. If this be so then I see no other difficulty in the way of the application of the statutory rule to the case in hand. The petitioner's argument is rested on the fact that while all the collieries now in question were actually being worked at the time of the death of the granter, under current leases, yet, in all, or at least in some, the minerals were more or less nearly approaching exhaustion. Striking illustrations were given of the unfairness of calculating an annuity which might burden the estate for many years by a rental on the eve of disappearing. It is probable that equally glaring anomalies may occur in the opposite direction, and several were suggested, some of these are incidental to mineral estates, and others are common to all landed estates. But the real answer to this objection lies in the terms of the statute, which, by the words "all as the same may happen to be at the death of the granter," seems to make a frank confession that the rule prescribed is more or less rough and ready, but that it is to be followed through all vicissitudes. The safeguard provided by the 13th section seems a further recognition of the risks of the heir in possession. I fully appreciate the hardships of particular cases. But all the arguments ab inconvenienti; all the instances of the last year of the lease, where the coal is all but worked out; all the cases of no reasonable permanence (so far as these are peculiar to mineral rents and do not apply to all rents),—are really arguments against coal being ever treated as part of the annual proceeds of the entailed estate. They furnish no warrant for the establishment of a separate rule for ascertaining the yearly proceeds of a colliery, when the statute has prescribed but one rule for all subjects falling within its scope.

The First Division appointed this case to be heard before seven Judges, because in two reported cases, Wellwood[1] and Douglas,[2] a mode of calculation different from that expressed in the statute had been adopted, viz., an average of years; while in a third, Christie,[3] it had been assumed, in the opinions of the learned Judges, that the statute permitted that course. The present petitioner does not propose an average of years previous to the death of the granter, because, as it happens, the last year of the granter's life is more favourable to him. His proposal is to take into account years subsequent to the granter's death. What we are asked to do seems a wider departure than has yet been made from the terms of the statute. While the point thus raised is therefore new, it seems to me that the true answer to the petitioner's demand is to be found in the fact that the terms of the statute warrant no departure in either direction from the condition of things as they happen to be at the death of the granter. Upon that ground my present judgment is based, and, in my opinion, the lordships payable during the year of the leases in which the late Lord Belhaven died must be held to form part of the rents of the entailed estate, for the purposes of the present application.

LORD ADAM.—It was decided in the case of Wellwood[1] that the annual rent or annual value of coal mines was to be taken in computo in estimating the amount of the annuity which an heir of entail was entitled to provide for his widow under the Aberdeen Act,—that is to say, that mines and minerals formed part of the entailed lands and estates to which that Act applied; and no argument was offered to us that that decision, so far, was not well founded.

Assuming that to be so, it appears to me that, in estimating the annual rent or annual value of mines and minerals which is to be taken into consideration in fixing the amount of the widow's annuity, the rule, which must be followed, is that which is prescribed by the statute with reference to the entailed lands and estates generally, of which they form a part. There is no authority for estimating the rent or value of one part of the entailed lands and estates in one way and another part in another way.

Now, the Act appears to me to lay down a clear rule. It declares that the widow's annuity shall not exceed one-third part of the free yearly rent of the lands and estates where the same are let, or of the free yearly value thereof where the same are not let, after deducting public burdens, &c., all as the same shall happen to be at the death of the granter.

It is the free yearly rent or the free yearly value, as that may happen to be at the granter's death, and nothing else, which is to be taken into consideration in estimating the amount of the widow's annuity.

The Judges who decided the case of Wellwood[1] seem to have thought that this was not an equitable rule when applied to such subjects as the rents or lordships derived from mines and mineral, looking to their great variation from year to year, and that a more equitable rule would be to endeavour to find out what, communibus annis, the free rent or value of such subjects was, and to take that as giving the measure of the widow's annuity. Accordingly, in Wellwood's[1] case, they took an average of the lordships for the seven preceding years, and in Douglas'[2] case of the three preceding years. It appears to me that if the amount so arrived at was greater or less it could not possibly be the yearly rent or value of the subject, as that happened to be at the granter's death.

This may or may not be a more equitable way of proceeding than the rule of the statute, but it appears to me that the case is not one into which equitable considerations enter at all. The statute has relaxed the fetters of the entail, and empowered the heir of entail in possession to provide an annuity to his widow of a certain amount, to be ascertained in a certain way prescribed by statute, but no further. It appears to me that the way prescribed by statute must be followed, whether it be equitable or not, and that the Court has no power to authorise any deviation from it.

In this case, as I understand, the coalpits were all let at the time of the granter's death; that being so, I think that the rent which has to be taken into consideration in fixing the widow's annuity is the amount of the lordships received during the year then current.

Lord Belhaven and Stenton.

LORD M'LAREN.—As my opinion has no influence on the decision of the case, I shall not elaborate it, but will indicate the steps of the argument by which I conclude that the widow's annuity ought to be calculated upon the actuarial or present annual value of the existing minerals.

I observe, first, that the Aberdeen Act makes no express reference to mineral estate, and that the case contemplated in the statute is the ordinary case of an estate producing an annual return, whether in the shape of rent to a proprietor who lets his estate, or of annual value to a proprietor who occupies his own land.

I hold, in common I believe with the other members of the Court, that the Aberdeen Act was rightly held to extend to the case of returns from minerals. But then I take note of the fact that the return which is received by a proprietor of minerals in the shape of royalty is not a consideration for the mere usufruct of the lands, as in the case of agricultural rent, but is a payment or consideration for the right of removal of part of the subject. Such royalties, I conceive, ought to be treated as being in part payments made for the use of the land or the privilege of removing the mineral, and in part for the value of the mineral or corporeal subject which is removed.

Now, as the Aberdeen Act contains no special provisions with respect to mineral estates, I think that, in applying the Act to such a case, it is necessary to ascertain how much of the payment, made in the shape of royalty, is to be regarded as annual rent or annual value. In the case which we are considering, we are informed that some of the coal mines held under leases from the late Lord Belhaven will be exhausted in a very few years. I cannot hold that the royalties to be received during such a short period are of the nature of rent or annual value within the meaning of the Aberdeen Act. As to how the true annual value is to be ascertained I do not wish to anticipate. But, supposing the whole capital value of the remaining minerals to be ascertained by the report of an expert, I should say that the interest at the rate of 5 per cent on the capital value so ascertained would be the fair annual value of the mineral estate; at least it would be a much nearer approximation to the true value than what is given by the crude proposition that the actual return within the year is always and necessarily the annual value.

We are familiar with actuarial calculations in other branches of the law of entail. These are not expressly required by statute. In the case of compulsory disentail, the Court is required to value the "expectancy" of the heirs-substitute whose interests are considered, and it has been held without doubt or question that the algebraic value of the heir's chance of succession is the "expectancy" to be considered. It is just as easy, or rather very much easier, to compute the present value of a tract of unwrought coal capable of measurement, and thence to find the annual value to the proprietor of this capital sum, supposing it to be put into a proper state of investment.

I understand that the Court attach importance to the words of the Aberdeen Act, "all as the same may happen to be at the death of the granter." There is a question whether these words apply to the immediate antecedent, viz., the deduction of public burdens, annuities, and interest on debt, or whether the expression qualifies the whole clause, including the ascertainment of annual value. But, waiving this question, I hold that the mode of valuation which I propose is a true valuation as at the death of the granter, because my proposition is that the coal remaining unwrought at the death of the granter is to be valued; that is, its capital value is to be ascertained at the granter's death, and the annual return which that capital sum is capable of producing is to be taken as the annual value of the subject.

I agree with your Lordships in holding that it is open to this Court to reconsider the decisions of the Inner-House in this branch of the law; that is, in virtue of the statutory provision by which cases of "difficulty and importance" may be referred to a Court of seven Judges. But then the result of my consideration of the cases is, that I find that the Court has recognised a distinction between wasting subjects and subjects which produce a return in perpetuity, and as I think that this is a well-founded distinction, my view is that it should be recognised, and, if necessary, extended.

I may also say that I disclaim all intention of introducing equitable considerations to modify the construction of the Aberdeen Act. My view is, that royalty for minerals, especially in the case of a mine which is approaching exhaustion, is neither annual rent nor annual value, but is inclusive of these elements, and that the sum paid by the tenant for the corpus of the mineral, or for the privilege of removing it, is only one of the elements from which the true annual value is to be deduced. In the case of a coal-field of great extent, and which is not likely to be exhausted within the lifetime of the annuitant, the royalties paid might be taken as a sufficient approximation to the true annual value for practical purposes. In the case of a field which is approaching exhaustion, I think that they cannot be so treated, and that the heir is not bound in payment of a provision for life which he has not the means of satisfying out of the estate.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, LORD KINNEAR, and LORD TRAYNER, concurred with the LORD PRESIDENT and LORD ADAM.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having resumed consideration of this case with the assistance of three Judges of the Second Division, and heard counsel for the parties upon the minute for the petitioner and answers thereto and the whole cause, after consultation with the said three Judges, and in conformity with the opinion of the majority of the seven Judges present, Find that the lordships payable during the year in which the late Lord Belhaven died formed part of the rents of the entailed estate for the purposes of the present application, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed: Find neither party entitled to expenses in the Inner-House, and decern."

Succession—Vesting—Trust—Marriage-Contract—Entail—Provision by heir of entail for younger children.—C, an heir of entail in possession, by his marriage-contract, in the exercise of a power under the deed of entail, bound the succeeding heirs to pay to the trustees a sum equal to three years' rent of the entailed estate, in trust for behoof of the children of the marriage not succeeding to the entailed estate, in such shares as C should appoint, and failing appointment, to be held by the trustees for the younger children alive at C's death equally, or their issue. As a further provision for his younger children, he assigned to his trustees certain policies of assurance on his life under similar conditions as to apportionment.

In contemplation of the marriage of R, his third son, C executed a deed appointing to R or his lawful issue or assigns £1500 as his share of the total trust funds. This deed was declared to be delivered on execution, and to be irrevocable, and R was taken bound to assign his rights under it to his marriage-contract trustees. R predeceased his father.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that R's right to the £1500 was not contingent on his surviving his father, and that it vested at the date of the appointment in his favour.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

JOHN GEORGE CHANCELLOR, of Shieldhill, who died on 15th March 1894, was heir of entail in possession of that estate in terms of a bond of tailzie, dated 11th April 1727. This deed provided, inter alia,—"And also excepting and reserving full power and liberty to the said Alexander Chancellor and the other heirs of tailzie and provision above mentioned to provide their younger children to three years' free rent of the said lands and estate, so far as the same is free, unaffected for the time with liferents and real debts, and after deduction of annual rents of personal debts that may affect the same, as said is."

By his contract of marriage, dated 22d June 1847, Mr Chancellor narrated this deed and the liberty therein given to the heirs of entail "to provide their younger children with three years' free rent of the entailed lands," and bound the heirs and substitutes of tailzie who should succeed him to pay to his marriage-contract trustees the sum of £2000, or such other sum, less or more, as shall be equal to three years' free rent of the entailed lands, at the first term after his death, with interest, "in trust for behoof of the children of the said intended marriage not succeeding to the said entailed estate, and that in such shares or proportions, and subject to such conditions, if more than one such child, as the said John George Chancellor shall appoint by any writing under his hand, and failing such appointment, said sum shall be held by the trustees for behoof of the said younger children who shall be alive at the death of the said John George Chancellor in equal shares or proportions, the issue of such other child or children as may have predeceased always coming in place of their parents, and being entitled to the share that would have fallen to their parent had he or she been alive."

Jan. 24, 1896. Chancellor's Trustees v. Sharples' Trustees.

As a further provision for his younger children, Mr Chancellor assigned by the contract certain policies of insurance upon his life under similar conditions as to appointment.

Mr Chancellor's marriage was dissolved by the death of his wife on 22d February 1851.

In prospect of the marriage of his third son the Rev. Robert Blair Maconochie Chancellor to Miss Henrietta-Maria Orde-Powlett, Mr Chancellor, on 24th July 1888, granted a deed of appointment which, inter alia, provided,—"I hereby appoint to the said Robert Blair Maconochie Chancellor, or his lawful issue in the event of his death, or his or their assignees, such a sum out of the trust funds over which I have a power of appointment under the antenuptial contract of marriage between me and my said deceased wife . . . as shall make my said son's share of the total trust funds divisible among the younger children of my said marriage to amount to £1500 . . . And I declare that these presents shall be held as delivered to my said son immediately on the execution hereof, and shall not be subject to revocation or alteration by me in any way, . . . And also that he shall be bound to assign to the trustees, under the settlements of the said intended marriage, his whole rights and interests under these presents."

The Rev. Robert B. M. Chancellor, on 29th August 1888, assigned this sum to his marriage-contract trustees. He died on 3d January 1890 without issue, leaving a will by which he bequeathed his whole estate, real and personal, to his wife. His widow, in 1893, married the Rev. Henry Milner Sharples, and inter alia conveyed the sum of £1500 to her marriage-contract trustees.

Mr John George Chancellor was predeceased by his eldest son Major Alexander Chancellor, who died on 21st April 1893, leaving a daughter Miss Isabella Blanche Dora Chancellor. Mr Chancellor was succeeded in the entailed estate by his second son Hume Frederick Chancellor, and was also survived by his daughters Miss Elizabeth Blanche Chancellor and Mrs Mary Forbes Chancellor or Chadwick.

The provision of £1500, appointed to the Rev. Robert B. M. Chancellor, was claimed by the marriage-contract trustees of Mrs Sharples. Doubts were however expressed whether the provision vested in him, in respect he predeceased his father.

This action of multiplepoinding was accordingly raised by the marriage-contract trustees of the late Mr John George Chancellor. Claims were lodged (1) by the marriage-contract trustees of Mrs Sharples, (2) by Miss Elizabeth Blanche Chancellor, and (3) by the marriage-contract trustees of Mrs Chadwick.

Mrs Sharples' trustees claimed the whole sum of £1500, on the ground that it had vested in the Rev. Robert B. M. Chancellor.

The other claimants maintained that this sum had not vested, and claimed respectively one-half thereof.

On 5th August 1895, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) found that the provisions in favour of the younger children of the late Mr Chancellor did not vest until his death, and repelled the claim for Mrs Sharples' trustees.*

Chancellor's Trustees v. Sharples' Trustees

Mrs Sharples' trustees reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong in holding that the provision to younger children did not vest till the granter's death. There was nothing to limit his power so to provide. It was in accordance with the powers contained in the bond of tailzie of 1727. The Aberdeen Act contained provisions substantially to the same effect.* The objection that the class of younger children could not be ascertained till the father's death was fallacious. The Aberdeen Act extinguished provisions in favour of a younger child if he succeeded to the estate. So if Robert had succeeded he would have required to refund the provision. But at the date of the provision he was an object of the power, and so continued till his death. Even had he lived he would still have been an object of the power. The eldest son would have been entitled to the position of eldest son, even although disinherited. So, conversely, a younger son, while he remained so, was entitled to the privileges accorded to that character.[1] The case of Burnett[2] was distinguishable. There was in that case a different scheme from the present, and the case was dealt with as if there had been no power of appointment. Here there was an appointment to one particular child. The provision produced not an expectancy but an immediate fund of credit.[3]

Argued for the respondents;—The fund provided for younger children did not come into existence until the death of John Chancellor. It was only at this date that the younger children were ascertainable.[4] The general rule must have effect here, that the proof the marriage, but the peculiarity of the case is that there is no gift except to the younger children of the marriage—(that is to say—to the children not succeeding to the entailed estate); and until the death of the father (the heir of entail and granter of the provisions) the class of younger children cannot be ascertained. That, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, excludes vesting at the earlier period, especially when taken along with the destination-over to the issue of predeceasers, which, although not conclusive, is always in such cases an element.

"It was argued that there might be vesting at birth in the whole children other than the first born son, subject to defeasance in the case of any child coming to succeed to the entailed estate. But vesting subject to defeasance can hardly operate when there is no original gift. It was also argued that there is in the marriage-contract no reference to survivorship except in the case of failure of appointment. But it is not, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, possible to construe the deed as giving a power to appoint to a class of objects larger than the class of objects taking in default of appointment. On the whole, the Lord Ordinary does not see his way to sustain the claim for the representatives of the predeceasing younger son, who died without issue."

vision lapsed by the predecease of the grantee.[1] Further the appointment must fail, because quoad Robert's children it was ultra vires.[2]

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—The question argued before us deals with a sum of money, being a provision made by the late Mr Chancellor, of Shieldhill, in his marriage-contract, in favour of his younger children. It is a sum of £2800, being three years' rent of the entailed estate of Shieldhill, which by his marriage-contract he bound the heirs of entail of that property to pay to his marriage trustees. The provision, speaking generally, in the marriage-contract is that the marriage-contract trustees shall hold this sum for behoof of his younger children—that is, as he explains, those not succeeding to the estate of Shieldhill—in such proportions—so much to each—as he may appoint; or failing any appointment, then equally. He died, and his marriage trustees have this sum in their hands now, and, as I have stated, it forms part of the fund in medio.

We are only concerned with the state of his family to this extent, that he left behind him a son—his second son, as it happened—who succeeded to the entailed estate of Shieldhill; therefore he makes no claim upon the funds. His eldest son predeceased him, leaving a daughter, but for whom no claim is made. The third son, Robert, married in his father's lifetime, and predeceased his father without leaving any issue. Mr Chancellor also left two daughters, one married, and, I think, the other not. On the marriage of his third son Robert he was, in effect—not quite formally, but in effect—a party to the marriage-contract, and undertook an obligation that Robert should have £1500 as his share of the sums in the hands, or which should come to be in the hands, of his marriage-contract trustees.

The question which was argued before us really regarded the claim of the deceased Robert's executors under his will, or the beneficiaries under his will, to the £1500 provided to him in his marriage-contract to be paid by his father's marriage trustees. It is claimed by them upon the ground that that was a good and binding obligation in favour of Robert, and had not lapsed in consequence of Robert predeceasing his father; and that being so, that upon his death without issue and leaving a will, it passed, according to his will, to those who are claiming under it. The answer made to this is that it was incompetent for the father to make a provision in favour of Robert otherwise than conditionally upon his surviving his father, that being the true construction of the language of his father's marriage-contract, and also being the true meaning of the provision in the deed of entail, that the heir in possession should be at liberty to burden the heirs of entail with provisions in favour of his younger children to the extent of three years' rent. The entail does contain that provision. It provides that the heirs in possession shall have full power and liberty to provide their younger children with three years' free rent of the lands, so far as the same are free and unaffected at the time with liferents—and so on. The contention is—and that is the question which we have to decide—that the true meaning of this is that it is not in the power of the heir to make the provision a burden upon the heirs of entail succeeding to the entailed estate excepting in favour of younger children who survive. Now, the entail here says nothing upon that subject. It only says, in the words which I have read, that it shall be in the power of the heir in possession to burden the heirs succeeding in favour of his younger children to the extent of three years' free rent. It makes no express provision as to whether that shall be conditional upon younger children surviving the father. Whether or not the meaning is limited to those who survive the father so as to make the provision a burden upon the succeeding heirs of entail in the event of younger children surviving, I say the entail contains nothing express upon that subject. There is a provision, as we all know, in the Aberdeen Act to substantially the same effect. It is the fourth clause :—"Be it enacted that it shall and may be lawful to the heir of entail in possession of any such entailed estate as aforesaid to grant bonds of provision or obligations binding the succeeding heirs of entail in payment out of the rents or proceeds of the same to the lawful child or lawful children of the person granting such bonds or obligations who shall not succeed to such entailed estate, of such sum or sums of money bearing interest from the granter's death as to him or her shall seem fit; provided always that the amount of such provision shall in no case exceed the proportions following of the free yearly rents, or free yearly value of the whole of the said entailed lands and estates after deducting the public burdens, liferent provisions, including those to wives or husbands authorised to be granted by this Act, the yearly interest of debts" —and so on—"Provided always"—and this is what I referred to—"that such provision shall, except in the case of the settlement thereof by a marriage-contract as hereinafter mentioned, be valid and effectual only to such child or children as shall be alive at the death of the granter, or to the child or children of which the wife of the granter shall be then pregnant, and upon any such child succeeding to the entailed estate, the provision granted to him or her, in so far as not previously paid, shall be extinguished for ever." Then section 5 enacts—"Provided always that if any child to whom any such provision as aforesaid may be granted shall marry, and that such provision or any part thereof shall, with the consent of the granter of the same, be settled in the contract made in consideration of the marriage of such child, and such child so marrying shall die before the granter of such provision, then, and in all such cases, the provision or any part thereof so settled in consideration of such marriage, shall remain and be effectual as if such child had survived the granter."

That is quite distinct language of the Aberdeen Act, that a provision in terms of the liberty given by it to the heir in possession should not be effectual except in favour of younger children who survive the granter, except in the case of a provision settled in a marriage-contract, but that it shall in that case be effectual in favour of the child although he does not survive the granter. I have pointed out that the entail here, which gives liberty to the heir in possession, contains no provision upon either subject, and if the question had arisen upon it only, we should have had to consider whether there was anything contained in the deed giving this provision which limited it to younger children not succeeding to the estate who survived the granter, and how that might have been decided I have not considered in this case, because there is no claim made here for any child who predeceased the granter, except the child for whom a provision was made in his marriage-contract, or fixed in his marriage-contract, viz., Robert.

Therefore we have only to consider whether in the case of an entail containing a liberty to provide three years' free rent, we shall read the power given by it as more limited than the power which the Aberdeen Act gives to the granter. Now, I should not be disposed to do that in any case or in any view, but I think that the Aberdeen Act is itself expressly applicable, for it gives a larger power, because the preamble of it signifies that it means to enlarge the powers which are given by existing entails which contain them. If existing entails contain any power, then the Aberdeen Act will not limit it; for the purpose of that Act is to extend the liberty, not to restrain it. I do not read the preamble, but I call attention to it to shew that that is the meaning and intent of the statute. Therefore if I had any difficulty in holding that the power which is given by this Shieldhill entail to the heir in possession to give three years' free rent to his younger children, may be construed as entitling him to make a provision in favour of a child who is about to be married—I say, if I read the entail as not extending the giving of liberties so far, I should hold that the liberty was so far extended by the Aberdeen Act, for the purpose and intention of that Act, as I have said already, is to extend to the extent which is specified in the Act the liberty which is contained in any deed of entail. Therefore I hold it to be clear that Mr Chancellor who made this provision was at liberty, so far as the obligation upon succeeding heirs of entail was concerned, to make a binding obligation upon them in the marriage-contract of his son Robert, although Robert predeceased him, it being provided that it should have effect although the married child in whose contract the provision was made or guaranteed by the father predeceased him. Now, that leads clearly to the decision of the only point which was argued before us, in favour of those claiming through Robert, to the effect that the provision made in his favour, and guaranteed by the father in his marriage-contract, is good, although Robert predeceased him, and that it must therefore go according to Robert's will.

I have stated that there was another child who predeceased the father, viz., his eldest son. He is now represented by a daughter, for whom, however, no claim is lodged. If a claim had been lodged on her behalf I must say I should have been very favourable to it. The only answer to it that occurs to me is that if the eldest son had survived he would have succeeded to the entailed estate, and that the provision in the marriage-contract is only in favour of the children who did not succeed to the entailed estate, or the children of those predeceasing who would not have succeeded had they survived, and that as the eldest son would have taken nothing if he survived, his child could take nothing. I am not very much impressed by that argument, because it would apply to the second, third, and fourth sons—to every one of them if he had survived and been at the father's death the heir. They would have taken nothing, so that one son after another might have died leaving children, and none of them would have taken, because each of them in succession, if he had survived, would have taken the entailed estate. I think that is a kind of argument to which I would not give much favour; but we do not need to consider it at present at least, there being no claim put in for the daughter of the eldest son.

LORD TRAYNER.—The only question argued before us under this reclaiming note was, whether the £1500 appointed to Mr Robert Chancellor vested in him prior to his father's death. In dealing with this question I do not think it necessary to consider the distinction to which our attention was called between provisions to "children of the marriage" under a marriage-contract and to "younger children" under the powers conferred on heirs of entail by the Entail Statutes. The provisions made by Mr Chancellor under his marriage-contract are partly of the one character and partly of the other, inasmuch as the fund provided by Mr Chancellor, and over which he reserved to himself the power of appointment, consists of moveable estate belonging to him as an individual, and money to be provided out of the rents of the entailed estate of which he was the heir in possession. This question which we have to determine (which appears to be one as much of trust law as of entail law) is not affected by the distinction referred to, seeing that under Mr Chancellor's marriage-contract the terms "children of the marriage" and "younger children" are used to describe the same class, namely, the children of the marriage not succeeding to the entailed estate. It is in favour of "younger children" in this technical sense that Mr Chancellor reserved power to appoint, and it is in this view of his power that I deal with the question before us. The facts of the case need not be resumed. From them it clearly appears, I think, that Mr Chancellor intended that the £1500 appointed to his son Robert should vest at once. There is no intelligible explanation on any other ground why the deed of appointment should so carefully provide and declare that it was an irrevocable deed, to be held as delivered from the date of the execution, and still less why under it Robert should have been taken bound to assign the sum appointed to him to the trustee under his marriage-contract then about to be executed. Mr Chancellor evidently thought that he was providing, and intended to provide, his son not with a mere expectancy, but with a fund which that son could settle on his intended wife, and their children if they had any. Now, was there any reason why the vesting so plainly intended should not take effect? It is contended that such vesting could not take effect because the persons entitled to take the fund under Mr Chancellor's appointment could not be definitely ascertained until his death; before that event it was impossible to say who would be the heir of entail, and who younger children. The fact here stated is true, but the inference drawn from it does not necessarily follow. Robert might have been heir of entail no doubt. But at the date of the appointment to him, and at the date of his death, he was a younger child. Even had he survived his father he would still have held the same character, seeing that there was then surviving a son older than Robert. Accordingly, at the date when the appointment was made, Robert was an object of the power, and continued to be so as long as he lived. There was nothing in the

No. 85.

Jan. 24, 1896. Chancellor's Trustees v. Sharples' Trustees.

Shieldhill entail or in Mr Chancellor's marriage-contract to prevent him dividing or apportioning the fund so as to make it vest during his lifetime. The only reference in the marriage-contract to any right to be conferred after Mr Chancellor's death is the equal division of the fund among the objects of the power, failing apportionment by Mr Chancellor himself. This provision cannot affect the question before us, seeing that quoad Robert, there had been no failure to appoint. Had Robert lived and succeeded to the entailed estate, the right vested in him by the deed of appointment would have been ineffectual, because then Robert would not have been an object of the power, and no claim could have been enforced by him in respect of it.

Nor should it be forgotten that Mr Chancellor was dealing with a fund of his own providing, of which he had the absolute disposal except in so far as limited by the terms of his marriage-contract. Seeing, therefore, that he intended Robert's share to vest at once, that nothing in the marriage-contract prevented such vesting, and that the appointment in favour of Robert was valid as in favour of an object of the power, I am of opinion that vesting took place in Robert, and that the claim of his executrix to the £1500 should be sustained.

The case of Oswald[1] cited to us, but not brought under the consideration of the Lord Ordinary, appears to be quite in point.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the opinions which your Lordships have expressed.

Ship—Charter-party—Agreement by owner to insure—Risk—Owner and charterer—Collision—Relief—Maritime lien.—A steam-trawler was hired out by her owner under a time charter, whereby the charterer was to find crew, stores, &c., and the owner was "to pay insurance only." The owner, inter alia, insured against loss from having to pay damages for injury which might be caused by the trawler to other vessels with the exception of one-fifth of three-fourths of such loss.

The trawler, through the fault of the charterer's crew, caused damage to another vessel, and the owner of the trawler, without notice to the charterer, settled the claim, and was reimbursed by the insurance company to the extent of his insurance.

In an action raised by the owner against the charterer for the balance of loss, held that as the pursuer had settled the claim without notice to the defender, he had no right of relief against him on the ground that it had been caused by his fault.

Observed that the owner of the trawler was not liable for damage caused by the charterer's fault to other vessels.

Question whether the owner of the trawler was bound, for the benefit of the charterer, to insure against loss from damage done by the trawler to other vessels.

1st Division.
Lord Low.

By agreement, dated 14th June 1894, John Martin Clarke, ship-owner, Leith, hired his steam-trawler "Rosslyn" to James R. Scott for three months, at £14 a-week. The agreement provided,—"The said James Scott to find crew, stores, &c., and all working expenses . . . the said J. M. Clarke to pay insurance only."

The charterer obtained possession of the boat, and worked her from Shields with his own crew.

In August 1894 the "Rosslyn" came into collision with the "Hugo Georg" of Stettin, admittedly through the fault of the charterer and his crew, and both vessels were damaged, the latter the more seriously of the two."

The "Rosslyn" was insured at the date of the agreement with two insurance associations to the extent only of four-fifths of her value, the rules of the associations providing that the owners must underwrite one-fifth of the value of the vessel insured. In the policy of assurance there was a collision clause in terms of which the insured was entitled to recover all damage done in collision to another vessel which the insured might be found liable to pay, with the exception of one-fifth of three-fourths, for which the insured was liable.

After the collision Mr Clarke, the owner of the "Rosslyn," without consulting the charterer, settled with the owners of the "Hugo Georg" for the injury done to the vessel. The amount was fixed at £264, 18s. 6d., of which the insurance associations paid £225, being the total amount, less one-fifth of three-fourths. The balance of £39, 14s. 9d. was paid by Clarke.

On 31st December 1894 Clarke raised an action against Scott for payment, inter alia, of the sum of £39, 14s. 9d.

The pursuer averred,—(Cond. 2) "The said vessel was taken over by the defender on 21st June, and was then, and continued to be until the expiry of the charter, entirely in the charge and under the control of the charterer and his crew. At the time of the said agreement being made, the 'Rosslyn' was insured to the extent of four-fifths of the value of said vessel, this being the highest amount for which vessels of the class of the 'Rosslyn' can be insured. This was well known to the defender, who has himself effected insurances on vessels of the same class on exactly the same footing. The pursuer duly paid the premiums of insurance on said vessel, in terms of the agreement. It was the understanding of both parties that the clause as to the payment of insurance had reference to the existing insurance on said vessel by which she was covered as fully as vessels of her class can be when insured in the ordinary clubs in which all trawlers of her class are insured. The said clause, if it implied any obligation on the pursuer to insure at all, implied only that the said vessel should be insured in the manner usually adopted in the case of trawlers, and did not impose on the pursuer any obligation, as now maintained by the defender, of covering the whole vessel by insurance. Had the pursuer attempted to insure the remaining one-fifth not already covered by insurance, the policies then current on the vessel would have been liable to immediate forfeiture, in terms of the club rules. This was well known to the defender." The defender answered,—(Ans. 2) "Admitted that the vessel was taken over on the 21st June and worked by the defender in terms of the charter-party. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that it was distinctly understood that the pursuer was to fully insure his vessel against all risks, and that this was the understanding of the parties in reference to the clause as to insurance in the charter-party. The pursuer could without difficulty have insured the vessel to the full amount of her value."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having suffered loss and injury to the amount concluded for, through the fault of the defender or of those for whom he is responsible, he is entitled to decree therefor, with expenses.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The action is irrelevant.

At a proof the facts above narrated were proved. It was also proved that while the practice was to insure vessels of the "Rosslyn" class with such associations as she had been insured with by the pursuer, she might have been insured at Lloyds' for full value. The defender knew nothing about the pursuer's insurance with or the rules enforced by the associations. There was no evidence of the extent of the injuries sustained by the "Hugo Georg," and the pursuer, the material parts of whose evidence are quoted by Lord Kinnear, settled with the underwriters without any communication with the defender.

On 29th June 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Low) assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the action.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The 'Rosslyn' was insured by the pursuer in two insurance and indemnity associations or clubs, the one at North Shields and the other at Sunderland. It appears that under the rules of these associations it is impossible to insure for the full value. . . . The pursuer had insured for the greatest amount possible with the associations. It is also proved that the practice is to insure vessels of the description of the 'Rosslyn' with such clubs, as otherwise a very high rate of premium is demanded. It is not, however, in my judgment, proved that the vessel could not have been insured otherwise for full value. The evidence on the point is somewhat conflicting, but Mr Armit, who has had great experience, says that there is no doubt that the vessel could have been insured at Lloyds' for full value.

"After the collision the associations settled with the owners of the 'Hugo Georg' for the injury done to that vessel. The amount was fixed at £264, 18s. 6d., of which the associations paid £225, being the total amount less one-fifth of three-fourths. The balance of £39, 14s. 9d. was paid by the pursuer, and that is the first sum which he seeks to recover from the defender. The pursuer admits that no communications passed between him and the defender in regard to the claim of the 'Hugo Georg,' and that the defender had nothing to do with the settlement.

"It is clear from the agreement that the insurance of the vessel was left with the pursuer. But he says that he was under no obligation to insure the vessel to her full value, and that having insured her in the usual way and to the usual amount, he is entitled to recover from the defender the uninsured balance of the loss, which was occasioned by the defender's fault. The pursuer argues that the £39 which he has paid to the owners of the 'Hugo Georg' is money which he has lost through the fault of the defender, and which the latter must therefore repay.

"I do not think that it is necessary to determine whether the pursuer came under an obligation to the defender to insure the vessel, or to insure her for the full value. But however that may be, I cannot read the con-

Clarke v. Scott.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The agreement left the pursuer free if he chose not to insure the vessel, but to take the risk himself, and at most it meant that he must insure to the extent to which vessels of the class of the "Rosslyn" were usually insured. In ordinary practice trawlers were not insured so as to cover the whole risk, and the defender was quite aware that the pursuer had insured the "Rosslyn" on these terms. As the pursuer then was admittedly free from liability for the collision, he was entitled to recover from the defender, who was liable, the loss not covered by insurance. (2) Alternatively, the pursuer was bound by the agreement to insure not only for his own interest, but also as agent for the defender. He was consequently entitled in the same capacity to make the best settlement for the defender he could with the underwriters, and the defender must abide by the settlement.[1] (3) Lastly, had the pursuer not made this settlement, he could not have escaped the operation of the English law of maritime lien, for the vessel had proceeded to an English port after the collision.[2]

Argued for the defender;—The charterer was entitled to rely on the pursuer fulfilling his obligation under the agreement to insure the "Rosslyn." The pursuer might have insured the vessel to the full value, but as he chose to take the risk in regard to one-fifth of three-fourths the loss must fall on him alone.[3] (2) The defender was tract otherwise than as meaning that the pursuer was to take the risk of the vessel being uninsured either in whole or in part.

"I therefore do not think that the £39 can be claimed from the defender ex contractu, and if the claim is well founded at all, it must be ex delicto.

"The claim appears to me to be one of relief, the pursuer seeking to be relieved of the sums which he has paid in respect of the injuries to the 'Hugo Georg' over and above the amount covered by his insurance. Now, I do not think that the pursuer was liable to the owners of the 'Hugo Georg' at all. The 'Rosslyn' was hired or demised to the defender, and he had the sole control of her, and worked her by his own crew. In these circumstances it appears to me that it was the defender (whose servants were in fault), and not the pursuer, who was responsible to the owners of the 'Hugo Georg' for the injuries caused by the collision. The pursuer, however, elected through his underwriters to settle the claim of the owners, and he did so, as I have said, without any communication with the defender. He did not intimate to the defender that he proposed to hold him liable in relief; and the defender was given no opportunity of considering or objecting to the claim. Further, the amount paid by the underwriters and the pursuer was not fixed by any decree, but was apparently adjusted between the underwriters and the claimants. No doubt the probability is that the underwriters made a prudent settlement of the amount, but it cannot be assumed against the defender that if the claim had been enforced against him a smaller amount than that for which the underwriters settled might not have been awarded.

"In these circumstances I do not think that the pursuer has any claim of relief against the defender. The grounds of judgment in the case of Gardiner v. Main, Nov. 29, 1894, 22 R. 100, appear to me to be directly applicable. . . ."

primarily liable to settle with the owners of the "Hugo Georg" in the collision; and as the pursuer had without consulting him taken upon himself to settle the claims he could not recover from the defender.[1] (3) The pursuer's contention that he was the defender's agent to insure the vessel was inconsistent with the view that if he had pleased, he as owner was at liberty not to insure at all, and to take the risk. (4) Any settlement made by the pursuer in order to escape the operation of maritime lien must be made on the footing that it freed the charterer. But, further, it was settled that maritime lien only attached to a vessel when there was personal liability on the part of the owner.[2]

LORD KINNEAR.—The facts of the case are correctly stated in the first two paragraphs of the Lord Ordinary's opinion:—"By agreement dated 14th June 1894 the pursuer hired his steam-trawler 'Rosslyn' to the defender for the period of three months at the sum of £14 per week. It was provided as follows—'The said James Scott to find crew, stores, &c., and all working expenses, the boat to be handed over in good order and condition, and to be returned in the same good order and condition, fair wear and tear excepted, the said J. M. Clarke to pay insurance only.' The defender accordingly obtained possession of the boat, and worked her from Shields with his own crew. In August 1894 the 'Rosslyn' came into collision with the 'Hugo Georg' of Stettin, and both vessels were damaged, the latter the more seriously of the two. It is not disputed that the 'Rosslyn' was in fault."

Were it not for the stipulation that the pursuer should pay insurance, there can be no question as to liabilities arising from the fault of those in charge of the "Rosslyn." The pursuer had abandoned for the period of the contract all power and authority over the vessel. The charterer was the owner for the time being; the master and crew were his servants, he was in exclusive possession through them, and he was responsible for their negligence. It cannot be disputed that, but for the stipulation as to insurance, he would have been liable to make good to the pursuer the damage done to the "Rosslyn," nor that he, and not the pursuer, was responsible to the owners of the other vessel.

The first question is, whether his liability to the pursuer has been modified or discharged. I think with the Lord Ordinary that it was a term of the contract that the insurance which it was for the interest of the owner or for the common interest of both parties to make should be made by the pursuer, and therefore that he must be held to have relinquished any claim against the defender in respect of risk which might have been covered by insurance. The defender cannot be made liable for loss against which he might have protected himself and his owner by insurance had he not been entitled to rely upon such insurance being effected by the pursuer. It appears that at the time of the agreement the vessel was insured with certain mutual insurance societies, and that no new insurance was effected by the pursuer. But by the rules of these societies the pursuer could recover damage done in collision to another vessel with the exception of one-fifth of three-fourths, and he maintains that the defender must make good the balance. If the construction I have put upon the contract is sound, he cannot require the defender to supplement a defective insurance. But it is said first that a steam-trawler cannot be insured except to the extent of four-fifths of the value; and secondly that the existing insurance was known to both parties, and therefore that the contract must be construed with reference to its conditions. I think the evidence is against the pursuer on both of the points. I do not doubt that vessels of that class are commonly insured in mutual societies, the rules of which impose the limitation upon which the pursuer relies. But it is proved that they may also be insured at Lloyds' for their full value, and there is no evidence that the defender knew anything about the pursuer's insurance, or that he knew the rules of the mutual assurance associations. I see no ground, therefore, for holding that it was agreed or understood between the parties that the insurance should be restricted so as to throw upon the charterer the obligation of making good the damage which might have been covered. I think with the Lord Ordinary that the sound and reasonable view of the contract is, that the pursuer undertook to protect himself by such insurance as he might think fit, and therefore that he took upon himself the risk of the vessel being uninsured in whole or in part.

The second question depends upon somewhat different conditions. The pursuer was not responsible to the owners of the "Hugo Georg"—the vessel which was injured by collision with the "Rosslyn"—for the fault or negligence of the charterer or his servants. But he seems to have assumed that he was responsible as owner of the "Rosslyn." By the rules of the associations with which he was insured he was entitled to recover a proportion of any loss or damage for which he might become liable to the owners of any other ship or boat which might be injured by collision with the steamer insured; and he says that the damage done to the "Hugo Georg" was paid in the first instance by his underwriters—"In a question between me and the underwriters I assumed that I was the owner of the ship, and I communicated with them on that understanding. The amount of the claim by the 'Hugo Georg' was £264, and there was recovered a sum of £225, leaving £39 which I could not recover under the conditions of the policy"; and this sum he now seeks to recover from the defender. But he settled with the owners of the "Hugo Georg" through the underwriters without any notice to the defender. He says,—"I had no correspondence with the defender on the subject of the claim which the owners of the 'Hugo Georg' made against me. He had nothing to do with the settlement." There is no evidence of the grounds on which this settlement was made. It may be presumed that the insurers in their own interest would pay no more than was reasonable. But the fact remains that there is no evidence of the extent of the injury to the "Hugo Georg," and that the claims of her owners were settled by agreement without notice to the defender.

In these circumstances I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the pursuer has no claim to be relieved by the defender of payments which he made voluntarily and extrajudicially. But it was argued that the pursuer was bound to meet the claim of the owners of the "Hugo Georg," or at all events that he was entitled to step forward and take the settlement into his own hands, because he might have been compelled to satisfy their demand through the operation of a maritime lien by which his vessel might have been attached. There are decisions by which this argument might have been supported, but these decisions have been overruled by the judgment of the House of Lords in Morgan v. Castlegate Steamship Company,[1] where the true doctrine is laid down by Lord Watson to the effect that "inasmuch as every proceeding in rem is in substance a proceeding against the owner of the ship, a proper maritime lien must have its root in his personal liability." It follows that if another ship has been injured by reason of the negligence or want of skill of those in charge of the "Rosslyn," that vessel cannot be made the means of compensation if those in charge of her at the time were not the servants of the owner.

No. 86.

Clarke v. Scott.

Again, it is argued that by the stipulation with reference to insurance the defender had made the pursuer his agent for settling any claims which might be brought against him for damage done by the collision of the "Rosslyn" with other vessels. I am unable to see any ground for this inference. I do not think it necessary to determine whether the contract imposed any obligation on the pursuer to insure against risks in which he himself had no interest, and, in particular, whether it obliged him to insure the defender against any loss arising from his own fault, or from the carelessness or want of skill of his master or crew. I think this very doubtful. But if the contract has any bearing on this liability it is only by imposing an obligation on the pursuer to insure. I am unable to see how an obligation to insure the defender against certain risks can be held to create a right to be indemnified by the defender for loss arising from risks insured against, and as such obligation existed, he was either bound to effect additional insurance so as to cover the entire risk, or else he was bound to do nothing more than to give the defender the benefit of the existing insurance. In the one case he can have no claim against the defender, because he has not performed his own obligation. In the other case, his obligation was to assign the partial insurance, and he had no right or duty to interfere with the settlement, and no relation with the defender from which any authority can be inferred to fix the amount payable by him without notice and without inquiry. It was no doubt a very convenient method of fixing the amount of the claim to leave the settlement to the underwriter, and if the defender had been consulted, it might have been a very prudent thing for him to consent to that arrangement. But that was for him to consider, and not for the pursuer, unless the pursuer had agreed to take the risk upon himself. I must own I should have been well pleased if it had been possible to come to a different conclusion, because it seems to me very possible that the pursuer has paid what was really the defender's debt. But the defender, on the other hand, cannot be compelled to make good a debt which has not been proved. No evidence has been adduced of the damage for which he is said to be liable, and he is not bound by an agreement, of which he knew nothing, effected by persons whom he had not authorised to act for him.

Jan. 30, 1896. Murdison v. Scottish Football Union.

Reparation—Slander—Letter—Complaint to committee of association for sport—Privilege.—In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that the defender had acted as referee at a football match between members of two clubs belonging to a football union at which the pursuer was one of the players, that the defender had complained by letter to the committee of the union that the pursuer had during the match made offensive remarks about the defender, that the defender had at a meeting of the committee held to investigate the matter, given evidence in support of his complaint, and stated that the pursuer had called him "a bloody little brute,"—and that the pursuer had not used the language complained of. The pursuer set forth several innuendoes as to the import of the same words. The pursuer averred generally that the statements were made by the defender calumniously and maliciously. The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant, holding (1) that the statements complained of were not per se defamatory, and that the pursuer had not set forth a proper innuendo of a different and libellous meaning; and (2) that even if the words were defamatory, the defender, in the circumstances disclosed in the pursuer's statements on record, was privileged in making the complaint, and in supporting it before the committee, and that the pursuer had made no relevant averment of facts from which malice could be inferred.

Reparation—Slander—Association for sport—Resolution of committee—Publication in newspapers—Privilege—Issue.—The pursuer of an action of damages for slander called as defenders (1) "The Scottish Football Union and the members of the Committee of the Union" as such committee and as representing the said Union, and (2) certain members of the committee as individuals. The pursuer averred that the committee in consequence of a complaint by a referee as to pursuer's conduct at a football match between members of two clubs belonging to the Union, in which the pursuer was a player, arranged for a meeting of committee to inquire into the complaint, that it was ultra vires of the committee to hold such an inquiry, that the meeting was attended by the members of committee called as defenders individually, that the committee so composed adopted a finding that the pursuer had used offensive language to the referee, and passed a resolution that he should be severely censured and ordered to apologise to the referee, and that the finding and resolution were published in certain newspapers containing football intelligence throughout Scotland upon the instruction of the members of committee who attended the meeting. The pursuer also made averments to the effect that the inquiry had been conducted in an unfair and irregular manner. Held (1) that the pursuer was not entitled to an issue against the Union and its committee as representing it, the ground of his complaint being that the committee had acted outwith the authority of the Union; and (2) that the pursuer was entitled to an issue of slander against the members of the committee individually, and that having regard to the averments as to the publication in newspapers, and to the conduct of the inquiry, the pursuer's record did not necessarily imply privilege, and that it must be left to the presiding Judge, after hearing the evidence, to direct the jury whether the defenders were privileged.

Reparation—Association for sport—Suspension from playing football—Patrimonial loss — Issue — Relevancy.—Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that a resolution of a football union suspending a member of a club belonging to the union from playing did not entitle the member to an issue that the resolution had been "wrongfully, incompetently, and unwarrantably passed and caused to be published by the committee to his loss, injury, and damage," in respect that the alleged resolution was not one which affected any question of property or patrimonial interest, the appropriate issue, so far as the resolution affected reputation, being an issue of slander.

1st Division. Lord Kincairney.

In March 1895 Thomas B. Murdison, residing at Earlston, raised an action of damages against (1) The Scottish Football Union and their office-bearers, and certain individuals named, being, with the office-bearers, the committee of the union, as such committee and as representing the union; (2) M. C. M'Ewan and others, members of the committee, as individuals; and (3) James Dick junior. The action concluded for payment of £1000 from the first defenders "as committee foresaid, and as representing the said union," and the second defenders, as individuals, and of £500 from the third defender, Dick.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 1) "The pursuer is a member and vice-captain of the Gala Football Club, which is a member of the Scottish Football Union. The said Union is composed of all such clubs in Scotland playing the game of football under Rugby Union rules as apply for and are admitted to its membership. . . . The affairs of the Union are conducted by a committee, . . . the first defenders . . . presently constitute the committee." (Cond. 2) "On 27th October 1894 a football match was played on the Gala Football Club's ground at Mossilee, Galashiels, between a fifteen of the Gala Football Club and a fifteen of the Watsonian Club, the headquarters of which are in Edinburgh. The Watsonian Club is also a member of the Scottish Football Union. The match was played under Rugby rules, and the third defender acted as referee. The pursuer was present, and played in said match for the Gala Football Club. In the course of the game the third defender gave several judgments as referee of which the crowd of spectators did not approve, and of which they expressed their disapprobation by shouts, groans, hooting, hissing, and other means. None of the players took any part in these demonstrations against the third defender's judgments."

(Cond. 3) "On the day of the said match, namely, 27th October

In the said letter of 29th October the third defender falsely, calumniously, maliciously, and without probable cause, wrote of and concerning the pursuer's conduct at the said football match on the 27th of October as follows:—'I can give the name of one player who was probably the worst offender, both in questioning my decisions and in making offensive remarks. Even if the pursuer had actually acted as stated, and had used the language complained of, the third defender had no right or duty, under the laws of the Scottish Football Union in force at the time, to lay the said accusation against the pursuer before the Committee of the Scottish Football Union, nor had the said Union, or the said committee or any of its members, jurisdiction to deal in any manner of way with the said accusation on its being made. * James Dick junior to Secretary of the Football Union.—Edinburgh, 27th October 1894.—"Dear Sir,—As referee in the match, Watsonians v. Galashiels, at Galashiels, to-day, I regret that I find it my duty to report the treatment I received there. During the match, which was a fast and exciting one throughout, my decisions were repeatedly questioned by members of the Galashiels team, and I was the object of several offensive remarks. The spectators hooted and hissed every decision of mine which was not in favour of the local team—this I may say the Galashiels team made no effort to prevent. Immediately on the call of time I was surrounded by the entire crowd of spectators, and but for the prompt action of Messrs Gordon Cochrane, W. S. Brown, and a few members of both teams, would have fared badly. We had to fight our way to the pavilion, and after leaving the field were pelted with mud, &c., and followed by hundreds of men and boys till safely within Mr Cochrane's house. Beyond a few kicks on the legs, and a blow from a stone on the back of the head, I sustained no injury. The Watsonians were similarly treated during their drive to the hotel. As to a reason for the demonstration I am at a loss. If I was glaringly unfair, I presume the Galashiels team will appeal to the Union Committee regarding my decisions, otherwise the matter is more inexplicable and unwarranted. I make no further comment, but simply leave this letter in your hands, to be dealt with as you see fit."

ducing them to take the incompetent course of considering it, and taking such action with regard to it as would injure the pursuer in the eyes of the public at large, and more especially of Rugby football players."

(Cond. 4) "The said letter of 29th October 1894, written and dispatched by the third defender, as set forth in the preceding article, was in part of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely, calumniously, and maliciously represented, and was intended to represent, the pursuer as having used coarse and improper language unbecoming a gentleman and a member of a club in the Scottish Football Union, as being a person who did not play the game of football fairly in accordance with the laws of said game, and, in particular, as being a person who, in defiance of said laws, openly challenged and repudiated the authority of the appointed referee, and as being a person unworthy to play football with the members of clubs composing the said Union, and with whom the members of said other clubs ought not to play football; and further, represented the pursuer as being a person who had falsely and calumniously imputed gross partiality and unfairness, or at least gross incompetency to the said third defender in his actings as referee at said match, and had falsely and calumniously represented that the said defender was unfit for the post of referee, and was a dishonest umpire. These imputations were wholly unfounded, and have led to the pursuer being wrongfully excluded, as after mentioned, from playing in clubs and with clubs belonging to the Union. The pursuer through this exclusion has been greatly injured, not only in his feelings but in his reputation."

(Cond. 5) "On receipt of the letters, the defender J. A. Smith arranged for a meeting of the committee of the Scottish Football Union, called here as the first defenders, to be held on 9th November 1894, at which the said accusation preferred against the pursuer by the third defender in the said letter of 29th October was to be submitted and considered. It was ultra vires and quite out of the competence of the said committee to hold such an investigation regarding the said accusation, and the whole inquiry, so far as it related to the pursuer, was wrongful and improper, and known by the first and by the second defenders to be so. The arrangements for the said meeting were made in a grossly partial and irregular manner, and in defiance of the most elementary ideas of fair play and justice to a person accused of any serious act of misconduct. The committee's officials resolved at said meeting of 9th November to investigate also the disturbances alleged to have been caused by members of the general public at the said football match held at Galashiels on 27th October 1894. The pursuer believes that the investigation of said disturbances by the committee of the Scottish Football Union was also ultra vires and incompetent. In any view the said disturbances were quite distinct from, and had no connection with, the third defender's accusation against the pursuer. Notwithstanding this the said committee, through their said secretary, communicated with the officials of the Gala Football Club and of the Watsonian Club, requesting them to send certain representatives of their respective clubs, selected by the said committee to attend an inquiry relative to said disturbances, to be held by the committee in Edinburgh on the said 9th of November 1894, but they did not, in the notice sent to the Gala Club, make any reference whatever to the accusation against the pursuer. The pursuer, as vice-captain of his club, and as having seen part of said disturbances, was one of the persons whom said committee requested to attend their inquiry. Neither when the pursuer was invited to attend, nor at any time prior to said inquiry, was intimation made to him that any accusation had been made or was to be investigated relating to himself personally, and no opportunity was given him of bringing witnesses to prove his innocence of such accusation." (Cond. 6) "As requested by said committee the pursuer attended the said inquiry on 9th November. The second defenders called in the summons constituted the members of committee who were present, and conducted said inquiry. . . . Thereafter the said defender, J. A. Smith, and the remanent members of the committee then present, quite illegally resolved that they could not sit in committee with Mr Mabon. Mabon, who is a press correspondent, was thus induced not to sit on the committee. The said committee conducted their inquiry in private. . . ."

The third defender Dick was examined as a witness, and "in the presence and hearing of the second defenders, or one or more of them, he falsely, calumniously, maliciously, and without probable cause, not only read and reiterated the charges against the pursuer contained in his said letters of 27th and 29th October, but further charged the pursuer with having, at said match on 27th October, called him (the third defender) 'a bloody little brute.' Said charges were absolutely unfounded." In the course of pursuer's examination as a witness, "the letter of 29th October, written by the third defender, as stated in cond. 3, was read to the pursuer, and he was asked if the accusation it contained was true. He replied that it was absolutely untrue, and gave all explanations sought by the committee. This was the first time he had heard of said letter, or had learned its contents. Neither prior to his examination nor at any stage was it explained to him that he was on trial regarding the charge against him contained in said letter, nor was any indication given that the explanations given by him were not accepted by the committee, or were in conflict with statements made by other witnesses. He was left in entire ignorance that other witnesses had been examined regarding said charge; no specific words alleged to have been used by him at the match were put to him as having been spoken to by the third defender or other witnesses; no opportunity was given him of hearing and cross-examining said witnesses; and no suggestion was made that he should bring forward evidence to corroborate his own statements, or that he incurred any risk of censure or suspension." (Cond. 7) "After this grossly unfair, misleading, and partial inquiry, . . . the committee, on or about 9th November 1894, falsely, calumniously, maliciously, and without probable cause, adopted and published a pretended finding in the following terms:—'That T. Murdison used offensive language to the referee,' the third defender; and further, adopted and published a pretended resolution in the following terms:—'That T. Murdison be severely censured and be ordered to apologise to the referee.' . . . . The said committee specially instructed their secretary to communicate their decision to the press. The pursuer declined to apologise for what he had not done. . . . . On or about 6th December 1894 the members of committee, who are the second defenders, or some of them,* falsely, calumniously, maliciously, and without probable cause, adopted and published a pretended resolution in the following or similar terms:—'That T. Murdison be suspended from playing until the committee withdraw the suspension.' All the said pretended findings and resolutions were published in newspapers containing football intelligence throughout Scotland with the first and second defenders' knowledge and sanction, and thus obtained wide publicity among football players and among the general public. The pursuer's suspension and all the said pretended findings and resolutions were ultra vires of the said defenders, and incompetent and illegal." (Cond. 8) "The suspension thus pronounced has never been withdrawn. Though utterly illegal and incompetent, its effect is to prevent the pursuer from playing in any club or against any club which is a member of the Football Union. Such clubs refuse to play along with or against any person who has a professional stigma set against him, and in consequence of the jurisdiction asserted by the first and second defenders, members of clubs composing the union decline to play with or against the pursuer, for fear that the said defenders should treat their doing so as an offence. The defenders' finding, to the effect that the pursuer had used offensive language to the third defender, was without foundation or warrant. The first defenders, as committee foresaid, and the second defenders, as the individual members concerned in passing the said resolution, in coming to the said finding, proceeded on partial and defective information, and were influenced by partial and improper considerations, and their whole proceedings, which led up to the finding and consequent resolution, were incompetent, irregular, and highly injurious to the pursuer. By the said finding, and by the censure and pretended suspension of the pursuer, the first defenders and second defenders falsely, calumniously, maliciously, and without probable cause, represented the pursuer as having, during the progress of said football match on 27th October 1894, used coarse and improper language, unbecoming a gentleman and a member of a club included in the Scottish Football Union, as being a person who did not play the game of football fairly in accordance with the laws of said game, and, in particular, as being a person who, in defiance of said laws, openly challenged and repudiated the authority of the appointed referee, and as being a person unfit to take part in the sports of gentlemen, and as a person whom all respectable football players should avoid; and further, as being a person who had falsely and calumniously imputed gross partiality and unfairness, or at least gross incompetency to the third defender in his actings as referee at said match, and had falsely and calumniously represented that the said defender was unfit for the post of referee, and was a dishonest umpire. The finding and resolution of the first and second defenders, and the letters and statements of the third defender were intended to injure the pursuer, and to hold him up to public hatred and contempt, and the pursuer was thereby injured, and calumniously and injuriously exposed to public hatred and contempt. He has suffered, not only in his reputation as an individual, but also as a football player, and, in consequence thereof, he has been excluded from playing the game of football in clubs and against clubs which are members of the Union. . . ."

All the defenders pleaded that the action was irrelevant and incompetent. The first and second defenders also pleaded;—(4) No libel. (5) Privilege. The third defender also pleaded;—(3) This defender not having libelled the pursuer; et separatim, having acted in good faith and in the performance of his duty as referee, is entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses. (4) Veritas.

The pursuer proposed thirteen issues. The first eight were directed against the third defender, and the ninth to the twelfth against the first and second defenders.* The thirteenth issue was as fol-

* Issues 1 to 4 were laid on the letters. Whether the letters falsely and calumniously represented that the pursuer had at the football match—

(First issue)—"Used coarse and improper language unbecoming a gentleman and a member of a club in the Scottish Football Union, and as being a person who did not play the game of football fairly in accordance with the laws of said game, and, in particular, as being a person who, in defiance of said laws, openly challenged and repudiated the authority of the appointed referee, and as being a person unworthy to play football with the members of clubs composing the said union, and with whom the members of said other clubs ought not to play football. . ."

(Second issue)—"Misconducted himself in such a way as to merit punishment at the hands of any person or persons entitled to inflict it . . ."

(Third issue)—"Falsely and calumniously accused the defender James Dick of gross partiality and unfairness, and of incompetence and dishonesty, when acting as referee in said match . . ."

The fourth issue was—"Whether the statements in the said letters are in part of and concerning the pursuer, and are, in so far as concerning the pursuer, false; and whether they were made of and concerning the pursuer with the intention of exposing, and did expose, him to hatred and contempt . . ."

Issues 5 to 8 were laid on the statements made at the meeting of committee by the defender, as follows:—"Whether, on or about 9th November 1894, at a meeting of the committee of the Scottish Football Union held at Edinburgh, and in presence and hearing of the second defenders, or one or more of them, the defender James Dick junior falsely and calumniously stated of and concerning the pursuer that he (the pursuer) had used offensive remarks towards and in particular had called the said defender, at a football match played at Mossilee, Galashiels, on 27th October 1894, 'a bloody little brute,' or 'a dirty little beast,' or had used similar language towards him, and whether the said defender thereby falsely and calumniously represented the pursuer as having at the football match referred to":—

(Sixth issue)—"Misconducted," &c., as in second issue.

(Seventh issue)—"Falsely and calumniously," &c., as in third issue.

(Eighth issue)—"And whether," as in fourth issue.

Issues 9 to 12 had in common the following:—"Whether, on or about 9th November 1894, the Scottish Football Union, through its committee, and the said committee and the second defenders, or one or other and which of them, or one or more and which of the second defenders, acting in concert, made a finding and passed a resolution in name of the said committee, and directed the defender James Aikman Smith to transmit the said finding and resolution to Mr William Wintrup, honorary secretary of the Gala Football Club, and to publish the same in the newspaper press, and whether the said James Aikman Smith did, on or about 10th November 1894, acting as secretary of the first defenders, and on the instructions of the first and second defenders, or one or other and which of them, or one or more and which of the second defenders, in name of the said committee, send a letter to the said Mr William Wintrup, and insert a statement in the newspaper press, in which the said finding and resolution were set forth as follows, videlicet:—'That T. Murdison used offensive language'; 'that Murdison be suspended from playing until the committee withdraw the suspension,' to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

The pursuer apportioned among the several issues the sums concluded for as damages.

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), on 26th July 1895, pronounced an interlocutor refusing all the issues proposed except the 13th, which he approved of as the issue for the trial of the cause, and dismissing the action against the defender Dick as irrelevant.*

"Whether the said finding and resolution are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represent . . ."

Issues 9 to 12 were in their order quoad ultra in the same terms as the portions of issues 1 to 4 respectively above quoted.

* "OPINION.—(After narrating the facts)—I am not prepared to dismiss the action as incompetent. The charges against the Football Union, and the committee, and its individual members are, it is true, quite different from those made against the third defender, Dick; but that defender is sued for a separate sum of damages. The charges, however, involve much the same inquiry, and it does not seem to be incompetent—although I doubt whether it is convenient—to combine with the action against him, the separate and different claim against the Union and the committee, and its members. But the defenders maintained that the incompetency of the action arose from this, that a slump sum of £1000 was claimed against two defenders, distinguished in the summons as being different parties, viz:—the Union and the committee in the first place, and, secondly, the individual members of the committee; and it was said that the action was therefore incompetent on the authority of the cases of Barr v. Neilson, 20th March 1868, 6 Macph. 651, and Taylor v. M'Dougal & Son, 15th July 1885, 12 R. 1304. The objection is strict and technical, and I rather think that these cases do not apply, because all of these defenders, supposing them different, appear to have been participant in the acts of which the pursuer complains, and the question raised by the action is whether all or any of the defenders are chargeable with and liable in damages for acts in which they are all said to have been participant. There is no decision that such an action is incompetent.

"The cases of Somerville v. Rowbotham, 27th June 1862, 24 D. 1187, and The Renton Football Club v. M'Dowall, 13th March 1891, 18 R. 670, seem to meet any objection to the manner in which the Football Union has been called.

"Holding then that it is not necessary to dismiss the action as incompetent, it is necessary to consider its relevancy, and the issues which have been lodged, on which, indeed, the argument mainly turned.

"The first eight issues are directed against the defender Dick, and the other defenders have no concern with them. Dick, on the other hand, has nothing to do with the remaining five issues. The first four issues are laid on his two letters to the secretary of the Union above quoted, and the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth, on the evidence which he gave at the inquiry instituted by the committee of the Union.

"Now, speaking generally, it appears to me that the letters are temper-

The pursuer reclaimed.

During the debate in the Inner-House the pursuer proposed to amend his record by deleting the words "or some of them," in cond. 7 above quoted, and by adding to the same condescendence the following averments:—"Upon the said committee's instructions the finding and resolution of 9th November 1894 were communicated to, inter alia, the following newspapers, viz., the Edinburgh Evening Dispatch and the Glasgow Herald, and on or about 7th December 1894 the resolution of 6th December was also communicated to the said Edinburgh Evening Dispatch newspaper. These newspapers and others published the said finding and resolution of 9th November so communicated in their issues of the following dates, viz., the Edinburgh Evening Dispatch on the 12th November 1894, and the Glasgow Herald on the 12th November 1894. Subsequently the said resolution of 6th December was published in the issue of the Edinburgh Evening Dispatch on the 7th."

ately and moderately expressed, and bring before the Committee a legitimate complaint, without the use of exaggerated or defamatory language. Further, I think that, supposing Mr Dick had reason, as referee, to make a complaint at all, his complaint was addressed to the proper quarter, and that altogether independent of any special rules on the subject.

"It was argued that, according to the rules of the Union, complaints, when competent, fell to be made to the Union, not to the committee. But the Union is a body of such a nature that it must of necessity act through a committee; and I think that a complaint to the Union could only be made to it through the committee, and that every complaint to the Committee was also a complaint to the Union. Further, I consider that the power to take cognisance of the conduct of the clubs which were members of the Union during their matches, and to entertain complaints about such conduct, was necessarily inherent in such a body as the Union, and in the committee by which its affairs were carried on.

"Such letters as those under consideration, being letters bringing definite charges before the appropriate body or tribunal, are not readily to be extended beyond their natural meaning by innuendo, so as to make them embody charges which their words do not fairly express. The two letters read together import no more than that the pursuer used language which was offensive to the referee, and that he questioned his decisions.

"Coming to the issues, I am of opinion that the innuendo in the first goes far beyond what the letter, according to any reasonable interpretation, will bear. Perhaps the innuendo that it represented the pursuer as having used at the match coarse and improper language unbecoming a gentleman, and as being a person who, in defiance of the laws of the game, repudiated the authority of the referee, might be laid before a jury as a meaning which the letters might possibly bear. But all the innuendo beyond that must be disallowed. I am, however, of opinion that the letters so innuendoed are not actionable. They challenge the pursuer's manners and behaviour, but not his character. The pursuer referred to Murray v. Campbell, 25th July 1833, 11 S. 1031, but the language there held actionable was very much more objectionable and defamatory than these letters are according to any possible interpretation. In Jex Blake v. Craig, 7th July 1871, 9 Macph. 973, on which also the pursuer founded, a letter was held to be actionable which embodied a charge of using foul language; but that charge did not stand alone, but was coupled with a charge of drunkenness. I think these cases do not warrant this issue, and that it must be disallowed.

"The second issue puts a somewhat different innuendo on the letter. I am of opinion that the innuendo in this issue is not extractable from the record nor deducible from the letters; and that, besides, it would not

The defenders maintained that the amendment should only be allowed on condition of payment by the pursuer of expenses since the closing of the record, and argued;—If the amendment was unnecessary, it should not be allowed; if it was necessary, that shewed that the action was irrelevant without it.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question at present before us is, What are the conditions upon which we should allow the pursuer's proposed amendments. It seems clear that the party proposing to amend must pay the expenses incurred in the Inner-House, inasmuch as the expense of the discussion here has been wasted. Quite possibly he may ultimately be found liable to pay a proportion of the expenses in the Outer-House subsequent to the date of closing the record; but that is a complicated question, which it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for us to determine at this stage. Accordingly, the safe course seems to be to allow the proposed amendments conditionally upon payment of expenses in the Inner-House. With reference to the cases cited by Mr Ure, I do not read them as laying support an action of damages. There is no authority for the proposition that it is actionable to say that a man's conduct merits punishment. Further, I should, in any case, disallow this issue as calculated to confuse and mislead a jury.

"The third issue puts the question whether the letters accuse the pursuer of having calumniously accused the defender Dick of partiality and unfairness and of incompetence as a referee. The innuendo is not very easy to follow, and it requires a great deal of ingenuity to torture Mr Dick's letters into any such meaning. The issue is based on the assumption that an accusation of slander is itself a slander. I think that there may be cases when it would be so—such as Milne v. Smith, 23d November 1892, 19 R. 95, and Waugh v. Ayrshire Post, 22d December 1893, 21 R. 326, but that there is no such general rule. I think that cases of that kind are special, and even exceptional. They must depend on the nature and gravity of the initial slander; and it savours of absurdity to affirm that it is defamatory and actionable to accuse a man of having said of another man that he had on a particular occasion shown partiality and incompetency as a referee in a football match. There is no precedent for an issue such as that.

"I am further of opinion that Mr Dick, in writing these letters to the committee of the Union, was unquestionably in a strong position of privilege; and further, that this is a case in which a general averment of malice is insufficient, and that the record contains no sufficient averment of particulars from which malice can be inferred. I think that there is really no such statement. The cases on this point were quoted and commented on at the argument. I have carefully considered them, and find it difficult to extract from them any very clear principle and distinction. I think they are consistent with the conclusion I have expressed.

"The fourth issue is, I suppose, alternative, and is suggested to meet the case of the issues proper to an action for defamation not being allowed. It is an issue founded on what is called verbal injury. The pursuer argued that it received support from the recent case of Paterson v. Welch, 31st May 1893, 20 R. 744, which was commented on in Waddell v. Roxburgh, 9th June 1894, 21 R. 883, in which latter case an issue of this kind was not allowed. I am, however, of opinion that the present is not such a case down, as an inflexible rule, that no amendment of the record is allowed in the Inner-House except upon payment of expenses from the closing of the record. Our practice is more discriminating, and has regard to the quality of the amendment. The rubric of the report in Morgan, Gellibrand, & Company[1] has very well caught the spirit of the principle,—"Amendment of record, involving considerable alteration of the pleadings, or a change of the ground of action, will be allowed in the Inner-House, either in reclaiming notes or in appeals, only on payment of the expenses in the cause from the date of closing the record, and the account of expenses must be paid before further hearing by the Court."

The true principle of the rule is that the expense occasioned by some defect in the record, which is to be remedied by the amendments proposed, must be borne by the party amending, and if such defect be of a radical nature, then the date for fixing the term when expenses become due is the date of the closing of the record. But this rule does not preclude the Court from making less onerous conditions in allowing less radical amend-as was contemplated in Paterson v. Welch, and that that case does not apply; and that the fourth issue ought also to be disallowed.

"The fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth issues are also directed solely against Mr Dick, and relate to his evidence before the committee. They differ from the previous issues only so far as they refer to the abusive words which Dick charged Murdison with using about him at the match. Now, the assertion that Murdison had used such words, although an exceedingly unpleasant assertion, was no attack on his personal character. It was only an assertion that, on a particular occasion, Murdison had shewn a great want of good manners. Assuming, as I assume, that Murdison did not use the vulgar language imputed to him, the assertion that he did so was undoubtedly exceedingly provoking and disagreeable. But there is, I think, no authority for making the imputation of having used such unmannerly language the ground of an action of damages. The law does not give a remedy by an action of damages for every uncivil or derogatory remark. Unless such remarks are calculated to injure character or credit, a man must, generally speaking, put up with them and disregard them as best he can. On this point, I refer to the case of M'Lachlan v. Orr, Pollock, & Company, 6th November 1894, 22 R. 38. On the whole, I think that these four issues are substantially in the same position as the first four, and fall, like them, to be disallowed as not based on any truly defamatory statements, and besides, as not supported by any adequate averments of malice. I am therefore of opinion that there is no relevant case against Mr Dick.

"The next four issues are directed against the union, the committee, and the members of the committee. They relate to the first deliverance of the committee by which it was found 'that T. Murdison used offensive language to the referee.' . . . 'That T. Murdison be severely censured, and be ordered to apologise to the referee.'

"These issues are framed on the same plan as the others. The first three are issues proper to an action of damages for defamation, and the fourth is an issue for verbal injury. The deliverance is not put forward as in itself defamatory or actionable. It is innuendoed, and the innuendoes are much the same as those which have been already considered, and on the grounds which have been already stated I think that they are inadmissible; and on the whole, I am of opinion that these issues should be disallowed on the ground that it is not actionable to say of a man that he used offensive language and is severely censurable, and also on the ground that the comments, or amendments the scope of which is uncertain and may be elucidated by further discussion. In this case I do not wish to prejudge the question as to whether, at a subsequent stage, the pursuer may not also be found liable in the expenses in the Outer-House.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The true principle is that the expenses caused by amendments should be put upon the party desiring to make those amendments. There is, however, no general rule, such as that propounded by Mr Ure, to the effect that expenses should always be found due from the date of closing the record. That would be a dangerous rule, because it might prevent a party from making a judicious amendment, which would not have the effect of rendering nugatory all the expense already incurred by the parties.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. It is quite possible that an amendment may be proposed which is a proper and even a necessary one, but which, in mittee and the members of it were in a position of privilege, and that no particulars inferring malice are averred.

"There are, it is true, a number of statements with reference to the manner in which the inquiry was conducted which are founded on as evincing malice, or at least such disregard of the pursuer's rights as might be held equivalent to malice. I do not think it necessary to advert to these in detail. I think the complaint as to the exclusion of a newspaper correspondent is absurd; the reason for such exclusion, whether a good or a bad one, being plainly in no way indicative of animus against the pursuer. Assuming the truth of the pursuer's averments as to the procedure of the committee, I cannot say that I think they indicate recklessness or carelessness, but rather deliberation. I do not mean to say that they were in all points to be commended, or that the pursuer's interests, assuming his averments, were safeguarded as they would have been in a Court of justice. But that was hardly to be expected, and I am not prepared to regard the defects in procedure averred as indicative of malice, or of carelessness equivalent to malice.

"The statement that the committee published their resolution in the newspapers caused me at first some difficulty. It is denied, but (although very unlikely to be true) must be accepted in a judgment on relevancy. If the committee did publish their resolution, that would certainly be, to my mind, a highly reprehensible act. But, if the resolution itself be not defamatory, I do not see that the publication of it can be actionable.

"There remains the thirteenth issue, which is different from all the rest. It refers to the second deliverance, which purported to suspend the pursuer from playing until the committee withdrew the suspension. Under this issue damages are claimed as for a legal wrong, and the case of Blaymire v. Lothians Racing Club and Reid, 29th June 1889, 16 R. 893, was referred to as a precedent. In that case the third issue adjusted was whether 'the defenders, the Lothians Racing Club, wrongfully expelled the pursuer, or caused him to be expelled, from the ring or paddock of the "Lothians Racing Club and Edinburgh Meeting" at Musselburgh, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer,' which appears to warrant an issue for a wrong of a kind not very dissimilar to that complained of here.

"The pursuer maintains that the sentence was wholly ultra vires. The defenders maintain that power of suspension is expressly conferred by the rules of the Union. They refer to a rule at page 31 of a book of bye-laws and laws of the game, bearing date 1890-91, No. 9 of process. But the pursuer does not admit that these rules were in force at the date in question, and he points to a book of bye-laws and rules bearing date 1894-95, cases where the record is already clear and explicit, involves no further expense at all. Accordingly, the rule laid down by your Lordships seems to me to be a sound one.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT allowed the amendment, on condition of the pursuer paying the expenses of the discussion in the Inner-House.

The pursuer proposed four additional issues. The first of these issues was,—"It being admitted . . . whether the said letters are in whole or in part of and concerning the pursuer, and in so far as of and concerning the pursuer are false and calumnious, to the pursuer's loss, injury, and damage?"

The second was,—"Whether, on or about 9th November 1894, at a meeting of the Committee of the Scottish Football Union held at Edinburgh, and in presence and hearing of the second defenders, or one or more of them, the defender James Dick junior falsely and calumniously stated, &c., or used similar language towards him, to the pursuer's loss, injury, and damage?"

The third of those issues was in the following terms:—"Whether, on or about 9th November 1894, the Scottish Football Union, which does not contain the rule in question. If the defenders shall prove that the rule on which they found was in force, they may thereby completely meet the pursuer's case. But I do not see how the pursuer's averments that the rules in force are all contained in the later handbook can be disregarded. It seems a point which cannot be cleared without inquiry.

"Now, if a wrong has been done to the pursuer in this matter, I am not disposed to regard it as other than a serious wrong. It does not affect his patrimonial interests, nor necessarily or directly his character, but it puts him in a position of great disadvantage, obloquy, and discomfort. It was, if it have the effect which both parties attribute to it, a sentence of extreme severity, not (whether the committee have power or no) to be lightly pronounced; and I cannot help thinking that it is a wrong—if a wrong at all—for which redress against those who did the wrong cannot be refused without denial of justice. I think it much the most serious wrong averred.

"But the pursuer has stated this part of his case in such a manner as to make it very difficult to allow the issue he proposes. For he avers in condescendence 7 that this wrong was done not by the first defenders—that is, the Union and the committee as such—but by the second defenders, i.e., the individual members of the committee or some of them, while the issue proposed is whether the wrong was done by the Union through its committee and the said committee (i.e., the first defenders), and the second defenders, or one or other and which of them, or one or more and which of the second defenders, in name of the first defenders.

"It is right to say here that the pursuer craved leave to amend the record, and that one of the amendments which he desired to make was to delete from this part of his record the words 'or some of them.' He was not, however, prepared to pay the expenses which I was prepared to award as a condition of allowing the amendment. Besides, the amendment did not fully meet the difficulty.

"Having regard, however, to the averment that the findings and resolutions were published with the knowledge and sanction of the first defenders, as well as of the second, and also the express adoption of the sentence by the Union, I am inclined to think that the difficulty raised by the pursuer's record, though troublesome, may be got over, and that the last issue may be approved of."

through its committee, and the said committee and the second defenders, or one or other and which of them, or one or more and which of the second defenders, acting in concert, made a finding and passed a resolution in name of the said committee in the following terms, videlicet:—'That T. Murdison used offensive language to the referee,' the third defender; 'that T. Murdison be severely censured, and be ordered to apologise to the referee'; and sent a copy of the said finding and resolution to Mr William Wintrup, honorary secretary of the Gala Football Club, on or about 10th November 1894, and published, or caused it to be published, in the following newspapers, videlicet:—The Edinburgh Evening Dispatch and The Glasgow Herald, on 12th November 1894? Whether the said finding and resolution are of and concerning the pursuer, and are false and calumnious, to the pursuer's loss, injury, and damage? Damages laid at £500."

The fourth issue was in the same terms as the issue allowed by the Lord Ordinary, with this difference, that in place of the words "in the newspaper press," the words "in the Evening Dispatch newspaper on 7th December 1894" were substituted."

Argued for the pursuer;—

I. Against the defender Dick,—(a) The letters were per se slanderous, and therefore the pursuer was entitled to an issue without an innuendo. They were addressed to a body which thought them so serious that the pursuer was called upon to explain or suffer suspenpension. In any view it was for the jury to say whether, in the circumstances, they were slanderous or not. (b) Alternatively, issues with the innuendoes should be allowed.[1] If not per se slanderous, it was enough if they had a slanderous meaning among football players, and the pursuer so averred. (c) There was at least verbal injury; the pursuer averred that the statements complained of were false, that they were intended to injure, and in fact had injured him.[2]

II. Against the first and second defenders,—(a) As to the finding that the pursuer had used offensive language, the same argument applied as against Dick. (b) The pursuer had suffered a legal wrong by the publication of these defenders' resolutions, in respect he was prevented from playing football with clubs belonging to the Union. He was in the same position as a man who had been wrongfully expelled from a club. His patrimonial interest had been injured. The cases of M'Millan and Forbes relied on by the defenders were different, for there the pursuers did not aver membership of a body from which they had been expelled. (c) The plea of privilege was unsound in the case of both defenders. Dick had no right to complain, and the committee had no right to listen to his complaint. The Union had no power over individuals, but only over clubs belonging to the Union. Even if the committee had an interest to discuss the pursuer's conduct, they had no right to publish their conclusions to the world.[4]

Argued for the defenders;—(1) No issue should be allowed against either of the defenders. The pursuer did not complain of being accused of general discreditable conduct.

(2) The pursuer had not averred any patrimonial loss, nor the invasion of any right, of which the Court would take cognisance.[1] Accordingly the issue approved by the Lord Ordinary should be disallowed.

(3) It was clear on the pursuer's record that both sets of defenders were privileged, and there were no averments from which malice could be inferred.

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary that, in so far as regards the defender James Dick, there is no issuable matter on record. None of the various innuendoes which the pursuer proposes in the separate issues can in my opinion be allowed. The object with which they are framed seems to be to put to the jury a variety of arguments more or less forcible for holding that the language of which the pursuer complains is in its normal acceptation libellous. But that is not the purpose of an innuendo. I mean that an innuendo ought to be an averment that words which in their ordinary acceptation are not libellous had, in the circumstances in which they were used a specified libellous meaning, or that they had a libellous application not otherwise obvious. The pursuer must therefore define with precision the specific meaning which he ascribes to language not obviously libellous, and I think it was a fair criticism that was made upon the pursuer's innuendo that he proposes to put a great variety of somewhat vague meanings on the same words. But when the innuendoes are examined, which I do not think it necessary to do in more detail, it appears to me that none of them are legitimate innuendoes in the sense I have described. In so far as they do more than suggest arguments upon the construction of the language used, they either add to the defender's words something which he did not say, or else they put in more violent language what he has expressed in perfectly moderate and reasonable language.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that none of the eight issues which were proposed in the Outer-House should be allowed. The question remains whether the new issue which the pursuer proposes without an innuendo can be sustained. Now, I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the statements made by the defender Dick, of which the pursuer complains, are not a fit subject for an action of libel. The pursuer's own averments disclose a condition of things of which any umpire who was treated as the defender is said to have been treated was entitled to take notice. I entirely agree with what the Lord Ordinary has said upon this matter,—"It appears to me that the letters are temperately and moderately expressed to bring before the committee a legitimate complaint without the use of exaggerated or defamatory language. Further, I think, that supposing Mr Dick had reason as referee to make a complaint at all, his complaint was addressed to the proper quarter, and that altogether independent of any special rules upon the subject." But notwithstanding that the defender might be entitled to express an honest opinion to the effect contained in his letters, and afterwards in his evidence before the committee, he might nevertheless be liable in damages if it could be shewn against him that he was not acting honestly and in the exercise of the privilege which the occasion gave rise to, but dishonestly for the malicious purpose of injuring the pursuer; and accordingly we must consider whether the pursuer has not made sufficient averment of malice to entitle him to an issue. I think that he has not. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that this is one of those cases in which it is necessary that a specific averment of facts and circumstances from which malice is to be inferred ought to be made before the pursuer can be allowed to have an issue. Malice must always be a matter of proof. It may in many cases be inferred from the violence of the language used; or it may be inferred from some improper method of publication. But in the present case it cannot be suggested that either of these grounds exists for inferring malice, and therefore it must be inferred from extrinsic circumstances which ought to have been averred. But there is no such averment. It is not said that the pursuer and defender knew anything of one another before the occasion which gave rise to the complaint, and no relation whatever is averred as existing between them except that of player and umpire. It seems to me that there is nothing on record to rebut the presumption which arises from a privileged occasion, nor to displace the honest and proper motive of the defender, and to shew that he was acting dishonestly and maliciously. I am therefore of opinion that, in so far as regards this defender, the action ought to be dismissed.

There remains the question whether there is any case against the other defenders, the Scottish Football Union and its committee, and the individual members of the committee. The case against the committee stands in a somewhat different position from that in which it stood before the Lord Ordinary. His Lordship thought that the committee also was privileged, and that there was no averment from which it could be inferred that they were acting maliciously. But the pursuer has amended his record in the Inner-House, and he now alleges that the committee, after making a certain inquiry, which was conducted, according to his statement, in an exceedingly partial, unfair, and irregular manner, came to a certain conclusion against him; and then he goes on to say that, upon the instructions of the committee, the finding and resolution of 9th November,—which were that the pursuer had used offensive language to the referee, and that he should be severely censured and be ordered to apologise,—and subsequently the resolution of 6th December, were communicated to the Edinburgh Evening Dispatch and the Glasgow Herald; and it is added that the resolutions so communicated were published by these newspapers in November and December.

Now, it appears to me that a statement by such a body published to the world in newspapers may be injurious to the reputation of the person affected, and I am not prepared to say that, if such a body as this publishes to the world that a particular person has used offensive language to a referee which is severely censurable, and that he ought to be called upon to apologise

No. 87.

Jan. 30, 1896. Murdison v. Scottish Football Union.

such a statement cannot be so injurious to the person charged that if he is charged falsely he should not be entitled to damages. The defenders are not in a position to say that such a statement could not cause the society of the pursuer to be shunned by those with whom he was accustomed to associate in playing the game of football. If it had that result, then, according to the ordinary rule, it is a statement on which he is entitled to ask the verdict of the jury, whether it was or was not defamatory or injurious to him. I do not express any further opinion than that I think this statement so published is one which the pursuer is entitled to lay before the jury; but if it is in itself injurious the same question arises with reference to the defenders who were charged with the responsibility of making it, as with reference to the case against the other defender Dick, whether they were not in a privileged position; and if so, whether any sufficient averment of malice is made against them. When the case was before the Lord Ordinary his Lordship thought, in the first place, that their position was clearly privileged; and, in the second place, that there was no sufficient averment of malice with reference to the committee any more than with reference to the other defender. In the aspect which the case has now assumed I am not prepared to assent to either of these conclusions. I think it is very possible that it may turn out that the members of the committee who were chargeable with this publication were privileged, but I think that may depend upon facts and circumstances which are not fully known to us at present. It may depend upon the rules of the society, and upon the extent to which the pursuer has submitted himself to the censure and discipline to be exercised by the governing bodies of the society. These are circumstances as to which we are not fully informed. It is enough to observe in the first place that the pursuer has averred against the committee conduct with reference to their treatment of him, and to the extent to which these averments are proved he is entitled to say that it was unfair and irregular; and secondly, it must be observed that there may be a privilege in a society of this kind to discuss matters, and to promulgate opinions with reference to them, as among the members of the society itself which would not necessarily carry with it a right to publish them to the world,—that is to say, to publish injurious matter to persons in respect to whom no such privilege can exist. It appears to me, therefore, that in the first place there is a sufficient case upon this issue to go to the jury; and secondly, that it ought to be left to the Judge at the trial to direct the jury, according as the facts turn out, whether the case is one of privilege or not, and therefore whether it will be necessary for that jury to find malice in order to entitle the pursuer to succeed. I should be disposed therefore to allow the pursuer the third issue which he proposes in his amended issues, but not in the terms in which he proposes it. It is proposed to put to the jury,—"Whether, on or about 9th November 1894, the Scottish Football Union through its committee, and the said committee, and the said defenders, or one or other and which of them, or one or more and which of the second defenders, made a finding and passed a resolution in the following terms," then it quotes the resolution I have referred to and goes on—"and published or caused it to be published in the following newspapers, &c."

Now, I think, the pursuer has averred no case upon which he is entitled to complain of this finding and publication, except against the individual members against whom he may prove that they made the publication. There is no case against the Scottish Football Union upon this matter. If the pursuer was injured, the persons liable for it are those who did the wrong. The pursuer does not aver, and I think his averments exclude the idea, that the Scottish Football Union as a body, if it be a body liable to be sued in such a matter at all, is answerable for the wrong of which he complains. On the contrary, he says that the committee had no authority from the Football Union to act in the manner of which he complains. Therefore I am of opinion that the action must be dismissed against the first called defenders as well as against the private defender Dick, and that the only case that remains is one against the individual members of the committee. In the working out of the case against them it will of course be necessary to prove against each of them that he individually was responsible, first, for the passing of the defamatory statement of which he complains, and secondly for its publication. It is not a complaint which can be established against the committee generally, or against such a society as the Football Union generally. It must be proved against each particular wrongdoer who is said to be answerable for the wrong, if wrong there was.

There remains a question of a somewhat different kind, whether the pursuer is entitled to the issue which the Lord Ordinary has allowed. (His Lordship here quoted the issue.)

Now, I am unable to ascertain from anything stated on record, or from any argument which we had the advantage of hearing, what is the legal right of which the pursuer complains that he was deprived, as he says in his issue. It appears to me from the statement that if a resolution in these terms were published in the newspapers, and if it had induced persons who would otherwise be willing to play football with the pursuer to refuse to do so, it might possibly support an issue for defamation. But the pursuer disclaims any intention to take an issue of slander upon this resolution. He says that he desires only an issue which would give him reparation for the substantive wrong done to him. I confess I am unable to see what the substantive wrong was. All that he says about it is that it was illegal and incompetent, and that its effect is to prevent him from playing in any club or against any club which is a member of the Football Union. Now, how does it prevent him from doing so? It must either mean that the Football Union as a body decline to play, or that they advise their members not to play. If the latter is the true meaning that is just an innuendo of defamation, and nothing else. If he complains not of the defamation but of the fact that people would not play football with him, that does not appear to me to be a legal wrong or an invasion of any legal right. Nobody has a right which he can enforce at law to compel other people to play a game of football with him. If there be an agreement between them to play a game together, that is not an agreement which the law will enforce. The general rule is that such agreements are personal. Agreements to associate for purposes of recreation, or an agreement to associate for scientific or philanthropical or social or religious purposes, are not agreements which Courts of law can enforce. They are entirely personal. Therefore, in order to establish a civil wrong from the refusal to carry out such an agreement, if it can be inferred that any such agreement was made, it is necessary to see that the pursuer has suffered some practical injury either in his reputation or in his property. No averment of that kind is made. As to the first kind of injury, as I have already stated, the pursuer disclaims the idea of putting an issue upon that ground of charge.

The Lord Ordinary has referred to the case of Blasquez v. The Lothians Racing Club[1] as an authority for the issue which he thought it right to grant in this case. That appears to me to be a case entirely distinct, because what was complained of there was that the pursuer had been expelled from a public place—that is, a place to which presumably he would have been entitled to resort unless he had been wrongfully turned out of it by the persons of whom he complained. The complaint was that he had been wrongfully expelled from the ring of the Lothians Racing Club's Edinburgh Meeting at Musselburgh, to his loss, injury, and damage. Now, that is a totally different kind of complaint from that which the pursuer makes here. It appears to me, therefore, that upon this ground there is no cause of action which can be sustained, and I should be disposed to suggest to your Lordships that we ought to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and dismiss the action as against the defenders first called, and also as against the defender third called, and to allow the one issue which I referred to as amended in the manner I have suggested against the defenders second called, and against them only. Supposing that issue is allowed, I do not understand that the defenders make any motion that they should be allowed a counter issue.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, dismissed the action as against the first and third defenders, and allowed an issue against the second defenders in the following terms:—"Whether, on or about 9th November 1894, the defenders, or one or more and which of them, made a finding and passed a resolution in the following terms, videlicet:—'That T. Murdison used offensive language to the referee,' meaning thereby James Dick, the referee at a football match played at Galashiels on 27th October 1894; 'that T. Murdison be severely censured, and be ordered to apologise to the referee,' that is, to the said James Dick; and whether the defenders, or one or more and which of them, sent or caused to be sent a copy of the said finding and resolution to Mr William Wintrup, honorary secretary of the Gala Football Club, on or about 10th November 1894, and published the said resolution, or caused it to be published in the following newspapers, videlicet:—The Edinburgh Evening Dispatch of 10th November 1894, and The Glasgow Herald of 12th November 1894: Whether the said finding and resolution are of and concerning the pursuer, and are false and calumnious, to the pursuer's loss, injury, and damage? Damages laid at £1000."

REV. JOSEPHUS LEISHMAN SKERRET, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Ure—Crabb Watt.

REV. ALEXANDER OLIVER AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—Shaw—Comrie Thomson—Younger.

Church—Voluntary Church—Suspension of Minister—Reduction—Restoration to status.—A minister of the United Presbyterian Church was served with a libel for an alleged offence, and was suspended from the ministry till the decision of the case. After a proof, the Presbytery found the charge proved. The minister appealed to the Synod, who remitted the case to a commission. The commission found certain counts in the libel proved, and suspended the minister sine die.

The minister brought an action (1) for declarator that he had been libelled and suspended contrary to the rules of the Church; (2) "in case it may be necessary," for reduction of the decree of suspension pronounced by the commission; and (3) for interdict against the defenders proceeding to fill his charge, or deprive him of the status or emoluments of his office. He reserved his right to claim damages.

The pursuer having intimated that he did not insist in the conclusions for declarator and interdict, but only in that for reduction of the sentence of the commission, the Court dismissed the conclusion for reduction, on the grounds (1) that that conclusion was merely ancillary to the conclusions for declarator and interdict; and (2) that reduction of the sentence by the commission would leave the pursuer under the original suspension, and would not restore his status as a minister, or lead to the establishment of any patrimonial right.

Church—Voluntary Church—Contract—Suspension of Minister—Reduction—Specific implement—Restoration to office.—In an action by a minister of a congregation of the United Presbyterian Church against the Synod concluding (1) for reduction of a sentence of suspension pronounced against him by a committee of the Synod to whom the Synod had remitted the trial of a libel against him, on the allegation that it was ultra vires of the Synod to make the remit, and (2) for interdict against the defenders filling up his charge, held by Lord Kincairney (1) that the pursuer had relevantly averred a breach of contract, causing an injury which was of a patrimonial character, or of a character equivalent to patrimonial; (2) that the suspension by the committee being alleged to be ultra vires, appeal to the Court was not excluded by a provision in the contract that members should not have recourse to the civil Courts against judgments of the Courts of the Church; but (3) that reduction of the sentence of suspension, to the effect of restoring the pursuer to office, was not a remedy which the Court ought to grant, or was in use to grant, in similar cases, and that the action fell to be dismissed.

Process—Church—Voluntary Church—Action to reduce decree of suspension—Who must be called as defenders—Citation of Synod and Presbytery.—In an action by a minister of the United Presbyterian Church, for reduction of a decree suspending him from his office, and for restoration to his office, with its emoluments, held by Lord Kincairney (Ordinary), and acquiesced in, (1) that it was sufficient to call as defenders the prosecuting members of the Presbytery, the Synod, and a commission of the Synod by whom the sentence complained of had been pronounced; (2) that the Synod was validly cited by its office-bearers being called; and (3) that the Presbytery was not a proper defender, but was validly cited for its interest, by its office-bearers being called.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

THIS was an action at the instance of the Rev. Josephus Leishman Skerret, who designed himself "minister of the United Presbyterian Church, Cathedral Square, Glasgow," against (1) the Rev. Alexander Oliver and others, the moderator, clerks, agents, and treasurer of the Cruickshank and others, the moderator, clerk, treasurer, and clerical members of the United Presbyterian Church Presbytery of Glasgow as representing said Presbytery, and as individuals; and (4) the Rev. David Woodside and others, the kirk-session, board of management, and trustees vested in the heritable property of the Cathedral Square United Presbyterian Church, Glasgow, for their interest.

The pursuer concluded (1) for declarator that the defenders were not entitled, by virtue of the provisions of the constitution, contract of association, rules, and laws of the United Presbyterian Church, to suspend the pursuer from his office of minister of the United Presbyterian Church, Cathedral Square, Glasgow, or from the status or emoluments of the said office, by reason of them, or any of them, alleging or finding it proved that on occasions specified he had met and walked with Miss A B; (2) that the libelling of the pursuer for alleged walking with Miss A B, with the view of suspending him from, or depriving him of his said office, or the status or emoluments of the same, was contrary to the said constitution, contract of association, rules, and laws; (3) and "in case it may be necessary," for decree of reduction of a pretended judgment or suspension, dated 24th May 1894, suspending the pursuer from his office as minister of the said Church sine die, dissolving his connection with the congregation of Cathedral Square, and declaring the charge vacant, passed by the defenders the Rev. David Kinnear and others, and restoration of the pursuer thereagainst; and (4) for interdict against the defenders proceeding to fill the place of the pursuer in his office of minister foresaid, or to deprive him of the status and emoluments of the said office or of his status of a minister of the Gospel.

The pursuer averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 2) "The rights of the members of the said association (the United Presbyterian Church) inter se are regulated by (1) a constitution or contract of association called "The Basis of Union," and (2) rules or laws.* The said rules and

(Cond. 5) "By the said call, and the pursuer's acceptance thereof, and induction following thereon, a contract was entered into between the pursuer on the one hand and the said association on the other, whereby the pursuer became bound to perform the functions of the ministry to which he had been ordained on the terms and subject to the provisions of the said contract of association, rules, or laws, and the said association became bound to confer upon the pursuer the status of a minister of their association, and through and by the said congregation, who were also parties to the said contract, to supply him with suitable maintenance, and to maintain him in the enjoyment of the said status and the emoluments thereof." (Cond. 6) "In particular, it was a part of the said contract that the association should have power to deprive the pursuer of the said ministry and maintenance only if any of the sins and offences specified in the said contract, rules, or laws should be found proven under a libel against him. It was also part of the said contract that, in the event of the pursuer being libelled for any such sin or offence, he should have an appeal from the judgment of the Presbytery, before whom alone the libel could be tried, to the Synod of said association; that such appeal should be heard and disposed of by such Synod after the pursuer had been heard in his defence, and that he should have a judgment by the majority of the members of the association sitting in Synod before any sentence should be pronounced against him depriving him of his status and maintenance as aforesaid." Prosecution by the Presbytery.—(7) "When a Presbytery resolves upon a libel it issues an interdict against the accused exercising any of the functions of his office until the case is issued. . . ."

* "Whereas, by the Word of God and the laws of the Church, the holding of private meetings by a married man with a young woman, and especially by a minister of the Gospel, with a female member of his church, whose relations with him have previously formed the subject of inquiry by his Presbytery, in places and circumstances exciting such suspicion on the part of members of his church and others as to lead to a complaint calling for the action of the Presbytery, and especially on the Lord's day or after religious services, is culpably and censurably imprudent, gives occasion for scandal, brings reproach on religion, and is fitted to destroy his usefulness as a minister of the Gospel.

"Yet true it is and of verity, that you, the said Reverend Josephus Leishman Skerret, have been guilty of the said offence by holding private meetings with Miss A B, . . . a member of your church, whose relations with you had previously formed the subject of inquiry by your Presbytery, in so far as—(1) On Sabbath, the 18th day of February 1894 years, after eight o'clock post meridiem, you did meet the said Miss A B in a close in Monteith

(Conds. 8 and 9) The alleged libel affirmed no offence, and the pursuer objected to it as irrelevant, but the Presbytery remitted it to probation, and after a proof found the pursuer guilty of walking with the said member of his congregation on the occasions specified. (Cond. 10) "The pursuer protested and appealed to the Synod against the finding of the Presbytery in order that the Synod might exercise the rights of final judgment conferred upon them. On the 10th day of May 1894 the Synod took up the appeal, but instead of adjudicating upon it, as they were bound to do, they illegally and unwarrantably delegated the powers committed to them to an alleged commission, composed of forty-five of their own number, with power to them to consider and finally dispose of the said appeal. The said delegation was in breach of the said contract, and was ultra vires of said Synod. The said commission did not constitute any Court or authorised tribunal of the Church, and had no power, jurisdiction, or authority to deal with the case, or to pronounce any sentence thereon. . . ." (Cond. 11) "The said alleged commission, on the 24th day of May 1894, took up the functions incompetently delegated to them as aforesaid, and . . . found the first count of said libel not proven, and the second and third counts proven, and suspended the pursuer from performing the duties of his said office, and removed him from his said charge, at the same time appointing the said charge to be declared vacant on Sunday, the 27th day of May 1894 . . ." (Cond. 12) " . . . By and through the said illegal, incompetent, and unwarrantable proceedings, the pursuer has been deprived of his livelihood, and has sustained serious loss, damage, and injury in his profession, feelings, and reputation, for which he holds the defenders responsible, and he reserves all claims for such loss and damage . . ."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(5) The alleged judgment or suspension being ultra vires of the parties passing the same, in respect that the Synod had no authority to remit the case to the commission, the pursuer is entitled to decree of reduction, as concluded for.

The defenders lodged preliminary defences against satisfying the production, the nature of which sufficiently appears from the opinion appended to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 19th January 1895,—vide infra, p. 474.

On 19th January 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) repelled the defences as defences against satisfying the production, and appointed the Synod of the United Presbyterian Church, and the

(2) Further, on Wednesday, the 21st day of February 1894 years, after ten o'clock P.M., following on religious services, you did meet the said Miss A B at Claytoun Terrace, Dennistoun, and walked off with her up Craigpark and along Onslow Drive." (3) Here followed a similar charge. "All of which, or part thereof, being found proven against you, the said Rev. Josephus Leishman Skerret, by the Glasgow Presbytery of the United Presbyterian Church, before which you are to be tried, or, being admitted by your own confession, you, the said Rev. Josephus Leishman Skerret, ought to be subjected to such sentence as the gravity of the case, the rules and discipline of the Church, and the usage observed in such cases may require, for the glory of God, the edification of the Church, and the deterring of you, the said Rev. Josephus Leishman Skerret, and all others holding the same sacred office, from committing the like offences in all time coming."

defenders called as representing Synod, to satisfy the production within ten days.*

* "OPINION.—(After narrating the conclusion of the summons his Lordship continued)—There is no conclusion for damages or other petitory conclusion. The only redress asked is restoration of status, with its 'emoluments.' It would have been convenient to consider the declaratory conclusions first; but the defenders have thought fit to lodge preliminary defences applicable to the reductive conclusions, and that step, according to our forms of process, necessitates the consideration, in the first place, of the conclusions of reduction, with the preliminary defences against satisfying production. It is now customary in practice to dispense with a preliminary defence in reductions, as, generally speaking, a merely formal and superfluous step of procedure, and to give in defences applicable to the whole cause, under reservation of right to maintain the pleas that purport to exclude consideration of the merits. That practice tends certainly to simplify and shorten procedure, and does not seem attended with inconvenience; and I think it to be regretted that the defenders could not see their way to adopt it. I think that all substantial objections to it might have been overcome by adequate reservation. They have, however, adopted the course of pleading which was followed in the well-known case of M'Millan v. The Free Church of Scotland, and which occasioned in that case so much unnecessary and regrettable delay and expense. The defenders were, however, in their right in lodging preliminary defences against satisfying the production, and the only question now to be decided—a question of form, not of substance—is whether they shall be ordained to produce the sentence pronounced on 24th May." (His Lordship then referred to the statements and pleas on record.)

"It was conceded on both sides that the case raised nothing but a question as to the contractual relations between the pursuer and the United Presbyterian Church, and depended on principles of law applicable to contracts. It was treated as now settled that the case must be considered on the footing that the tribunals of this Church were not, strictly speaking, Courts of law, and that they possessed no authority which could be correctly described as jurisdiction, and no authority over the pursuer, except what was conferred by the Constitution of the Church and the voluntary adhesion of the pursuer thereto.

"This view of the nature of the Constitution of the Church and of the relations of the parties, of course, limits the grounds of defence. It excludes the defence that the sentence is unchallengeable as the judgment of a supreme Court or of a spiritual Court. But it limits also the grounds of attack, because it is nothing to the purpose to say that the tribunal which pronounced the sentence committed an error of judgment, however extravagant. The judgment cannot be reviewed, for the reason—if for no other—that it is not the judgment of a Court, and cannot be impeached to any extent, unless to the extent to which it amounts to a breach of contract.

"Reverting for a moment to the grounds of this action, I do not know that it is disputed that among the offences of the office-bearers of the Church of which the tribunals of the Church have cognisance must needs be offences which amount to no more than acts of imprudence; they must be entitled to safeguard the reputation of the office-bearers of the Church, and in particular of the ordained ministers of the Church. If so, it must belong to these tribunals to judge whether any particular line of conduct be imprudent or no; and if a line of conduct be considered imprudent, prima facie it would seem to be for the tribunal to mete out the appropriate punishment. The libel is not happily expressed—very much the reverse—and it may be that a rigorous and technical criticism might give it the appearance of sheer absurdity. Still, it is at least debateable that it was for the tribunal to determine with what latitude it should be read, and

The sentence on the pursuer, a copy of which was produced and accepted by the pursuer as satisfying the production, was as follows:—"That the commission, having found the second and third counts of the libel proven, and affirmed the judgment of the Presbytery,— whether it fairly indicated—if it did not skilfully express—culpable imprudence.

"Again, it at first sight appears that suspension from the office of minister of his church was a very harsh punishment on the pursuer for conduct of which no more could be predicated than imprudence. But while that consideration may induce sympathy for him, can it entitle this Court to say that that punishment exceeded the powers of the tribunal—if the Commission was a tribunal of the Court at all—and on that account was a breach of contract?

"Again, when the pursuer's averments as to the irregularities of the procedure by the Commission are examined, a first impression suggests that they fall very far short of such irregularities as would warrant the interference of the Court.

"I do not think it out of place to indicate my present impressions on these points, although I do not mean to express any final judgment about them; because, in truth, it is not the pursuer's grounds of challenge that I have to decide on, but the defenders' pleas, by which they seek to exclude consideration of all grounds of challenge. I think it worth while to indicate that it appears to me that the pursuer's most formidable ground of challenge is his assertion that the commission by which he was sentenced was not really a tribunal of the Church which had, by his adherence to the Constitution, any authority over him. I have formed the opinion that this ground of challenge must be considered; and therefore, in further consideration of the case, I leave out of view all the pursuer's grounds of challenge except that one.

"With regard to that ground of challenge, I have to observe that I have not been able to find in the rules and regulations of the Church (No. 7 of process), any clear authority for the delegation by the Synod to a selected number of their members of the power and duty of reviewing the judgment of the Presbytery, and of pronouncing sentence on the pursuer. I have been referred to two clauses only.

"The one is in cap. 5, sec. 4, par. 10, and is quoted by the pursuer on record. It is—'When the cause comes before the superior Court, the Court may, if it see fit, send it to a committee, which shall travel in the cause and prepare a deliverance which it shall recommend the Court to adopt.'

"Under this clause, the power to be given to a committee is not a power to decide, but only to report; and the deliverance, whatever it might be, would be a deliverance of the superior Court, and not of the commission. The defenders did not maintain that that authorised the sentence on the pursuer.

"The other clause was referred to by the defenders. It is in cap. 6, sec. 4, par. 31, and is thus expressed:—'In special circumstances the Synod may originate proceedings against an office-bearer, and may either itself conduct the case to a termination or remit it to the Presbytery or to a commission of its own members.'

"The pursuer argued that that clause is equally inapplicable, because it is confined to proceedings originating with the Synod, while the proceedings against him originated with the Presbytery.

"But the defenders have averred that the appointment of and remit to the commission was in accordance with the practice of the Church, and was consented to by the pursuer; and I do not question the relevancy of these averments, all the less because this case raises no question about the jurisdiction of the tribunal which pronounced judgment, but only about the consent of the pursuer to submit to it, and that might be evidenced by his acts as well as by the Constitution of the Church.

"The defenders point out that there is no conclusion to reduce the remit; but I am not satisfied that that was necessary.

"Indeed, I am not satisfied, as at present advised, that it may not appear in the end that no reduction is absolutely necessary.

"I turn now to the defenders' pleas, by which they seek to exclude the case from the consideration of the Court. These pleas, which are numerous, seem to cover the whole defence, but only some of them are applicable at the present preliminary stage. Unless I have misunderstood the clear and able argument for the defenders, I think their positions may be summarised as follows:—

"They maintained that the defences against satisfying the production should be sustained, and that the conclusions for reduction should de plano be dismissed, (1) because all parties were not called; (2) because the action did not submit to the Court any question of civil right, seeing that the sentence sought to be reduced was an ecclesiastical act by a Court of the Church within its own sphere, and no damages were claimed and no patrimonial interest was involved; (3) because the Court was not competent to grant the only redress demanded, viz., restoration of status; and (4) because recourse to the Civil Courts was excluded by the contract.

"These are not the usual pleas in defences against satisfying the production. They do not involve an objection to title. Yet I think they are such defences as may be entertained at this stage, an opinion which seems warranted by the case of Ramsay v. Bruce, 30th November 1849, 12 D. 243, quoted by the defenders. I shall therefore proceed to consider these pleas as defences against satisfying the production.

"I. I am not prepared at this stage to sustain the plea that all parties are not called. A very large number of defenders are called, somewhat indiscriminately; and there may be some of these who need not have been called. It appears to me that the only necessary contradictors at this stage are (1) the prosecuting members of the Presbytery of Glasgow; (2) the members of the commission by whom the sentence complained of was pronounced; and (3) the Synod. There is no doubt that the prosecuting members of the Presbytery are among the defenders called; and I did not understand it to be disputed that the members of the commission are called, at least no member of the commission was named who is not called. But the defenders maintained that the Synod is not called effectually or competently, and that the Church and the Presbytery of Glasgow ought to have been called and are not duly called.

"I agree that the United Presbyterian Church has not been duly called. I think that this sufficiently appears from the judgment of Lord Jerviswoode in the third case of M'Millan v. The Free Church, 20th July 1864, 3 Macph. 1444, which appears also to shew that it is not possible to convene such a body. But if it be impossible to call it, it cannot be necessary to do so; and I see no reason to think that the pursuer was bound to call the United Presbyterian Church. It acts and is, I think, represented by its duly appointed tribunals and administrative and executive bodies.

"I am not prepared to dismiss the reductive conclusions at this stage on the plea that the Presbytery of Glasgow has not been duly called. The Presbytery is not at this stage the proper contradictor. The Presbytery did not pronounce the sentence sought to be reduced, has no control over it, and cannot produce it. It is fitting that the Presbytery should be called for its interest; but I think that in that view it is sufficiently represented by those who are called, and I do not know any authority for the proposition that, when a Presbytery is to be called for its interest, it is necessary to call all its members.—See Clark v. Stirling, 14th January 1839, 1 D. 955; Mackay's Practice, 1st ed., vol. I., 326. The moderator, clerk, and treasurer are called, and I think they may at this stage be held as sufficiently representing the Presbytery. It is true that they are not said to represent the Presbytery in their official capacity, but only as members; but I think it is dealing too strictly in a formal question of this kind to hold that they are not called as representing the Presbytery officially. A large number of members of the Presbytery are also called—I understand not the whole of them—but I think that at present the Presbytery may be held to have been adequately apprised of the action and invited to appear for its interests if that were thought proper.

"The defenders' principal point under this plea was that the Synod was not called. I agree that the Synod is the proper, perhaps the only essential, defender,—at least the only defender in a position to satisfy production. But I have come to be of opinion that the Synod has been sufficiently called. The moderator, the clerk, the treasurer, and the agents have been called as representing the Synod, and I think that the Synod may be called by calling its office-bearers as its representatives. In that manner the General Assembly of the Established Church sues and is sued.—Cruickshank v. Gordon, 10th March 1843, 5 D. 909. I do not see any good reason for refusing to apply the same rule to the Synod of the United Presbyterian Church. The Synod of the United Presbyterian Church is not, it is true, a legal persona, but it is a body consisting of definable individuals. It is not in all points similar to the General Assemblies of the Established and Free Churches, which are ephemeral bodies and fluctuating in their membership. I understand that the Synod is a permanent body, and although not in permanent session, capable of being convened whenever necessary for special business.—(Forms of Procedure, No. 7 of process, section 23.) It consists (see Forms of Procedure, cap. 3, section 1) 'of all the ministers on the roll 'of Presbyteries, the elders commissioned by sessions, and missionaries when 'at home who have been ordained under the formula of the home Church.' Thus its clerical members are not representative, and cannot vary very much from time to time, although it is possible that the lay element may fluctuate. Most of its members, at all events its clerical members, may be readily known, but some of the members may be difficult of ascertainment.

"I do not know the number of the members of the Synod, but the defenders aver that they were upwards of 1200. Now, it would be manifestly a cumbrous, difficult, and expensive process, besides being absolutely useless in a case like this, to call each member of that large body, and there are some members whom it might not be easy to ascertain; and I think that where the members of a voluntary association are very numerous, and especially where there may be difficulty in ascertaining the whole of them, a relaxation of the general rule, which requires that all the members be called, has been sanctioned; and it would be very unreasonable, inexpedient, and unjust if it were not so. There may be a necessity for calling all the members of such an association in an action of damages, but not in an action like this. The General Assembly of the General Baptist Churches v. Taylor, 17th June 1841, 3 D. 1030; Somerville v. Rowbotham, 27th June 1862, 24 D. 1187; and Renton Football Club v. M'Dowal, 13th March 1891, 18 R. 670, are cases in which strict adherence to the ordinary rule was not required.

"The defenders maintained that the point had been decided in their

The production having been satisfied, defences on the merits were lodged. The defenders denied that the remit to the commission was illegal, and averred that it was in accordance with the practice and unwritten law of the Synod, and further, that the pursuer had acquiesced in this delegation of the Synod's powers.

favour by Lord Jerviswoode in the case of M'Millan already referred to. But that is not so, for that judgment related to the calling of the Free Church, and not of the General Assembly of that Church, and the reasons in the Lord Ordinary's note do not apply to this case. In Aitken v. Harper, 16th November 1865, 4 Macph. 36, an action against the moderator, clerk, and house committee of the United Presbyterian Synod as such and as individuals, concluding that they should pay an assessment, was dismissed, because they were not called as representing the Synod, which was held to be liable for the assessment. There are observations in the opinion of Lord Neaves which are apparently to the effect that these officials could not represent or bind the Synod in an action for money. These observations appear to have been obiter dicta, and are not directed against the competency of a device for avoiding the great inconvenience of calling all the members, by calling the officials of the Synod, in an action like the present, not concluding for payment of money.

"In the final advising of M'Millan v. The Free Church, the Lord President expressed the opinion that it was not competent to convene the General Assembly of the Free Church in an action of damages, but he does not say—nor do I think he implies—that the General Assembly could not be called in an action of declarator or reduction. I think that the fair implication of the latter part of his judgment is the reverse. Lord Curriehill does not adopt that ground of judgment, and Lord Deas dissents from it. It may be that if this had been an action of damages the Synod could not have been convened by calling its officials, but not being so, I am of opinion—following, as I think, the cases to which I have referred—that the action should not be thrown out at this stage in respect of defective instance.

"II. I have always felt the defenders' second point the most formidable. I hold that it has been decided that an action against an ecclesiastical body, concluding for reduction of a sentence of suspension or deposition, with an averment of consequent pecuniary loss and a conclusion for damages, may be entertained by the Court, and that redress might be given in such an action by reduction of the sentence and damages. I hold that so much was decided by the first and second advisings in M'Millan v. The Free Church, 23d December 1859, 22 D. 219, and 19th July 1861, 23 D. 314. That is the purport of the opinions of all the Judges, and none of them expressed any change of opinion in the final advising. These judgments do not, however, decide that the reduction of these sentences would do anything but clear the way for the claim of damages.

"But then this case differs from the case of M'Millan, inasmuch as that there is here no claim of damages; and it was very plausibly urged that the final judgment of M'Millan is a conclusive authority in favour of the defenders, because when it was discovered that the claim of damages could receive no effect, the case of M'Millan became the same as this case, and then the whole action was at that stage dismissed. But while this argument is of weight, I am unable to regard that judgment as conclusive of this question. For the Judges in the majority, the Lord President and Lord Curriehill, did not treat the conclusions of reduction separately, nor regard them as independent, but treated them as merely ancillary to and dependent on the conclusions for damages. Lord Deas, holding that the conclusions for reduction were not necessarily merely ancillary to the conclusions for damages, dissented, and was of opinion that there ought to be inquiry. I am disposed to think that that judgment leaves this question, viz., whether the conclusions of reduction can be entertained without a conclusion for damages, undecided.

"Further, the defenders maintained that this case differed from that of M'Millan in this also, that Mr M'Millan alleged, and indeed certainly suffered, a pecuniary loss by the sentence inflicted, and that here there was no pecuniary loss. In support of this last assertion it was stated that the pursuer had no manse, which was admitted, and also that he had no right to stipend. In proof of this latter statement the defenders referred to the rule iv. 9, 6, which provides that a minister shall have no right to prosecute for stipend in the civil Courts, 'it being a principle recognised in the Church that the high and sacred claim which Christ has given ministers on the consciences of their people for a suitable maintenance is a security perfectly adequate, and excludes any appeal to a civil Court for enforcement.'

"The pursuer has averred that the Church had, through his call and induction, become bound to supply him with suitable maintenance.

"The form of the call is given in the rules at pp. 131-2, and it bears that the congregation promised 'to contribute to your suitable maintenance as God may prosper us.' There are also in the rules provisions as to the manner in which insufficient stipends are to be augmented (p. 108), and also as to the provision of annuities for aged ministers.

"I suppose that the pursuer's call was in the usual terms, and it might be a question whether it conferred on him an enforceable right to a stipend.

"The defenders referred to the case of Arneil v. Robertson, 6th July 1841, 3 D. 1150, 9th June 1843, 5 D. 400, as deciding that it did not. But that case was decided by the verdict of a jury after an inquiry into the practice of a different voluntary association, viz., the United Secession Church, and evidently it cannot be safely applied in this case.

"The position of a minister of a church in connection with the United Presbyterian Church as to this matter seems to be this, that he has a moral right to a stipend from his congregation, but cannot recover it by action. He is able, however, to affirm, with almost absolute certainty, that his position will secure him a livelihood. His deprivation of that office deprives him of that chance or moral certainty of emolument.

"So the position of a minister without a church is that he is eligible for offices or engagements from which pecuniary emoluments in fact result. In that respect he is in no different position from a member of the bar, who exercises a profession from which pecuniary benefits arise, although he also cannot enforce payment of his fees by a law-suit. But who would say that on that account the professional status of an advocate was not of pecuniary value, or that his interest in it was not a patrimonial interest?

"The pursuer maintains further that even if no legal or enforceable right to a stipend is attached to his office, still his professional status is, apart from its pecuniary advantages, a patrimonial interest of tangible and considerable value, and that loss of it is a patrimonial loss capable of being roughly measured in money. This is a position which has been a good deal canvassed, and different opinions have been entertained about it. I confess that I cannot doubt that the pursuer's view on this matter is correct, and I think that a relevant statement by a minister that he had been illegally deprived of his professional status might warrant an action of damages.

"I consider that the balance of authority is in favour of that view. In the case of Forbes v. Eden, 8th December 1865, 4 Macph. 143, the Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) observed,—'The possession of a particular status, meaning by that term the capacity to perform certain functions or hold certain offices, is a thing which the law recognises as a patrimonial interest,

Church, and dissolving his connection with the congregation of Cathedral Square, Glasgow, and for interdict against proceeding to moderate in a call to fill the place of the pursuer, or deprive him of the status and emoluments of the said office, or his status as a and no one can be deprived of its possession by the unauthorised or illegal act of another without having a legal remedy.' In the House of Lords (5 M., H. L., 47) the Lord Chancellor (Chelmsford) expresses his concurrence in this opinion. These important dicta were challenged by the defenders as merely obiter. They were not, perhaps, essential to the judgment, but bore on it closely, and, apart from the great authority they necessarily carry, I venture to think they commend themselves as consistent with reason, justice, and law.

"In Forbes v. Eden, Lord Neaves, in less absolute language, indicates a like opinion, and throughout the very lengthy opinions delivered at the three advisings of M'Millan v. The Free Church, there are, I think, expressions of opinion to a like effect (see in particular 23 D. 1229, per Lord President Colonsay), and I confess I find it very difficult to conceive that the Court would give redress for the illegal deprival of an office to which a salary of a few pounds was attached but not for deprival of a professional status enabling the holder of it to earn perhaps ten or a hundred times as much, besides affording him credit and respect in the community.

"Take the case of an advocate disbarred through some mistake or some false accusation, could it be maintained that the Court would refuse to remedy that wrong because no right to recover money attached to the status, although his livelihood depended on it, and it made him eligible for lucrative and honourable offices? I cannot think so.

"So, to take an example put for the pursuer, if a ship captain were illegally deprived of his certificate, the Court would certainly remedy that wrong, although the ship captain had at the time no appointment, and was deprived of nothing but his position in his profession and his eligibility for an appointment.

"I cannot see the slightest difference in principle between these cases and the case of a minister, whether of the Established Church or of a voluntary Church, illegally deprived of orders or his charge.

"I am disposed to think that even if it could be proved that a man could suffer no loss of money by illegal deprivation of office or status, yet, if he thereby lost consideration or respect, the Court would be slow to refuse redress.

"III. The defenders, however, maintain that, whether the pursuer had relevantly averred pecuniary injury, or patrimonial injury, or not, and whether or not such loss of status as this case involves would warrant a claim of damages, this action must be dismissed de plano, because the only redress which the pursuer asks is restoration of status and a corresponding interdict, and because restoration cannot competently be given by the Court. There is certainly a great deal to be said in favour of this contention, and there are not wanting opinions, or at least indications of opinions, of great authority in favour of it; and if it can be affirmed to be sound, I think it follows, from the final judgment in M'Millan's case, that decree of reduction cannot be pronounced, and that the action will have to be dismissed. I have felt, and still feel, much difficulty on this point, but it seems to me that I cannot safely decide it at this stage. I am not sure that restoration, either total, or, if not total, partial, cannot be given. It may, perhaps, be out of the power of the Court to restore the pursuer to his charge in Cathedral Square, and yet it may conceivably be possible to restore his eligibility for office.

"The pursuer's case, as already observed, is this, that the commission by which he was sentenced was not a tribunal of the Church sanctioned or authorised by the Constitution by which he admits he is bound. He is minister of the Gospel, or from following forth the said suspension, and that the object of the action is the restoration of the pursuer to the position in which he was in regard to the said United Presbyterian Church and to the said congregation before the said sentence was ready to be judged by, and to submit to, the judgment of the Kirk-Session, or of the Presbytery, or of the Synod, but not the sentence of some other body. Seeing that I cannot find any contradiction of the pursuer's statements in the documents forming the Constitution of the Church, I must assume them to be true. Doing so, the pursuer has been deprived of his office by a number of persons who have no power over him at all. If this were distinctly made out I think it maintainable—it is unnecessary to go further at present—that the apparent sentence could not really affect his status, and that if it were reduced as null his former status would remain to him, or be restored to him unaffected by the sentence. It is as if a number of the members of the Synod had met ultroneously and deposed him without any authority. It seems the same in principle as if it were alleged that the vote had been miscounted. If that had been so, and if the Church had refused, or had by its Constitution been unable to give redress, could it be maintained that the Court could not do so? To do so would not be to challenge but to confirm the authority of the Church, and I suppose that if such a case should occur, and if it were shewn in such a case that the vote had been erroneously counted, the Church would gladly give effect to the judgment of the Court. It may be impossible that such a case should occur. I put it only for the purpose of illustration.

"Suppose it should appear in this case that the commission was without any authority under the Constitution of the Church, and if the sentence of 24th May was on that account reduced, I see no reason for assuming that the United Presbyterian Church would disregard that judgment, especially if, on giving it dispassionate consideration—which all the members of it would certainly do—they should come to agree with it. These suppositions are, of course, on the assumption that the pursuer's averments are true and the defenders' averments untrue, which is necessarily the condition of the argument.

"If, on the contrary, the defenders' averments are found to be true—and they have a high probability in their favour—then, of course, these consequences would not follow.

"The defenders referred to a class of cases which it is necessary to notice. I allude to cases in which a member of a trade union sought redress on account of his alleged illegal expulsion. These are M'Kernan v. The United Operative Miners' Association, 9th February 1874, 1 R. 453; Shanks v. The United Operative Miners' Association, 11th March 1874, 1 R. 823; Aitken v. The Associated Carpenters and Joiners of Scotland, 4th July 1885, 12 R. 1206; Rigby v. Connol, 1880, 14 Ch. Div. 482. These cases may seem to favour the contention that the Court will not entertain an action which complains of anything but injury to civil rights or loss of money, and the defenders naturally founded especially on the important opinion of Lord Lee, who decided the case of Aitken as Lord Ordinary. Still, I think that these decisions turn mainly on the provisions of the statute by which trades unions were legalised; and I consider also that there is not attached to the position of a member of a trade union a status of the same character as is here in question.

"The pursuer, on the other hand, referred to certain English cases, as to which I do not require to express an opinion—I mean cases in which the aid of the Court has been invoked by and accorded to individuals unduly expelled from clubs,—Forbes v. Keen, 2d December 1878, 11 Ch. Div. 353; Labouchere v. Wharncliff, 13 Ch. Div. 346; Dawkins v. Antrobus, 23d June 1879, 17 Ch. Div. 615; Seton, 22d November 1889, 5 Times Law Reports, 309; and Andrews, 27th April 1888, 4 Times Law Reports, pronounced: Finds that, assuming that the sentence complained of involved a breach of contract between the pursuer and the United Presbyterian Church, yet the pursuer is not entitled to the remedy craved: Therefore dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the compearing defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

were referred to. Generally speaking, the bearing of these cases is in favour of the pursuer's argument, but I reach the conclusion which I have expressed without their aid. I would feel some difficulty in following them, because it may be doubted whether their application is sufficiently close, and also whether the earlier cases did not go further than it would be safe to follow.

"For the reasons expressed, I am unwilling to hold the pleas which I have discussed sufficient to support the defence against satisfying the production.

"IV. The defenders further plead that this action is excluded by the provisions in the rules of the association prohibiting appeal to the civil Courts. By rule ii. 9, 2, it is declared that every minister 'is bound to submit, in the matter of temporal support, as in all other matters connected with his office, to the decision of Presbytery or Synod, and has no right to prosecute for stipend in the civil Court'; and rule iv. 1, 6, provides that 'members are not to have recourse to the civil authorities against the decisions of the Courts of the Church or against resolutions adopted at congregational meetings.' These rules are perfectly lawful, and might exclude consideration by the Court of any decision of a Church tribunal within the scope of its authority. But here it is said that the act complained of was not the act of any Church Court, and was wholly outwith the contract. To acts and judgments of that kind I am of opinion that these rules cannot apply, and that if it be established that the sentence complained of was unauthorised by the contract or by the practice of the Church, or by the pursuer's consent, such remedy against it may be granted as may be suitable and possible in the circumstances."

* "OPINION.—By interlocutor of 19th January the preliminary defences to this action were repelled as such, and it was decided that the judgment called for, in order to its reduction, must be produced and considered. In compliance with this interlocutor, the defenders have produced an excerpt of a 'Minute of Synodical Commission of the United Presbyterian Church, containing sentence on the pursuer.' The pursuer was content with this production, and accordingly, by interlocutor of 13th February, the production was held to be satisfied. A new record has been prepared and closed, and parties have been heard in the Procedure Roll. The pursuer moved for a proof. The defenders maintained that, on the pleadings and without inquiry, they were entitled to judgment.

"The principles and questions involved are in my opinion of extreme importance, and if proof before answer were allowed, it might happen that the necessity of deciding them might be avoided. But I have come to think that the defenders are entitled to ask a judgment on their pleas; and, although with considerable hesitation, that my judgment should be in their favour.

"In my opinion, expressed when disposing of the preliminary defences, I adverted to the various questions which had been discussed. It is possible that I then said more than was then necessary, and therefore more than was expedient. But what was then said must be read with reference to the stage of the cause which had then been reached.

"From the excerpt produced it appears that the Synodical Commission recalled the judgment of the Presbytery so far as it found the first count in the libel against the pursuer proven, and quoad ultra affirmed the judgment of the Presbytery finding the second and third counts of the libel proven; and that, further, the Synodical Commission resolved 'that Mr Skerret be

The pursuer reclaimed, but before the case was called for hearing in the Inner-House a new minister was inducted to the pastorate of the Cathedral Square Congregation. At the hearing the pursuer stated that he did not insist in any of the conclusions of the summons suspended from the office of the ministry sine die, and from the privilege of full communion as a minister of the Church, dissolves his connection with the congregation of Cathedral Square, and declares the charge vacant.'

"The remedy which the pursuer demands is reduction of this sentence, with corresponding interdict. He prays that it be declared to be null and void, and that the pursuer be restored against it in integrum. This is not an action of damages, although right to claim damages is reserved on record. If reduction were granted as craved, the result would necessarily be that the pursuer would be restored to the position in which he was before it was pronounced,—that is to say, that his suspension from the ministry would cease, and he would be restored to the privilege of full communion and to his connection with the congregation of Cathedral Square. Reduction of the sentence might have other effects besides these. It might, for example, facilitate a claim for damages,—it might rehabilitate the pursuer's character,—it might make him eligible for other pastoral charges. But decree could not be pronounced without causing, as a necessary consequence, supersession of his suspension from the ministry, and restoration to full communion and to his connection with his congregation.

"The defenders have repeated their pleas directed to the pursuer's title to sue, to the jurisdiction of the Court, and to the defective character of the instance. These pleas are still open, but they were dealt with in the previous judgment. The argument in support of them or against them was not resumed, and I do not think it necessary to add more on these points. I am not prepared to throw out the action on these pleas.

"The recent argument mainly regarded what may be called the merits of the action. It proceeded on the mutual concession or assumption that the question was not a question about the jurisdiction of the United Presbyterian Church, but was a question of contract, and that there existed a contract, the parties to which were the pursuer on the one hand, and the United Presbyterian Church, acting by its synods, presbyteries, and kirk-sessions, on the other part.

"I think that this condition of the argument is not based on a legal or logical fiction, but on a fact, and that there does exist such a contract.

"The sixth and seventh pleas in law for the defenders seem, at least in part, to be based on the view that the Courts of the United Presbyterian Church are possessed of jurisdiction. But, as I have said, that view was not argued, and the legal authority against it is ample and conclusive.

"Both parties referred to Nos. 7 and 9 of process as containing the contract, the latter (being for the purposes of this argument the more important) containing the rules and forms of procedure of the Church. The pursuer maintained that the contract of the parties is to be found in these documents, and this is admitted by the defenders, who, however, appeal also to the practice of the Church.

"The pursuer's action is based on alleged breach of this contract. That is expressed in his third plea, and the first question is whether a breach of the contract has been relevantly averred. If I rightly understood the pursuer's argument, he maintained, in the first place, that a breach of the contract was involved in his trial under the libel prepared by the Presbytery, because the libel, as he maintained, did not charge any crime or offence cognisable by the Church under the rules and regulations.

"The rules and regulations on this point are contained in chapter 6 of the book entitled Rules and Forms of Procedure, No. 9 of process, which treats of Church discipline. In section 1, subsection 1, of that chapter, it is said 'that the proper ground of Church discipline or censure is a sin or offence except that for reduction, and he finally based his claim to the remedy of reduction solely on the ground that the Synod had no power to remit his case to a commission.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer had stated a relevant case which, on account of its publicity, is a scandal, and is calculated to bring a reproach on religion.' There is no definition of the word offence. The language is of great generality, and I think it impossible to contend that it does not cover offences by ordained ministers against propriety, prudence, or decorum, as well as offences of greater gravity. The libel, which I need not quote, is certainly not a model of legal or logical statement. The major proposition, with its involved aggregation of particulars, describes conduct which might be laudable, or simply indifferent, or blameably imprudent, or in a very high degree culpable, according to circumstances. Still I think that, fairly read, it must be held to charge the pursuer with such behaviour, in reference to the female member of his congregation alluded to, as was imprudent, and calculated to give occasion for scandal. There is no doubt that it was so intended and understood, and I have no doubt that the trial of a minister by the proper tribunal for conduct of that kind is well within the power conferred by the contract on the Church, and of course the mere criticism that the libel is badly expressed could involve no violation of contract if no miscarriage of justice resulted. I am satisfied that no ground of reduction can be rested on the language of the libel.

"The pursuer maintained, secondly, that the facts found proved, stated in the second and third counts of the libel, inferred no fault of any kind, and were consistent with absolute innocence, and that there was no power under the contract to inflict any punishment on account of that finding. It was maintained that what was found to be proved was no more than that the pursuer had on two occasions walked with a female member of his congregation at ten and nine o'clock at night, without any suspicious quality or circumstances connected with these meetings, and that it was highly ridiculous to censure or punish conduct so innocent. It is possible, however, that there might have been circumstances attending these meetings of which the Synodical commission were entitled to take notice, which might have made them objectionable and open to misconstruction; and I am not prepared to say that it was absolutely necessary to embody these in the finding. It was for the recognised tribunal to judge of the quality of the pursuer's acts. The commission may have judged amiss, possibly with too much rigour and suspicion, and with too little charity and good nature. Still, if the judgment was pronounced in bona fide by an authorised tribunal, within its powers, it is clear that no error in the judgment could constitute a breach of the contract.

"It is impossible for this Court to review or rescind the sentence on the ground of excess. Perhaps it was not really so severe as it appears at first sight to be, and might, had the pursuer submitted and acknowledged his error, have amounted practically to little more than a censure. But in any case it was clearly for the Church, through its appropriate tribunal, to award the punishment for the offence proved within the limits of the construction, and it cannot be shewn that in this case the sentence exceeded these limits.

"It is averred on record that the Synodical commission acted irregularly in various particulars enumerated. None of these, however, are of much importance, or could imply any denial of justice, or amount to an allegation of neglect of the ordinary principles of equity, and they afford, in my opinion, no sufficient ground for supposing that the trial of the pursuer was so conducted as to be a breach of the constitution.

"Thus far, therefore, I find no relevant averment of breach of contract. But the pursuer avers another breach of a different kind. It is averred that when the pursuer appealed against the judgment of the Presbytery to for the interference of the Court. By his induction to a pastorate in the United Presbyterian Church a contract had been concluded between him and that association, and the "Rules and Forms of Procedure" of the Church formed part of that contract. By these rules the the Synod, he was, under the rules and regulations, entitled to a judgment by the Synod on his appeal; that the Synod did not, in fact, decide on his appeal, but remitted to a Synodical commission—not to examine into the cause and to make a report on it to the Synod, but to decide the cause, and that the Synodical commission did so decide it; the sentence under review being a judgment of the commission, although the Synod authorised it, have adopted it, and now maintain it. Parties are at issue as to the power of a Synod to make this remit to the Synodical commission, and as to the power of a Synodical commission to decide. I do not find that these questions can be solved by a reference to the rules and regulations, in which there is reference to a Synodical commission, and if they should require to be solved, that could only be done by a proof as to the practice of the Church, and also as to the consent of the pursuer. I have not been able to resist the conclusion that the pursuer has relevantly averred that on this ground the sentence of which he complains was ultra vires, unauthorised by the contract, and in breach of it.

"If it be said that this objection relates merely to matters of procedure in the exercise of Church discipline, which were necessarily under the control of the Synod, and could not be considered by the Court, the answer seems to be, that the breach of contract complained of in the case of M'Millan v. The Free Church of Scotland was to a large extent of the same character, and was alleged to consist in the entertainment by the General Assembly of charges which had not been competently brought up on appeal. But the objection was considered relevant.

"On the whole, it appears that on these special points, viz., the power of the Synod to remit to the Synodical commission, and the power of the Synodical commission to review the judgment of the Presbytery and to decide the cause, the pursuer has made a relevant averment of breach of contract. It might, of course, turn out on inquiry that there had been no breach of the contract, or that the pursuer was barred from objecting to the judgment of the Synodical commission; but these points could not be determined without a proof, and therefore, for the purposes of this judgment, breach of contract must be assumed.

"But the defenders contend that they are still entitled to judgment, and they have supported that contention on various grounds.

"It is maintained that appeal to the civil Courts is renounced and excluded by the contract. This contention is expressed in plea 9. On this point I refer to the last paragraph of my former opinion, to which I adhere. I think that inquiry is not excluded by contract.

"It was further argued that the Court could not entertain this action because it involved no question of civil right or patrimonial interest. This argument is embraced in plea 6. On this point I refer to my previous opinion, and have little to add. It may be correct to say that the Court will not entertain a question as to the breach of a contract which has no relation to civil or patrimonial rights. No doubt that is a sound proposition; but I have not been able to think that that principle applies in this case. I think that this case involves questions as to the pursuer's status or position in society, his eligibility for office, and the emoluments attending his office and forming his livelihood, any of which would be sufficient to warrant the Court in entertaining the action.

"There is no doubt, I suppose, that in point of fact the pursuer has been deprived of his stipend by the sentence. He enjoyed a stipend before. He does not enjoy a stipend now. That difference in his circumstances was occasioned by the sentence. It is true that the stipend could not be

Synod was empowered to decide cases brought before it by appeal, but no authority was given it to delegate its powers in this respect to a commission of its number. Such a delegation was contrary to the rule of the common law delegatus non potest delegare, and was a breach recovered by an action. But it none the less existed, and it is none the less true to affirm that the pursuer has lost it. Had it been recoverable at law, there would have been no doubt that it was a patrimonial interest; its character as such does not seem to me to be destroyed by the circumstance that the pursuer could not sue for it. I need not repeat the references to the cases which were quoted at the debate on the preliminary defences. The pursuer referred, in addition, to Murray v. Burgess, 1866, 1 P. C. Appeals, 362; Long v. Bishop of Capetown, 1863, 1 Moore's P. C. N. S. 411; Bishop of Natal v. Gladstone, 1866, L. R. 3 Eq. 1; O'Keefe v. Cullen, 7 C. L. Irish Rep. 319. These are certainly cases of great importance in regard to the grounds on which Courts of law will interfere or decline to interfere with the sentences of voluntary Churches. I doubt, however, whether they are material to the present question, because I think in all of them it was more obvious and undeniable than it is in this case that interests of a patrimonial character were directly involved, except in the case of O'Keefe.

"In that case, however, the questions were raised in the form of an action of damages, which of itself undoubtedly brought the case within the jurisdiction of the Court.

"In the earlier English club cases, the Court seemed to interfere on the ground of gross injustice to the expelled member who was complaining. But I rather think that in the more recent cases the title to invoke the aid of the Court has been based on the proprietary right of the member complaining in the club-house, or on his right to use or occupy it. The contention that such interests as the pursuer can here qualify are not sufficient to warrant the interference of the Court may certainly be supported by important authority. But having reconsidered the cases, I remain of the opinion already expressed, that the weight of authority is, on this point, on the side of the pursuer.

"The defenders further argued that the Court should refuse to entertain this action, on the principle that it will not pronounce a decree which it cannot enforce, for that here the United Presbyterian Church would pay no regard to a decree of reduction of the sentence of suspension, and would (so I understand the argument) disregard an interdict in terms of the conclusions for interdict. The pursuer could not, it was maintained, be restored through the decree of the Court to his former relations with the Cathedral Square congregation, or to his right to officiate in the church connected with that congregation, and the defenders could not be restrained from appointing another minister to officiate there.

"It is quite true that a Court will refuse to pronounce a decree which it cannot enforce. That principle was affirmed in the case of Aitken v. The Associated Carpenters and Joiners of Scotland, 4th July 1885, 12 R. 1206; but in that case the inability of the Court to give an effectual decree as demanded arose from express statutory provision, and not from any arrogation of independence of the Courts of the country. I think that principle does not apply in this case. No claim or pretence of the kind can be put forward or recognised. I consider that if decree of reduction of the sentence complained of were pronounced, and if interdict were granted as concluded for, there would not be wanting means for securing that such decrees would receive due legal effect, that they could be enforced, and that the defenders would have neither right nor power to resist them. I am therefore unable to dismiss this action on the ground that it is absolutely impossible for the Court to give practical effect to the decrees concluded for if they were pronounced.

"On the whole, it appears that the pursuer has relevantly averred a

of the contract between the pursuer and the Church. The sentence which followed this illegal delegation was therefore invalid, and should be set aside.[1] The pursuer was in the same position as a party to a reference complaining of an award as ultra vires of the arbiter, and in breach of contract causing an injury which is of a patrimonial character, or of a character equivalent to patrimonial; that appeal to the Court is not effectually excluded by the contract; and that there exists no ground for refusing this action complaining of that breach, and no absolute inability to grant and make effectual the remedy demanded.

"Up to this point I am not prepared, as at present advised, to reject the pursuer's arguments. But the question remains, whether the remedy demanded, viz., the remedy of reduction and of restoration to the position existing before the sentence of suspension was pronounced, is a remedy which the Court ought to grant, or is in use to grant in similar cases.

"That question I have now come to think should be answered in the negative. It is a remedy which has not yet been granted in Scotland in any question about the sentence of a voluntary Church. It was asked in M'Millan v. The Free Church, and it was refused. It is possible that this refusal depended to some extent on the pleadings. But in the advisings there were various expressions of opinion against the competency or expediency of granting the remedy of reduction and restoration. In the second advising the Lord President (Colonsay) says: 'The Court may not have the power to repone and restore the pursuer to the ministry, but it does not thence follow that the Court may not repone and restore him to the effect of depriving the sentence of which he complains of any validity as an obstacle to the prosecution of his civil rights and interests, whatever they may be.'—23 D. 1329.

"On the same occasion Lord Curriehill observed that, on the assumption of the truth of the pursuer's averments, the sentence pronounced 'was ultra vires of the defenders, and the party aggrieved is entitled to have the nullity of the sentence judicially declared by the Court. But still no action is competent in this Court in reference to that sentence, except for the purpose of setting it aside as a nullity and awarding indemnification for such damage, if any, as the proceeding may have caused to the pursuer'—p. 1338.

"Lord Deas, p. 1345, says: 'If the sentences complained of shall be found to carry with them no presumption of validity, and so not to stand in the way of a claim of damages, there may be no necessity for any reduction of them. But if they are to be reduced, it has never occurred to me, and I do not think it has been suggested by any of your Lordships, that such reduction could go further than removing them out of the way as an apparent obstacle to patrimonial redress. Nobody contemplates that the defenders are to be ordained to receive the pursuer back into their association, to allow him to sit and vote in their Presbyteries, Synods, and General Assemblies, or that the Free Church congregation at Cardross are to be compelled either to listen to his sermons or to absent themselves from the church and leave him to preach to empty benches. The principle on which we should decline to take that course is a very ordinary principle. If a master unwarrantably dismisses his servant, we give pecuniary redress, but we do not compel the master to take his servant back into his service. If I engage a teacher in any department of science, literature, or art, the law will compel me to pay him, but the law will not compel me to be taught by him'; and he proceeds to state the principle: 'It is simply because the Court deals only with civil and patrimonial interests and consequences, and while vindicating or giving redress for these, refuses to go beyond them.' That is to say, as I think, that the Court will remedy the patrimonial wrong done by such a case the Court would set aside the illegal award, leaving the parties to the reference to work out their rights afterwards. The refusal of the Court in Forbes v. Eden[1] to interfere between members of a voluntary church in regard to alleged violations of the rules of such church a dismissal from service by an award of damages, but will not reinstate the servant in the position from which he was dismissed. His Lordship (Lord Deas) deals with the same point somewhat differently on the third advising in the case.

"The remedy sought in this case is of the nature of specific performance. That clearly appears from the conclusions for interdict. Now, there are many contracts of which specific performance will not be ordered. Possibly the most obvious and familiar example is a promise of marriage, which of course is not enforceable, and there are the whole classes of contracts of hiring and service referred to by Lord Deas in the passage quoted, which, generally speaking, will not be enforced specifically, but which will support only a claim of damages in the event of non-fulfilment. It seems open to doubt whether Lord Deas' statement of the reason for which the Court refuses to entertain such actions is entirely exhaustive. The principle is, I humbly think, more satisfactorily expressed by Lord Justice Fry in his treatise on Specific Implement under this suggestive heading, 'Where the enforced performance of the contract would be worse than its non-performance.' The 'relation,' he says, 'established by the contract of hiring and service is of so personal and confidential a character, that it is evident that such contracts cannot be specifically enforced by the Court against an unwilling party with any hope of ultimate and real success, and accordingly the Court now refuses to entertain jurisdiction in regard to them' (section 110); and again, at section 112, he says,—'It is not for the interests of society that persons who are not desirous of maintaining personal relations with one another should be compelled to do so.' I refer to the whole passage, in which the principle is more fully developed and supported.

"I apprehend that these are substantially the reasons for which our Courts will refuse in general to compel specific performance of contracts of hiring and service, and of various other contracts of a like nature. See also Lord Fraser on Master and Servant, 162, where the law is similarly laid down.

"It appears to me that that principle should be applied in the present case, in which the right of the pursuer stands only on personal contract, and is not based on any position created and protected by the law, such as that of a minister of the Established Church, the teacher of a parish school, or an official holding an independent position. It appears to me that the relation in which the pursuer stood to the United Presbyterian Church, so far as it was constituted by contract, was substantially that of a servant, and that the contract has all the qualities of a contract of hiring and service. The pursuer thereby agreed to perform certain services on behalf of the Church, and the Church, on the other hand, put him in a position of consideration and influence, and (substantially) ensured his stipend, although it is true that neither the Church nor anyone else is liable to be sued for it. It was nevertheless the pursuer's wage for which his services were rendered. Of course I do not mean that a minister is not actuated also by motives of a totally different kind, but these are motives into which no element of civil contract enters.

"If this view be sound, then I apprehend that decree of reduction cannot, or ought not, to be pronounced in this case; for it would be a mere contradiction in terms to affirm that a sentence suspending the pursuer from his office of the ministry, and dissolving his connection with Cathedral Square congregation, was null, and yet to affirm that he still remained sus-was based on the ground that no question of civil or patrimonial right was involved. That was not the case here. The effect of the sentence of the commission had been to deprive the pursuer of his status as minister of the church, and to render him ineligible for other ministerial appointments. It therefore inflicted a serious patrimonial loss upon him,[1] and he was entitled to be restored against that loss. He did not now crave specific implement of his contract, i.e., restoration to the particular office from which he had been ousted, but only to be restored to the status of which he had been deprived. Reduction would effect that restoration, and to that remedy he was entitled.[2] The pursuer was in a similar position to a ship captain illegally pended from the office of the ministry, and that he had not the connection with the congregation which he enjoyed before the sentence. If regard be had to the unlimited terms of the conclusions of reduction, to the conclusions of declarator, the conclusion for interdict, and to the pleas in law, I am unable to regard this action as anything but an action for restoration of the pursuer to his former position, and I cannot think that a mere general reservation of a claim of damage can affect the true character of the action. It has not been brought to enable him to raise an action of damages. It is not needed for that purpose. It is not an action to vindicate the pursuer's character. Our practice does not admit of an action for that purpose except in the form of an action of damages.

"This action raises the question quite purely whether the Court will set aside a sentence of a voluntary Church suspending or dismissing a minister, which was avoided in the case of M'Millan, and which has never been decided in Scotland. In this connection it may be proper to notice the case of Murray v. Burgess, supra, in which a sentence of suspension of the Dutch Reformed Church in the Cape of Good Hope was set aside in the Privy Council, with the effect, I suppose, of restoring the appellant. In that case no question as to the jurisdiction of the Court was raised, that having been determined in the Court below by a judgment not brought up for review. The minister's position seems also to have depended on certain ordinances by the Government, so that the Church seems to have been semi-established.

"I think the precedent in that case cannot be safely followed in the present case, in which all pleas are open, and which is not complicated by a State connection of any sort.

"It seems not out of place to consider that, if the present action was sustained for the purpose concluded for, the Court might, on similar grounds, be called on to determine other similar questions connected with the administration of the United Presbyterian Church. Probably it could not be called on to decide any disputed question as to the election of elders, as being wholly void of patrimonial interest. But it might perhaps be called on to deal with questions as to the moderation of a call, and I think it clear that such a question could never be sustained to the effect of declaring that a call was refused or sustained, and that for the reasons stated by Justice Fry, above quoted and referred to. Such a case would be closely analogous to the present.

"On this last ground therefore I have come to be of opinion that the reductive conclusions and the conclusion for interdict ought not to be entertained. For similar reasons I think that the conclusions for declarator should not be entertained. I think, however, besides, that these conclusions are not well framed, and could not be adopted in any case."

deprived of his certificate, who would be entitled to have the illegal decree set aside, not with the view of being restored to the particular command of which he had been deprived, but in order that he might again be rendered eligible to hold other like appointments. The judgment in the last stage of M'Millan's case was not contradictory of the opinions expressed at the earlier stage. The reductive conclusions were finally dismissed because in the opinion of the majority of the Court they were merely ancillary to the conclusion for damages, which fell as being directed against the wrong parties,[1] Lord Deas, however, being of opinion that the reductive conclusions might stand alone.[2] Reduction had been held an appropriate remedy in the case of an illegal decree pronounced by the General Assembly of the Established Church,[3] and there was no difference in a question as to the remedy between breach of a statutory and of a conventional contract. In England reduction had been held an appropriate remedy against the illegal sentences of ecclesiastical associations,[4] and of associations for social purposes, such as clubs.[5] Aitken's[6] case did not apply, for there the pursuer sought review of the decision of the trades union on the merits, and that was excluded by statute. The sentence of the commission should therefore be reduced. Proof was unnecessary, for the defenders had made no sufficient averment of acquiescence on the pursuer's part in the illegal delegation of the Synod's authority, and their averment that such delegation was in accordance with the practice of the Church was irrelevant in respect that it contradicted the written rules of the Church.

Argued for the defenders;—The case for the pursuer, as now presented, was not in accordance with the action as laid, the object of which was to have the pursuer restored to the particular charge of which he had been deprived. Reduction was asked only in case it might be necessary, and the reductive conclusion being clearly ancillary to the other conclusions of the summons, fell to be dismissed with them.[7] The pursuer now alleged that he sought restoration of his status by reduction of the sentence of the commission, but such reduction would leave him in a state of suspension, as he had, in accordance with the rules of the Church, been interdicted by the Presbytery at the time when the libel was served, from performing ministerial duties. All that he would obtain from the reduction, if granted, would be the right to prosecute his appeal before the Synod, but he might now, if he wished, bring the decision of the commission before the Synod. The result of the authorities was to shew that in two cases only would the Court interfere between an association such as a voluntary Church and its members—(1) when the pursuer claimed the emoluments of an office, in which case the question of reducing illegal decisions of the Church Courts might be incidentally raised; (2) where the pursuer alleged damage resulting from the illegal acts of members of the association, in which case the appropriate remedy was an action of damages. Reduction in such a case would remove the ground upon which the claim of damages was rested. In every case there must be a question of civil right involved or the Court would not interfere,[1] and in no case had the Court interfered where the question involved was merely one of status. In the cases of Long[2] and Murray[2] a question of right to emoluments was raised, and the ground upon which the Court interfered to set aside sentences of expulsion from social clubs was because of the proprietary right in the club vested in each member. Assuming the defenders' argument to fail, the pursuer could not get decree without inquiry, the defenders having relevantly averred that delegation to a commission was according to the practice and law of the Synod, and that the pursuer had acquiesced in the remit.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer conceded in debate that the only conclusion of the summons which he can support is the conclusion for reduction. The terms of that conclusion, and still more, an examination of the whole summons, shew that, in the conception of that writ, the demand for reduction was not made as for an independent and substantive remedy, but merely as ancillary to a more effective decree.

The proceedings against the pursuer in the Ecclesiastical Courts were directed to his being punished for having, under certain specified circumstances, met and walked with a young lady. For having done so he was in the end deprived of his charge as minister of the Cathedral Square Congregation in Glasgow, and suspended from the office of licentiate of the United Presbyterian Church; and this was done by the sentence of a committee or commission of the United Presbyterian Synod exercising powers which were de facto delegated to it by the Synod.

The scope and purpose of the present action, as laid, is unambiguous. At the time when it was raised the ecclesiastical authorities had not yet taken steps for inducting another minister to the Cathedral Square charge in the room of the pursuer. The prevention of this step was in truth the practical object of this action. The summons begins by asking for declarator that what was charged against him was not an ecclesiastical offence according to the law of this religious body; that this being so the prosecution was illegal, and (I omit in the meantime the reductive conclusion) he ends by asking that the ecclesiastical authorities shall be interdicted from following up these illegal proceedings by treating his charge as vacant and filling it up. Incidentally to all this, and quite logically and coherently, the draftsman, confronted with what on paper at least is a sentence of deprivation of the office in question, says, "and in so far as is necessary" sentence of reduction shall be pronounced (of the illegal proceedings), and the pursuer shall be reponed and restored thereagainst.

It thus appears that the conclusion for reduction in this summons is, alike in expression and in substance, merely an incidental step of procedure towards the vindication of the office of minister of the Cathedral Square Congregation in Glasgow. If anyone—this is the tone of the summons—shall vainly seek to set up this pretended sentence as a barrier in the pursuer's path to what he demands, let it, if need be, be formally set aside.

The action, as it now stands, is altered in two essential respects. First of all, the Cathedral Square charge has now been filled up by the induction of another minister; and the pursuer accordingly gives up his conclusion for interdict as now inappropriate. He gives up the idea of ousting his de facto successor and recovering the charge for himself. Second, his counsel ultimately gave up the attempt to persuade the Court to pronounce on the goodness or badness of the libel about walking with the lady named.

In the end, therefore, the sole illegality founded on is the delegating to a committee the disposal of the pursuer's appeal, and the sole decree asked is reduction.

The question is, Can we, in this action, give a decree which begins and ends with reduction?

Now—standing these words, "and in case it may be necessary,"—and looking to the substance of the action to which these words are relative, it would be difficult to pronounce a decree of reduction alone, the other conclusions being no longer insisted in. A broader view, however, leads to the same practical conclusion.

Courts of law, as I understand, take no concern with the resolutions of voluntary associations, except in so far as they affect civil rights. If a man says merely, "such and such a resolution of an ecclesiastical body is a violation of its constitution, on the faith of which I became a member or a minister," and stops there, the Court will have nothing to do with his case, and will not declare the illegality or reduce the resolution. But, if the same man says, "I have been ejected from a house, or have been deprived of a lucrative office, under colour of this illegal resolution, and I ask possession of the house, or I ask £500 of damages," then the Court will consider and determine the legality of the resolution, on its way to the disposal of the demand for practical remedy. There is there a specific claim of a specific remedy for invasion of patrimonial rights. If, and in so far as a decree of reduction may be necessary to effectuating such remedy, the Court will pronounce it.

In the present case, the pursuer asks no specific remedy. He has abandoned his claim to be retained in the position of a minister of the Cathedral Square Congregation. He does not ask damages; on the contrary, he reserves all claims of damages. He does not now (although he did formerly) ask to have restored to him his status of licentiate, for his senior counsel, by giving up the contention that we could declare (as he asked in his first conclusion) that walking with this young lady was no ecclesiastical offence in the United Presbyterian Church, leaves standing the original suspension, which (according to the written laws) automatically resulted from the institution of the libel. The only practical result, therefore, of reduction would be to leave the pursuer in the position of a suspended licentiate, with an appeal not disposed of, and (for anything he tells us or asks us to do) not likely to be disposed of. I do not think that such a predicament can be described as a status in any sense in which the word is relevant to the present question, or has ever been used in this juridical relation.

None of the cases in which (with obvious soundness) reduction has been granted, without any further decree, have been thus resultless. They have led, directly and by their own force, to the establishment of patrimonial right or to immunity from patrimonial claim.

The conclusion which I come to is, that this action has rightly been dismissed, because the averments are not relevant to support the conclusion for reduction, or any conclusion for reduction, no further remedy being sought. I am therefore not called upon to pronounce on the question whether the Synod acted illegally in delegating to a committee the power to dispose of the pursuer's appeal, and to sentence him. That must necessarily depend on what was, in fact, the law, written or unwritten, to which the pursuer is to be held as having committed himself as a minister of this church. These matters would only be examinable,—and they would be examinable,—in an action concluding for a specific civil remedy appropriate to the facts alleged. It is because no such remedy is even proposed that I think that this action should be thrown out.

The two opinions of the Lord Ordinary cover a wide range of discussion, and for this reason I think it well to say that some of the matters which he has so ably discussed are not involved in my present judgment.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is, I think, indisputable that the governing bodies of voluntary Churches or religious associations are responsible for non-fulfilment of their obligations towards their members in the same degree as the directors of associations constituted on a secular basis are responsible. But it results from the history of the decisions, and especially from that of the Macmillan[1] case, that the Courts in cases of this description will hold the pursuer of the action strictly to the subject of his original complaint, especially where the action is one for restitution or specific relief. This policy of the law may be justified on the general ground that a defender ought not to be called on to answer charges of which notice has not been given in the prescribed form. But there is another element, namely, the qualified privilege which I think is accorded to the proceedings of ecclesiastical bodies professing to act judicially,—that their proceedings are protected from review in the same degree as the proceedings of arbiters are protected.

Now, the pursuer in this case came into Court complaining of a substantial injury, viz., that he had been tried and condemned upon a libel which did not amount to a relevant statement of an ecclesiastical offence.

We did not think that his ground of action was well founded, because the laws of the United Presbyterian Church do not define the offences of which its Courts take cognisance, and it might well be that mere levity of conduct or indiscretion on the part of a minister of religion would be a proper ground for the exercise of Church discipline in the form of a trial on libel before the Presbytery.

The pursuer then objected that, on appeal to the Synod, that body had remitted his case to a committee or commission with power to dispose of it finally. I agree with your Lordships that this is not the true cause of action as disclosed in the summons, and that it would not be fair to the defenders that their counsel should be called to answer it in this action. I will not attempt to anticipate all the defences which might be stated to an action on this ground. One obvious answer would be that the pursuer did not appeal to the Synod, as he might have done, from the deliverance of the commission, and ask their decision on the merits of his case. Another defence might be (I do not of course mean to indicate an opinion) that the pursuer had submitted to the jurisdiction of the commission.

In dismissing this action, I do not wish to be understood as concurring in an opinion which is held by many, that in no circumstances ought a Court of law to cut down a decree or sentence professing to emanate from a voluntary Church Court or ecclesiastical authority. There might be a usurpation of jurisdiction so flagrant that the Church itself might be compelled to resort to the civil Courts for its protection against the acts of persons professing to represent it, and acting in its name.

In the view we take of this case, the question of the right of the pursuer to specific relief does not arise.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Dismiss the action, and decern: Find the compearing defenders entitled to expenses in the Inner-House, and in the Outer-House in so far as these were not allowed to the pursuer by the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 19th January 1895, and remit," &c.

by the pursuer when engaged in the employment of the defenders in raising a printers' guillotine to an upright position on a lorry.

The pursuer averred that on the occasion in question he was engaged, along with three other persons in the employment of the defenders, including a foreman named Patrick; that Patrick was a person in the employment of the defenders to whose orders the pursuer and the two other workmen were bound to conform; that Patrick ordered that the guillotine should be raised to an upright position on the lorry; that "the said order was an exceedingly dangerous one, in consequence of the great weight of the guillotine and of the insufficient number of men, namely, four in number, including pursuer, to do the said work"; and that the pursuer's injuries resulted from his having conformed to Patrick's order. The pursuer therefore pleaded that the defenders were liable under section 1, subsection 3, of the Employers Liability Act, 1880.*

The defenders denied that Patrick was a person to whose orders the pursuer was bound to conform, and further denied that there had been any negligence.

A proof was allowed. The following was the import of the evidence: On 25th June 1895 the pursuer was engaged as a labourer in the defenders' employment in removing a printers' guillotine from the premises of Messrs Adshead, printers in Glasgow, to the defenders' own premises. There were engaged along with the pursuer another labourer in the defenders' employment and the man Patrick, who was a fitter in their employment, and who deponed that he had charge of the contract for the removal of Messrs Adshead's machinery —a business which had lasted for about three weeks. The guillotine lay on the third storey of Messrs Adshead's premises, and it had to be removed therefrom to a court where there was a lorry to receive it. The guillotine weighed at least 17 cwt., and the defenders' regular practice in removing such a machine was to take it to pieces, which would have reduced the weight of the body of the machine to about 6 or 7 cwt. In this case, however, the guillotine was only partly taken to pieces, and the knife block and certain wheels (weighing 2 or 3 cwt.) were not removed, in consequence of a stud having broken so as to require drilling operations for its removal. The guillotine, after having been thus partly taken to pieces, weighed about 9 cwt., and the pursuer, the other labourer, and Patrick agreed to remove it to the ground, notwithstanding that it had not been wholly taken to pieces. The machine was hoisted from the third storey to the ground, and the three men then managed to slide it along the ground to the lorry. When it had been brought alongside the lorry, the three men could not lift it into the lorry, but with the assistance of the lorryman, and of three other men who were not in the defenders' employment, but who volunteered their services, they, by sliding and lifting, got it on to the lorry. The three other men then went away. The guillotine as raised on to the lorry was lying on its side, but

Patrick insisted—contrary to the remonstrances of the pursuer and the lorryman—that it should be raised from its side to stand on its feet—that being the common way of conveying such machines on lorries. Accordingly Patrick, the pursuer, the other labourer, and the lorryman, proceeded to raise the guillotine on to its feet. They were hampered in the operation by reason of the guillotine being top-heavy and not equally balanced. Patrick and the other labourer stood on the lorry, and the pursuer and the lorryman stood on the ground, and in order to enable the two men on the ground to raise their end of the guillotine the corner of it was projected about 18 inches over the side of the lorry. The guillotine after having been raised about three feet fell over the lorry and struck the pursuer's foot, seriously injuring it.

On 31st December 1895, the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) pronounced this interlocutor (after findings in fact):—"Finds that the defenders are not liable under the third subsection of the first section of the statute; therefore assoilzies them from the conclusions of the action, and decerns."

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The accident resulted from the negligence of Patrick, who was a person in the employment of the defenders, to whose orders "the pursuer was bound to conform" in the sense of subsection 3 of section 1 of the Act. His negligence consisted in (1) his not taking the guillotine to pieces in the manner usually adopted, and (2) in giving the order to lift the machine with an inadequate number of men.

Argued for the defenders;—In order to prevail under section 1, subsec. 3, it was not enough to shew that an order was given, and an accident occurred in obeying it. It must be shewn that the order was an improper one. Here the most that could be said was that the accident had happened through an error in judgment.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case there is not much difficulty as to the facts. We know the weight of the machine. We know that it was actually lifted on to a lorry by seven men after being brought down stairs by a hoist. What then remained to be done was to raise the machine by tilting it into an upright position on the lorry. This was an operation requiring care, but not much skill. Similar work is done every day by ordinary workmen all over the country. It is nothing more than tilting a thing up so as to set it on end. The only difficulty, if it can be called a difficulty, consists in this, that when it has been tilted up it must be so steadied or balanced as to come down gently on its new base. Now, this is a very ordinary operation, which working men do every day under the direction of a man who is simply there to see that the operation is correctly carried through. If no foreman is present, one workman probably takes the lead, and sees to the operation being duly performed. But it is not, as I think, an operation requiring the presence of a superior workman at all. Even apart from authority I should have been inclined to hold that this was just one of those accidents which happen without any fault being attributable to anyone. But I think the case of M'Manus,[1] which was quoted to us, is in point. There a somewhat similar operation was being carried on. An engine was being lifted at one end, in order that it might be slewed round, and moved forward by a succession of lifts, and to facilitate the operation the foreman put in a brick below the engine, I presume to make sure, that when the men, after resting, came to make a second lift, they would be able to get their hands under the engine, and get a good hold of it. It so happened that in letting the engine down on to the brick a man's hand was injured. I think this accident may be fairly considered to be of the same description as that which happened to the person injured in that case, and I am glad that the opinion at which I should have arrived independently is fortified by the fact that it coincides with the opinion delivered by Lord Young in a case so like the present.

LORD YOUNG.—I reach the same result as your Lordships, although I must say that I think the case is not unattended with difficulty.

I think it proper to say, although it is an observation entirely in favour of the defenders, that I am doubtful whether Patrick was a man whose orders the pursuer was bound to obey, in the sense of the 3d subsection of section 1 of the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

He was a fitter in the defenders' employment, and was engaged with three labourers in what was ordinary labourer's work, they assisting him and he them. With the help of three other men they raised the machine on to a lorry. It may be that it would have been safer to have taken the machine to pieces first, but then this precaution cannot be said to have been absolutely necessary, because the operation was safely performed without adopting it, and I think the consideration of the alleged negligence begins after the machine was placed upon the lorry. When the machine was in this position, Patrick, the fitter, thought that it would be proper to set it up on its end, and asked the three labourers in common employment with him to help him, and they did so, and through their failure the accident happened.

Now, I doubt whether Patrick was a man whose orders they were bound to obey, or that there was negligence on his part in asking them to assist him in this manual operation.

I rather think that the true meaning of the section is that where a master is not in charge of his own work, but puts someone else to be obeyed as master in his place, and that person is negligent or careless, and gives an order without attending to it at all, with the result that serious injury occurs to those who are bound to obey him, then the master shall be responsible for him as he would have been for himself.

But I am very doubtful whether that applies here, where a man does labourer's work and asks other labourers to help him, he assisting them and doing his best and attending to the job. The question of his liability is akin to the question of a master's own liability for his own conduct where he asks his servants to help him, say, in moving a heavy box or table which falls on one of the servant's toes. I should doubt whether that was a case within the region of actionable wrong at all.

But I think it is sufficient to indicate my doubts, and to say here that there is no negligence in any sense. There may have been an error of judgment. I am not sure that the most careful man would not have concluded that four men could with reasonable safety have raised the machine to its feet.

I therefore come to the same conclusion as your Lordships, and generally upon the same grounds as the Court did in the case of M'Manus,[1] that the pursuer has failed to prove that the injury sustained by him was caused by the negligence of any man to whose orders he was bound to conform.

Right in security—Retention—Factor's right of retention—Effect of assignation to rents in bond and disposition in security where bondholder has not raised an action of maills and duties.—Held that factors who had been authorised by their principal to collect and retain rents in repayment of advances made by them to him were entitled to retain the rents in competition with creditors who held bonds over the property duly recorded, and containing assignations to rents in ordinary form, but who had not brought an action of maills and duties against the tenants.

Bankruptcy—Right in security—Factor's right of retention—Retrocession of bankrupt.—A, the proprietor of heritage, appointed a firm of house factors to be factors of his property, and authorised them to retain the rents which they collected in repayment of an advance which they had made to him on his acceptance. Subsequently a petition for sequestration of A's estates was presented three days before the term of Martinmas, and the first deliverance was pronounced on the same day. At Martinmas the factors uplifted the rents and retained them in repayment of their advance. The trustee who was appointed on A's sequestrated estates made no objection to the retention of the rents by the factors, and they lodged no claim in the sequestration. A having thereafter been discharged on a composition, and retrocessed in his estates, claimed the rents retained by the factors on the ground that it was property falling under the sequestration which belonged to him in virtue of his retrocession.

Held that the factors were entitled to retain the rents claimed.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN November 1892 Michael Douglas Dawson, brewer in Glasgow, bought certain subjects in Argyll Street and James Watt Street there for £14,600, and thereafter granted bonds over the properties for £9500, £3900, and £1250 in favour respectively of Miss Elizabeth MacBrayne, John Burns MacBrayne, and the debtor's wife Mrs Jessie Dawson. The bonds, which ranked in the order stated, were dated 19th, and recorded 30th December 1892, and contained assignations to rents in common form.

In order to enable Dawson to carry through this transaction, Stevenson & Lauder, house factors in Glasgow, lent him £200 upon his acceptance, and it was agreed that Stevenson & Lauder should, as factors of the security subjects, collect the rents, and should be entitled to take payment of their advance out of the rents collected. In pursuance of this agreement the advance had by 8th November 1893 been reduced to £100, for which Stevenson & Lauder took a renewed bill.

On 8th November 1893 a petition for sequestration of Dawson's estates was presented, and the first deliverance was pronounced on the same date. On 22d November a trustee was appointed.

On 11th November 1893 Stevenson, Lauder, & Gilchrist, who had succeeded to Stevenson & Lauder, collected the rents then due, and proposed to retain £100 out of the amount collected in repayment of the unpaid balance of the advance; but on 18th November the MacBraynes intimated to Stevenson, Lauder, & Gilchrist that they claimed the whole sum collected in virtue of the assignations to rents in their bonds. At this date the MacBraynes had taken no steps to enter into possession of the security subjects by action of maills and duties, but on 1st December they brought such an action, and subsequently obtained decree therein.

On 4th December 1893, John Burns MacBrayne brought the present action of multiplepoinding in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow in name of Stevenson, Lauder, & Gilchrist, and in the condescendence annexed to the petition set forth the fund in medio at £421, 5s., as being the total amount of the rents collected by Stevenson, Lauder, & Gilchrist at the previous Martinmas.

Stevenson, Lauder, & Gilchrist then lodged a condescendence of the fund in medio in which they stated the amount of the fund at £129, 14s. 8d., being the amount of the rents collected by them under deduction of the £100 which they claimed right to retain, and of certain other items about which there was ultimately no dispute.

Thereafter, during the dependence of the action in the Sheriff Court, there ensued a variety of procedure and change of circumstances, which need not here be detailed. It is sufficient to state that the trustee in Dawson's sequestration admitted that the balance of rents due by the nominal raisers was £129, 14s. 8d. (the sum stated in their condescendence of the fund in medio), and made no claim as against them in the action; that Stevenson, Lauder, & Gilchrist lodged no claim in the sequestration; that on 19th November 1894, Dawson was discharged on a composition and retrocessed in his estates; and that in December 1894, the security subjects having been sold, and the MacBraynes having been repaid the amount of their debts, they assigned their rights to Mrs Dawson, who then became the only person interested as bondholder in the amount of the fund in medio.

In this way the question at issue came to depend between, on the one hand, Stevenson, Lauder, & Gilchrist, who claimed right to retain £100 in repayment of their advances to Dawson, and, on the other hand, Mrs Dawson, who claimed the £100 in virtue of the assignations to rents in the bonds, and Dawson, who maintained that, in the event of his wife's claim not being sustained, he was, in virtue of his retrocession, entitled to £100 unburdened by any debts due by him at the date of his sequestration.

In the Sheriff Court the result of the action was to sustain the claim for Mrs Dawson on the ground stated by her.

Stevenson, Lauder, & Gilchrist appealed, and argued;—(1) Mrs Dawson had no preference to the rents here. No doubt the bonds contained a clause of assignation to the rents, and they were duly recorded, but this could not avail her, because the bondholders had not done diligence by action of maills and duties before the tenants paid the rents to the appellants.[1] (2) As regarded Dawson, his trustee had admitted that the fund in medio was correctly stated, and now that he was retrocessed Dawson could not go back upon this admission. Even if the trustee had not made this admission the appellants were entitled to a preference notwithstanding the sequestration.[2]

Argued for Mr and Mrs Dawson;—(1) The recorded assignation to the rents gave the bondholders a preferable right to the rents without the necessity of any action of maills and duties. It was true that tenants were in safety to pay to the landlord, but, quoad ultra, the recording of the bond was an effectual intimation of the assignation as against the landlord, or anyone deriving right from him on a personal title. The bondholders' infeftment was an effectual completion of their right to the rents.[3] (2) Alternatively, the rents passed under the operation of section 102 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act. 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), to Mr Dawson's trustee, and on his retrocession to Mr Dawson himself. Mr Dawson was not bound by his trustee's admission of the appellants' contention; there had been no claim and consequently no deliverance in the sequestration with respect to their right to retain. There had simply been the abandonment of a claim by the trustee, and the abstention from lodging a claim by the appellants. Mr Dawson therefore, by his retrocession, became entitled to insist in the abandoned claim, freed of the personal obligation which the appellants formerly had against him.

Lord Young.—(After setting forth the facts)—Now, the Sheriff's judgment—that the bondholders having an assignation of the rents in their bonds which were recorded could object to payment of the rents to the house factors as these rents became due regularly and in the ordinary course of business—I do not appreciate. We are familiar—and we must take judicial cognisance of it as a known fact—with the practice as regards landed proprietors in Scotland having bonds upon their estates. In these bonds there are assignations of the rents, and the bonds are recorded and so the assignations are intimated, yet notwithstanding, the proprietors collect their rents either personally, or more frequently in the case of large proprietors,—invariably in the case of very large proprietors,—by means of their factors or men of business, the bondholders not interfering in any way whatever, although it may be in the power of any bondholder, or any number of bondholders, to interfere to prevent tenants from paying their rents in the ordinary way to their landlords, or to the landlords' agents or factors. But if there is no such interference, and the rents are paid in the ordinary way by the tenants to the landlord himself, or to the landlord's agent or factor, I do not understand the view that the bondholders can complain of any wrong or injury having been done to them. But the view that they can is the only view upon which the Sheriff proceeds in the judgment which he pronounced—that the bondholders are entitled to interfere to prevent the factors from applying these rents, which they lawfully, regularly, and in the ordinary course of business collected, in payment of the legal debt due to them by the party to whom the rents belonged, and upon whose employment they had collected the rents.

It was said that there was a specialty here, because a day or two before the term application had been made for sequestration. It does not appear to me that that makes any difference. Sequestration might be awarded or might not be awarded. If it were awarded it would bring in the trustee in bankruptcy. If it were not awarded, then the fact of the application having been made before the rents were collected would have no effect whatever. I think the factors, as in a question with the proprietor, who had an absolute right to collect the rents himself, were entitled to retain them, and to retain them against any debt which was due by him, and if the trustee in bankruptcy here had insisted in a claim to that effect I am by no means satisfied that he would have been entitled to get that money out of the hands of the factors. But assuming that he would, or that they did not choose to raise any question with him as to putting the money into his hands, I think their claim in the sequestration would have been well founded upon their legitimate right of retention for a debt justly due to them by the owner of the property upon whose authority they had collected the money. That would have led precisely to the same result, and it is quite unnecessary for us to consider whether they might not have said to the trustee effectually and conclusively, "We have a right to retain, and we will not hand over the money to you." The legitimacy of their claim—the legal view respecting it—depends entirely upon the right of retention, for it is that which gives them a preference over any of the other creditors.

Upon these grounds I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff ought to be altered, and that Messrs Stevenson, Lauder, & Gilchrist are entitled to prevail.

LORD TRAYNER.—Between Mr Dawson and the pursuers there can, I venture to think, be no question. The effect of the retrocession of Mr Dawson was to put him exactly in the same position as if his estates had never been sequestrated. The sequestration being then out of the way matters stand thus between the nominal raisers and Mr Dawson:—He was the proprietor of certain subjects in regard to which the nominal raisers acted as his factors. They had as factors uplifted the rents of the property as they became due. They had, however, advanced money to Mr Dawson, and I think it is not open to question that, at any time when they were accounting to Mr Dawson for the money they had collected for him, they were entitled out of that money to repay themselves what Mr Dawson owed them. Therefore in a question with Mr Dawson the proper fund in medio was the amount collected by the nominal raisers as his factors, less the amount which Mr Dawson owed to them.

With regard to the question between the nominal raisers and the bondholders' assignee, I am satisfied that the latter, in the position in which she stood, had no right over the rents collected giving her priority to the nominal raiser's claim. The factors legitimately had retained out of the rents received by them the amount of their advances to Mr Dawson. A bond and disposition in security containing an assignation to rents in common form, but with no diligence proceeding upon it, gives the bondholder no preferable right to the rents in a question either against the tenant or against the factor who has received the rents for the landlord.

Jurisdiction—Foreign—Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa—Delay in raising action.—A foreign ship arrested jurisdictionis fundandæ causa on the 5th June sailed from the country before the end of the month. An action was raised against the owners on 30th August. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that the arrestment had not become invalid because of delay in raising the action, and the jurisdiction of the Court sustained.

Opinions that there might be such unreasonable delay in following up arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa that the Court would refuse effect to the arrestment.

Observed that arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa imposed no nexus on the subjects arrested.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

THIS was an action at the instance of Mrs Marion Guthrie or Craig, widow of Alexander Craig, stevedore, Paisley, against the owners and master of the s.s. "Nordlyset" concluding for damages in respect of the death of her husband who had been killed while unloading the vessel in Cessnock Dock, Glasgow.

The defenders were resident in Norway, and the pursuer arrested the vessel jurisdictionis fundandæ causa on 5th June 1895. The vessel left the country before the end of June. The summons in the action was signeted on 30th August 1895.

The defenders averred that the arrestment had become inoperative before the action was raised, and pleaded, inter alia, "no jurisdiction."

On 26th December 1895 the Lord Ordinary repelled this plea.*

* "OPINION.—The defenders in this case plead 'no jurisdiction,' and it was conceded that this plea depends on the validity of the arrestments of the steamship 'Nordlyset' used to found jurisdiction. The arrestment was used on 5th June 1895, when the ship was in Scottish waters, and near Glasgow, and the summons was not signeted until 30th August, that is, after an interval of eighty-six days. It is argued that by that time the arrestmen:

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—There had been undue delay in following up the arrestment, and the arrestment had therefore become inoperative. Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa was founded on an arbitrary and unreasonable rule of the Scottish Courts. It imposed no nexus on the subject arrested. It did no more than give notice to a foreigner that an action would be raised, and afford a good answer in ordinary circumstances to the plea of no jurisdiction.[1] But the action must be raised tempestive. There must be some limit of time to the operative effect of an arrestment which was founded on no principle of law. A reasonable period would be twenty-one days, as in the case of arrestment in security, or at most forty days, after the lapse of which even a residential domicile was lost for the purpose of jurisdiction. If the view of the Lord Ordinary were sustained, a foreigner might suffer great hardship, for he would be liable to answer a summons raised at any time, however remote, after the arrestment had been used. The practice was to follow up such an arrestment by immediately raising an action.

had become inoperative. Between these dates and some time in June the ship had left, and had gone out of the country. The question seems not without difficulty, but I am of opinion that the plea ought to be repelled, and that the jurisdiction of the Court should be sustained.

"It is settled that when objection is taken to the jurisdiction of the Court, in a question of the kind raised in this action, the question is, whether there was jurisdiction at the date of citation.—Stewart v. North, 14th July 1890, 17 R. (H. L.) 63. It is not well settled whether an arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa creates a nexus on the object arrested—See Malone v. Caledonian Railway Company, 28th May 1894, 11 R. 853, and cases and dicta there referred to. But if it does not, then the validity of the arrestment to create jurisdiction cannot depend on the continuance of the thing arrested within the country; and if it does create a nexus, then I think that the effect of the arrestment on the liability of the defenders to answer in the Courts of Scotland cannot be destroyed by the defenders' voluntary disregard of the arrestment. Accordingly it was not argued that the efficacy of the arrestment in founding jurisdiction was destroyed by the ship leaving the country before citation on the summons. The argument was to the effect that the arrestment was lost by delay. It was urged that it was unreasonable to hold a foreigner liable to answer in the Scotch Courts when no step was taken to follow up the arrestment. The defenders supported their argument by two analogies,—the first, the analogy of jurisdiction in virtue of the defenders' personal presence in the territory; and the second, the analogy of arrestment in security on the dependence of an action. It is our law that residence of a party in the territory for forty days will give the Scotch Courts jurisdiction to try ordinary actions against him, not involving questions of status. That is customary law. It is also the law that if a man be absent from his usual place of residence for forty days he falls to be cited edictally,—Act of Sederunt, 14th December 1805; Joel v. Gill, 10th June 1859, 21 D. 929. It was argued that in like manner the force of an arrestment to found jurisdiction should fall in forty days. But I see no ground for reasoning from a rule settled by custom, or a rule settled by Act of Sederunt, to a case wherein neither custom nor municipal regulation can be appealed to. It was further pleaded that, if that argument could not be supported, the rule applicable to arrestments on the dependence should be adopted, viz., that the arrestment should fall unless the warrant of citation on the summons was executed within twenty days after the date of the execution of the arrestment—1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114, sect. 17. But

Argued for the pursuer;—The arrestment when used was admittedly valid. It lay upon the defenders, therefore, to shew that it had ceased to be operative. There was no authority to the effect that mere lapse of time rendered an arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa ineffectual. There had been no undue delay in raising the present action.[1] In White v. Spottiswoode,[1] it appeared from the session papers that there had been two years' delay. There was no analogy between arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa and arrestment in security.

Lord Adam.—The question here is whether the pursuer has constituted jurisdiction against the defenders, who for the purposes of this action are admitted to be the owners of the ship. The ship came into a Scottish port, and arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa was used on the 5th of June. She sailed away on some day in June, and the summons in this action was not served till August 30th. Now, it is said that in consequence of this delay in serving the summons the arrestment which was used had fallen and lost its effect. It was admitted by Mr Dickson that arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa is essentially different in character from other forms of arrestment, such as arrestment in security on the dependence of an action, or for execution, because this form operates no nexus upon property, the result being that the master of a ship is entitled to sail away without it was not maintained that the provisions of the Personal Diligence Act applied to arrestments used to found jurisdiction; and it is impossible to extend statutory enactments to analogous cases.

"It was argued that unless some limitation in point of time were admitted, it would follow that an arrestment to found jurisdiction would subsist for forty years, or possibly beyond that. But that does not appear to me to be a necessary consequence. For it may, perhaps, be that jurisdiction would not be sustained on the ground of an arrestment if there was clearly unreasonable delay in following it out, such as might warrant the inference that it had been abandoned. On this point I was referred to a judgment by Lord Stormonth-Darling in Jacobo v. Scott, 2d February 1895, shortly noticed in 2 Scots Law Times, 458, where jurisdiction in an action raised on 13th September 1894 was sustained in respect of arrestments used on 12th July 1894, it being held that there had been no undue delay; and in this case there are no averments inferring undue delay.

"Farther, it might be maintained that the Statute 1669, c. 9, and the 22d section of the Personal Diligence Act, applies to arrestments used to found jurisdiction, and if so, they would prescribe in three years. It may be worthy of notice that the hardship to a defender is not so great as is represented, because an arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa can, I apprehend, be loosed on caution judicio sisti—See Juridical Style Book, 2d ed. vol. iii. 564, and 3d ed. vol. iii. 325; Carlberg v. Borgesson, 26th November 1877, 5 R. 188, per Lord President Inglis, at page 192. Now, by the ordinary form of a bond of caution judicio sisti the obligation of the cautioner is limited to the period of six months,—Herries v. Lidderdale, 7th March 1755, M. 2044; Bell's Pr. sect. 275. It appears, therefore, to be within the power of a foreigner subjected to arrestment to found jurisdiction to force on the action in six months. On the whole, I think that the defenders' objection to the arrestments on the ground of undue delay fails, and that, as that is the whole ground of objection to the jurisdiction, the plea of no jurisdiction must be repelled."

committing any breach of arrestment. That is of course different from the case where there is a nexus laid upon property. In that case, it is necessary, to escape the effects of arrestment, to find caution, and then to come to the Court to have the arrestment loosed. Accordingly, the reasons applying to the one class of arrestment do not apply to the other, and the analogy drawn between them is not in point. If this be so, the question is, whether, assuming that the captain of the ship was entitled to sail away, any effect arises from the action not having been raised till 30th August? Now, there was a good and valid arrestment laid on, which undoubtedly created jurisdiction, and the only question is how long that lasted. No authority has been quoted, and I believe none exists, to the effect that mere lapse of time will cause an arrestment to become invalid; but it has been said that it is impossible to allow it to hold good for ever, and that some limit must be fixed to its duration. It is unnecessary to decide that point in the present case, for there is nothing to shew that here there was unreasonable delay, and so we need not consider whether such a rule might be applied in cases where that had been proved. Accordingly I reserve my opinion on the question whether, if the action had not been raised for a year or two years, we might not on equitable considerations apply some such principle as that contended for by the defenders.

LORD M'LAREN.—On the question of jurisdiction we have a very distinct and satisfactory statement of the law from the Lord Ordinary, in which I concur.

It is now settled, I think, beyond dispute that arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa does not attach the property arrested. Perhaps it has not been defined what is the precise effect of the diligence. It seems to me merely to attest the fact that the ship is at the time within the jurisdiction, and that notice has been given that it is the intention of the person using the diligence to raise an action founding on the jurisdiction which results from the property being within the country. It is difficult to see what hardship should result from the continuance of the effect of such a certificate or notice in the case of maritime subjects. No disability is imposed upon the owner of the ship, and the master is put under no obligation to make the ship forthcoming. Within reasonable limits, therefore, we may leave it to the person using the diligence to serve his summons, it being his interest to use dispatch. It may be that if the vessel sails from the country after the first arrestment has been used the claimant may wish to defer raising his action until she returns, so that he may be able to use arrestments on the dependence, and I cannot say that such a delay would be illegitimate. The Lord Ordinary thinks that possibly a fixed period might be settled, say six months, or perhaps a year and day, so that if the summons is served and there is no further procedure within that time the action should fall. I do not think it is likely that the Court would be called on to fix such a limit, for it would probably be held that the party who had used the diligence had not followed up the arrestments within a reasonable time.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. It is, I think, a very anomalous rule that jurisdiction should be founded by a diligence which is utterly ineffectual to attach anything. It is conceded, and indeed that is the basis upon which the whole discussion arises, that the arrestment upon which the pursuer relies lays no embargo upon the ship. It does not attach the ship. It is not an arrestment in fact of anything whatever, but is an arrestment which the owner or master of the ship may disregard entirely; or which, if it were used with reference to debts or goods in the hands of a third person, the arrestee might disregard so as to render it absolutely of no effect. But it is conceded, and I think the concession could not be withheld, that the rule, however anomalous, is so well fixed by decision that we cannot refuse to give effect to it. We cannot hold that an arrestment to found jurisdiction lays a nexus upon the subjects arrested, or that it must be immediately followed up by an arrestment on the dependence in order to make the jurisdiction valid. It is decided the other way. Now, if that be a fixed rule, the only question is whether there is anything in the circumstances of this case to prevent its being applied in favour of the pursuer. I agree that there is no sufficient ground for refusing to give the ordinary effect which the law attaches to this arrestment. I quite concur with what has been said that there may be a case in which the Court might find it necessary or proper to refuse effect to such an arrestment if it were allowed to lie dormant for an unreasonable time; but I am not prepared to say, as we are asked to say by the defenders, that an arrestment of this kind must be good for forty days and no longer. Nor am I prepared to say in this particular case that more than reasonable time was allowed to elapse before the action was raised. I am not disposed to agree with all that is said in the Lord Ordinary's note, because I cannot see how the question can be affected at all by the consideration that arrestments may be loosed on caution judicio sisti. The defender is not bound to find caution unless he is already subject to the jurisdiction of the Court, and I do not see what interest he could have in finding caution, or how that is supposed to alter the position of the parties. The sole effect of the arrestment is, according to the argument, to subject the defender to the jurisdiction of the Court; and if that is a disadvantage to him, I do not see how he is relieved by finding security to abide the judgment. The condition on which the argument proceeds, and on which we are asked to sustain the jurisdiction, is that there is nothing to loose. There is no means,—the ship is gone,—and that being so, the pursuer maintains nevertheless that there is a good arrestment. How this ineffectual tie can be loosed at all, or why it should be supposed that the defenders have any interest to have it loosed if they are still to abide judgment within the jurisdiction, I do not understand.

Feb. 7, 1896. Craig v. Brunsgaard, Kjosterud, & Co.

that he had been injured in consequence of the defenders failing to properly secure the roof of the mine. The action was laid both at common law and under the Employers Liability Act. The defenders pleaded that the action was irrelevant at common law, on the ground that they had placed the management of the mine in the hands of a certificated manager, in accordance with the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, and that it was not said that they had failed to supply the manager with every appliance for which he asked.

Held that the case could not be dismissed as irrelevant at common law, in respect that the record imputed fault to the defenders, as distinguished from their servants, in regard to their system of working, and that it was not impossible that a mining company might be guilty of such fault.

1st Division. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

DANIEL MACDONALD, miner, brought an action of damages in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, against the Udston Coal Company, on account of injuries sustained by him while working in one of the defenders' pits.

The action was laid both at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

The pursuer averred, inter alia, that he had been injured in consequence of a fall of debris from the roof of one of the roads in the pit. (Cond. 8) "The defenders were bound by law and the general practice in mining to secure the sides and roof of the said slope road by putting up wooden props, or otherwise securing the said sides and roof, in respect that the crush of the superincumbent strata was constantly liable to bring away falls, and in particular the defenders were bound by law and the general practice in mining to secure the junctions of the branch roads with the said slope road by putting up wooden props, or otherwise securing the same, on account of the extra width of the travelling road at that point, and the consequent greater liability to danger from falls. Nevertheless, the defenders worked the said road without putting up wood in any part of it, and in particular without putting up wood at any of the junctions of the slope road with the said branch road, whereby the pursuer's injuries, as before mentioned, were caused or materially contributed to." (Cond. 9) "General Rule No. 21 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, provides that the roof and sides of every travelling road and working place shall be made secure. The defenders deliberately violated the terms of this general rule in respect that, as before mentioned, they did not secure the roof and sides of the travelling road, either by wooden props or otherwise, whereby the pursuer's injuries, as before mentioned, were caused or contributed to."

The defenders pleaded that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant.

On 19th November 1895 the Sheriff-substitute, before answer, allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed to the First Division for jury trial.

The defenders objected to the relevancy of the action as laid at common law. They argued;—By statute a coalmaster was bound to place every mine under the control of a certificated manager, and the responsibility for the management of the mine was laid upon this manager.* The duties of a coalmaster, who did not personally supervise the working of the pit, were to employ competent servants, to comply with all the requirements of the manager, and to supply him with everything which he declared to be necessary for the working of the pit. If he fulfilled these duties no action would lie against the coalmaster at common law.[1] It was not alleged that the defenders had failed in any of these duties, or that they knew of the defect complained of. In no case, with the possible exception of Murdoch v. Mackinnon,[2] had a coalmaster been found liable in damages at common law, and in that case the damages claimed were under the statutory limit, and the defenders had therefore no interest in raising the question now argued. If rule 21 of section 49 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act had not been complied with, the failure was to be ascribed to the fault of the manager, and not to that of the company.

Argued for the pursuer;—The Coal Mines Regulation Act[3] imposed the duty upon the coalmasters of seeing that the roofs of the mine were made secure. A like obligation lay upon them at common law to see that their system of working was safe. They could not delegate these obligations to a manager so as to relieve themselves of responsibility if he failed to discharge them,[4] and there was no difference in this respect between a coal mining company and an individual coalmaster,[5] who could not exercise personal supervision. The cases quoted by the defenders did not establish that a mining company could get rid of all its duties as employer by employing competent agents. There were duties which they could not delegate, and it was no answer for the company to say that they were ignorant that these duties were not being satisfactorily discharged.[6] At all events the contention of the defenders was premature. In all the cases quoted, the decisions were given after evidence had been heard, and the Court would in general refuse to decide a point of this kind until the facts were ascertained, especially where, as here, the action had to go to trial in any case as regarded the claim under the Act.[4] Further, the special defence of delegation should have been specifically averred.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Before we could throw out this action as laid at common law without ascertaining the facts, we must be sure that the record, when read as a whole, raises any of the questions which Mr Ure has discussed. For my part, I find it sufficient to say that cond. 8 seems to impute fault to the defenders, as distinguished from their servants, in a matter which may fairly be described as their system of working. I am not prepared to say that it is a legal impossibility that a mining company can be guilty of such fault, and beyond this I am not at present required to go.

Feb. 18, 1896. Burns v. Diamond.

Process—Jury Trial—Issue—Motion to vary—Substitution of new issue—Dismissal of action—Court of Session Act, 1868 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 28—A. S., 14*th October* 1868, sec. 6.—Upon a motion to vary the terms of an issue, it is incompetent either (1) for a party to propose a new issue resting upon an entirely separate ground of action, or (2) for the Court to disallow altogether the issue whose terms are sought to be varied, and dismiss the action as irrelevant.

Observed, per Lord M'Laren, that when it is desired to substitute one issue for another, a reclaiming note, and not a motion to vary, is the proper mode of bringing the case into the Inner-House.

1ST DIVISION. LdStormonth-Darling.

ROBERT BURNS, who carried on business in Glasgow as a proprietor of homes for the working classes, raised an action of damages against C. Diamond, the editor of the Glasgow Observer and Catholic Herald newspaper.

The pursuer averred that at a recent municipal election in Glasgow he had been a candidate for the representation of the Fourth Ward, in which there was a large Roman Catholic population and vote, and that as there were rumours abroad that he was a Roman Catholic he had, in answer to questions put to him by a representative of the defender's newspaper, explained that he had been brought up a Protestant, but he was not "anti-Catholic."

He further averred that the defender had thereafter published false and calumnious statements about him, and, inter alia, that he had in his newspaper of the 2d November 1895 stated that the pursuer was "undoubtedly a man to be watched. He has many plausible ways with him, but when he puts on airs as to religion and virtue he must expect that his conduct will meet with some criticism. Mr Burns has been declaring at public meetings that he never changed his religion, that he never was anything but a total abstainer. A short investigation has sufficed to prove—to our mind at least—the contrary, and we are anxious to place before the electors the sum and substance of the investigation we have instituted. . . . As a refresher might we ask, Is Mr Robert Burn, of the Fourth Ward contest, the same gentleman, who having been married in an Established Church, once called, while, as he believed, in extremis, for his boon companion, a Catholic, asking the latter to go for the priest, in order that he might be married according to Catholic ritual before death overtook him? Is Mr Robert Burns the gentleman who, while in Campbeltown, renounced the Catholic religion and embraced Freemasonry? . . . Is Mr Robert Burns the gentleman whose children have been known openly to lament the neglect of their religious training?" In a leading article, also, in the same issue, defender says,—"Allegations regarding Mr Burns' religion have been made, and the electorate will see for its own part how these have been answered."

The pursuer proposed two issues, of which the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) allowed the first as amended, and disallowed the second.*

The pursuer thereafter gave notice of a motion to vary † the issue allowed by the Lord Ordinary by substituting for it the two following issues:—"(1) It being admitted that the defender in the issue of 2d November 1895 of the Glasgow Observer and Catholic Herald newspaper, printed and published the paragraph—'Is Mr Burns the gentleman whose children have been known openly to lament the neglect of their religious training?' Whether the said paragraph is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer had so entirely neglected the duty of giving religious training to his children as to receive and merit their condemnation therefor, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? (2) It being admitted that the defender, in the issue of 2d November 1895, . . . printed and published the following statements, viz.:—'Mr Robert Burns, of Fourth Ward election fame, is undoubtedly a man to be watched. He has many plausible ways with him, but when he puts on airs as to religion and virtue he must expect that his conduct will meet with some criticism.' As a refresher, might we ask, Is Mr Burns of the Fourth Ward contest the same gentleman

* The amended issue allowed by the Lord Ordinary was in the following terms:—"It being admitted that the defender, in the issue of 2d November 1895 of the Glasgow Observer and Catholic Herald newspaper, printed and published the article set out in the schedule appended hereto, and in particular the passage,—'Mr Robert Burns, of Fourth Ward election fame, is undoubtedly a man to be watched. He has many plausible ways with him, but when he puts on airs as to religion and virtue he must expect that his conduct will meet with some criticism'; and the passage,—'Is Mr Burns the gentleman whose children have been known openly to lament the neglect of their religious training?' Whether the said passages are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represent that the pursuer, while making a profession of religion, had so entirely neglected the duty of giving religious training to his children as to receive and merit their condemnation therefor, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

† The Court of Session Act 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 28, provides that "it shall be lawful to either party . . . without presenting a reclaiming note, to move the said Division to vary the terms of any issue that may have been approved of by an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, specifying in the notice of motion the variation that is desired: Provided also that nothing herein contained shall be held to prevent the Lord Ordinary or the Court from dismissing the action at any stage upon any ground upon which such action might at present be dismissed according to the existing law and practice."

The Act of Sederunt, 14th October 1868, sec. 6, enacts that when an interlocutor has been pronounced by a Lord Ordinary approving of issues, "it shall not be necessary nor competent to reclaim against the said interlocutor if the party aggrieved thereby desires only to obtain a variation of the terms of the issue or issues, and does not desire to have such issue or issues, or one or more of such issues, disallowed in toto; but in every such case the party shall apply by motion to the Inner-House in terms of the 28th section of the said recited Act (the Court of Session Act), specifying precisely in his notice of motion the particular variation or variations which he desires should be made on the said issue or issues."

who, having been married in an Established Church, once called, while as he believed, in extremis, for his boon companion, a Catholic, asking the latter to go for the priest, in order that he might be married according to Catholic ritual before death overtook him?' 'Is Mr Robert Burns the gentleman who, while in Campbeltown, renounced the Catholic religion and embraced Freemasonry?' 'Is he the gentleman to whom the priest of the day in Campbeltown spoke in terms of the strongest condemnation of his attitude towards the Church after the opening of his Freemason connection?' Whether the said statements are of and concerning the pursuer, are false, and were made with the design of exposing, and did expose, the pursuer to public hatred and contempt, to his loss, injury, and damage?" The second of these issues was identical with the issue which had been disallowed by the Lord Ordinary.

The defender argued;—(1) Variation by substitution of two issues for one was unprecedented, and was incompetent. The second issue now proposed was in identical terms with the issue disallowed by the Lord Ordinary, and it rested upon an entirely different ground of action from the issue allowed. The proper course for the pursuer was to have presented a reclaiming note.[1] (2) The pursuer, by taking exception to the Lord Ordinary's issue in toto, had raised the question of the relevancy of the action. The defender was entitled, therefore, to have that issue disallowed, and the action dismissed as irrelevant. It was competent for the Court to do that under the last proviso of section 28 of the 1868 Act.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) The substitution of the two issues for one was essentially a variation. The issue allowed by the Lord Ordinary would not be superseded in toto, though for convenience it would be broken up. That was the converse of what the Lord Ordinary had done, for he had not really disallowed the pursuer's second issue, but merely incorporated it with his first. This being a variation, a reclaiming note would have been incompetent.[2] (2) There was no warrant for the defender's motion to have the issue refused in toto and the action dismissed. Besides, the action whether tested by the one issue allowed by the Lord Ordinary, or by the two proposed by the pursuer, was quite relevant.[3]

LORD PRESIDENT.—Two points of practice under the Act of 1868 have been raised.

The Lord Ordinary has approved of an issue which, with a slight difference, is substantially the same as the first of the two issues which the pursuer now desires to have settled. But the notice of motion now given, while purporting to be given under the section allowing motions to vary the terms of the issue approved by the Lord Ordinary, is in truth and substance directed to obtaining, plus the issue allowed by the Lord Ordinary, another issue which the Lord Ordinary has disallowed, and which rests upon a separate ground of complaint altogether. The second proposed issue is not an issue of slander, and does not use the terms of approved issues in cases of slander, but, on the contrary, resorts to a style of issue appropriate to a class of cases in which an ordinary issue of slander would not be allowed. Now, it seems to me that the Act of Parliament, as construed by the Act of Sederunt, does not permit a question of that kind to be raised on a notice of motion to vary an issue. The words of the Act of Parliament are,—"That it shall be lawful to either party . . . without presenting a reclaiming note, to move the said Division to vary the terms of any issue that may have been approved of by an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, specifying in the notice of motion the variation that is desired." It seems to me that emphasis must be laid both upon the word "vary" and also upon the word "terms"; and if fair effect be given to these words, it will be seen that what is proposed by that section is something widely different from an alteration of the grounds of action which are to be placed before the jury. In substance what is proposed here is that there shall be one action for slander, and another action for false statements made with an injurious intention, and with the result of injury. I think that is not a competent use of the provisions of the section, and that we are precluded from considering the merits of the proposed second issue. As to its merits, one could hardly avoid forming an opinion in the course of the discussion, but it is unnecessary to express any opinion upon that matter.

The second point was raised by Mr Shaw. He said (maintaining in the first place the limited construction of section 28, which I accept),—"If a notice of motion, confined purely to varying the terms of an issue, is presented, that entitles me, while resisting the motion, to avail myself of it to the effect of having the action dismissed on the ground of irrelevancy." Mr Shaw founded upon the last proviso of section 28. I entirely agree with the view, which has been thrown out in the course of the argument, that that is merely a salvo of the power of the Court to dismiss an action according to the existing practice. But if you apply the proviso in that sense, where was the power previous to this Act of Parliament, on a motion of this kind, to throw out the action? Certainly there is none under the practice that is introduced for the first time under this very Act; and if any analogous incidental proceedings are considered, it will appear that, once there has been an interlocutor by the Lord Ordinary sustaining the relevancy of an action and sending it to trial, it is beyond the power of the Court to upset that except upon a reclaiming note.

I am of opinion that we should refuse the motion as regards the issue approved by the Lord Ordinary. I do not think it necessary to criticise that issue, because it is, except in regard to the preamble, accepted by both parties. So far as relates to the preamble, it is perfectly plain that the full effect and meaning of the incriminating part of the article is only ascertained when the three sentences are put together as the Lord Ordinary has done.

Lord Adam.—I am of the same opinion. We have here printed, in this notice of motion to vary issues, the issues which the pursuer proposed should be fixed as the issues for the trial of the case. The Lord Ordinary disposes of them by disallowing the second issue altogether, and substantially approving of the first issue. This matter has been brought before us under the 28th section of the Court of Session Act, which gives the power to either party to "move the Division to vary the terms of any issue that may have been approved of by the Lord Ordinary, specifying in the notice of motion the variation that is desired." It appears to me that the changes proposed here go far beyond the variations intended by the Act. The notice we get is this, that the Division should be moved to vary the terms of the issue approved of by the Lord Ordinary, by doing what? Not by varying, not by altering the words of the issue approved of. We are not asked to do that. The pursuer asks us to substitute for the issue two other issues, which seems to me a very odd way of varying an issue. No doubt it is varying, for if you abolish every word of an issue it is varying; but that is not the meaning of the Act of Parliament. Accordingly, I agree with your Lordship that what we are asked to do here is not a proceeding authorised by the 28th section of the Act.

Upon the point as to the competency of refusing an issue altogether, I am of opinion that the case is not in such a position that we can dismiss it at the present stage.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think that variation has a distinct and well-defined meaning in the Act of Parliament, and that, when it is desired to substitute one issue for another, a reclaiming note, and not a motion to vary, is the proper mode of bringing a case into the Inner-House. If it be incompetent to introduce a new issue under a motion to vary, it follows, in my opinion, that on a motion to vary you cannot disallow an issue altogether, for that is no more a variation than the substitution of a new issue for an old one would be. I may add that, in my view, when an issue comes before the Court, either under a reclaiming note or under a motion to vary, the Court has power to make such variations on the form of the issue as it thinks proper, in order that the true question in dispute may be put before the jury, and I should have been in favour of making an alteration on the issue approved of by the Lord Ordinary, by deleting the words "so entirely" and "as to receive and merit their condemnation therefor," for I think these words are merely expletive, and have no tendency to direct the minds of the jury to the true question before them.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship. The Lord Ordinary allowed one of two issues proposed by the pursuer, subject to a certain amendment which he made upon it, and then he disallowed the second issue altogether. I think that is in effect and substance a judgment that the statement which forms the subject of the second issue contained no issuable matter. The issue is disallowed, because in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary the words complained of are not slanderous, and are not injurious in such a sense as to entitle the person complaining to an issue. That appears to me to be a judgment upon the merits of one part of the case, and I agree that it cannot be brought under review except by the ordinary process of presenting a reclaiming note. I do not say that it might not be possible to substitute two issues for one on a motion to vary issues, if it were quite clear that the substitution was not intended to present entirely different questions to the jury from those presented in the issue allowed, but was in truth a mere amendment of the terms in which the Lord Ordinary had sent the question to the jury; but I think the purpose of the present note is to submit to the jury a totally different question from that raised in the issue which the Lord Ordinary has allowed, and one practically identical with that raised in the issue which the Lord Ordinary has refused to allow. I therefore agree with your Lordship, irrespective of any question that may arise upon the merits of the issue proposed to be substituted.

LORD PRESIDENT.—With regard to the alteration suggested by Lord M'Laren on the issue, I had understood in expressing my opinion that this matter was not discussed in argument, and accordingly I was in favour of adhering to the terms of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, not that I differ from Lord M'Laren.

THE COURT refused the motion, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

Proof—Diligence for recovery of documents—Public Government Board—Inland Revenue—Instructions issued to officers of Inland Revenue—Reparation—Personal injury.—In an action at the instance of an excise officer against a firm of brewers for damages for injuries sustained by the pursuer, while engaged in the performance of his duty in sampling liquors in the defenders' premises, the defenders moved for a diligence to recover the instructions issued by the Inland Revenue to their officers as to their duties in drawing samples. The Board of Inland Revenue objected on the ground that the recovery sought would be prejudicial to the public service. The Court refused the diligence.

MICHAEL TIERNEY, an excise officer, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire, at Dundee, against Ballingall & Son, brewers there, concluding for damages.

The pursuer averred that he had sustained injuries by falling through a trap door, used for hoisting yeast into the defenders' brewery, while he was engaged in drawing and testing samples from the liquor in the vessels in the fermenting room.

The defenders pleaded contributory negligence, and averred that it was one of the pursuer's duties to make, and that he had in fact made himself well acquainted with the system of working carried on in the brewery, and in particular with the times at which the yeast was hoisted. They further averred that the pursuer had, in breach of a rule of the excise department, that their officers should personally draw the samples, sent two of the defenders' servants to do this for him, it being part of the duty of these servants to attend to the trap-door when it was open.

The pursuer having appealed for jury trial, and obtained an issue, the defenders applied for a diligence to recover the instructions issued by the Inland Revenue to their officers as to their duties (a) with respect to drawing samples from fermenting vessels in breweries; and (b) with reference to making themselves acquainted with the system of working adopted in breweries, and in particular with the time at which yeast is placed in the tuns therein.

The Board of Inland Revenue compeared and objected on the ground that the production of the instructions would be prejudicial to the public service.[1] The defenders referred to the undernoted authority.[2] No. 94. Feb. 19, 1896. Tierney v. Ballingall & Son.

THE COURT refused the diligence.

Insanity—Succession—Testament—Relevancy.—In a reduction of a will on the ground of the testator's insanity, a general averment that the testator was of unsound mind at the date when he made the will is not sufficient, if the facts stated or admitted by the pursuer raise a strong presumption that the testator was sane, and there is nothing in the will itself to indicate insanity.

In an action of reduction of a will, by which the testator directed the greater part of a large estate to be applied in promoting total abstinence, and preventing the spread of Roman Catholicism, the pursuer averred that the testator was not of sound disposing mind, but admitted on record detailed statements by the defender to the effect that the testator during his life had not only managed his own affairs but had been entrusted with the affairs of other people and of the public, and that he had devoted a great deal of energy and money to exactly the same schemes which he had endowed by his will. Being allowed to amend his record, the pursuer added a statement that the testator "was subject to insane delusions," that "he believed that he had a special and imperative duty to further the cause of total abstinence, and to oppose the Church of Rome, by devoting his pecuniary resources to those objects, in consequence of commands which he conceived he had received from the Deity, by direct communication, upon various occasions"; and that "these insane delusions dominated his mind and mastered his judgment to such an extent as to render him incapable of making a reasonable and proper settlement of his means and estate." The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant.

THIS was an action for reduction of the testamentary writings of the late Mr John Hope, W.S., Edinburgh, raised by Mr James Hope, W.S., and others, the testator's heir-at-law and next of kin, against the trustees appointed by Mr John Hope, for carrying his will into effect. 1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

Mr John Hope died on 25th June 1893, aged 86. He was possessed of very large estates, both heritable and moveable. He left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 2d August 1879, an inter vivos trust-conveyance dated 22d April 1890, a trust-disposition and settlement dated 26th July 1890, and several codicils of various dates between 1890 and 1893. The pursuers sought reduction of all these writings.

By the trust-disposition and settlement dated 2d August 1879 (which was afterwards to a great extent superseded and cancelled by the deed of 26th July 1890), Mr John Hope conveyed his whole estate to trustees for certain purposes, directing them to apply the capital of the residue (1) for the advancement of total abstinence, (2) in opposition to Popery, (3) in disseminating a knowledge of the evidences of Christianity, and (4) in promoting Church establishment and monarchical and constitutional government. The later deeds were silent with regard to 3 and 4.

By the trust-conveyance dated 22d April 1890, Mr Hope, on the narrative that he was "resolved to make suitable permanent provision for the carrying on of the total abstinence, antipopery, and other operations which I have been, and am engaged in, and for other works and operations and purposes," conveyed to himself and certain other persons as trustees sundry lands, and bound himself to grant assignations of certain bonds specified in a schedule appended to the deed, the value of which bore to be £84,459, 12s. 8d. He directed that the capital of the trust-estate should be administered as a permanent trust for the following purposes:—(First) In paying the expenses of the trust. "(Second) In expending not less than the sum of £1000 sterling, and not more than the sum of £1500 sterling, per annum in the carrying on and advancing the cause of total abstinence at home or abroad from the giving or partaking of any beer, porter, ale, wine, or cordials containing alcohol, or any whisky, brandy, rum, gin, or other spirits, or any spirituous or fermented or alcoholic liquors, or tobacco, or opium, as articles of diet, or luxury, or beverage, in any form and degree, and from the use of alcoholic or fermented wine or other intoxicating liquors in the celebration of the Lord's Supper, and in promoting, in the celebration of the Lord's Supper, the use of the grape unfermented, being the fruit of the vine commonly called unfermented wine, and these by means of the formation and carrying on by the said trustees, or by those whom they may employ, of children's meetings, young men's meetings, young women's meetings, adults' meetings, debating associations, societies and classes, public discussions, public lectures, limelight exhibitions illustrative of the subjects treated of at such meetings, lectures, and others, publishing or purchasing and distributing librettos, tracts, petitions," and by various other means: "and (Third) in expending the remainder of the said income and annual proceeds (but subject always during the earlier years of the said trust to the power of accumulation hereinafter conferred upon the said trustees) in the following objects, videlicet, in disseminating among the people of Edinburgh and elsewhere in the United Kingdom or abroad a knowledge of the antiscriptural nature and character of the doctrines and practices of the Church of Rome, otherwise called the Roman Catholic Church, and in arousing the people of Scotland, England, or Ireland, or of the whole United Kingdom, or of other lands, to a sense of the dangerous, pernicious, and evil influences and operations of the Church of Rome upon the people's civil and religious liberties, and in originating and promoting efforts and operations, whether religious or social, or political or otherwise, for the conversion of Roman Catholics to Protestantism and to Christ, and the hastening the overthrow of the Church of Rome, and in exposing and opposing all attempts to introduce a liturgy, or prelacy, or sacerdotalism, or ritualism, in any form or degree into or among any of the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland, and these by means of the following works and operations and enterprises and others, all and every one of which, when entered upon, I hereby provide and declare shall be carried out and effected in accordance with the evangelical Calvinistic principles of the Protestant religion as at present embodied and set forth in the standards of the Church of Scotland, videlicet, by public lectures," and various other means.

The trustees were empowered to accumulate year by year a sum not exceeding £1500 in any one year, until 1908, from which date the accumulated fund was to form part of the trust capital, and to be administered under the third purpose of the deed.

Mr Hope further provided that all the trustees named, and to be assumed, and all cashiers, factors, law-agents, and others employed must be total abstainers, and in full communion with the Church of Scotland.

He conferred large and detailed powers upon the trustees, and gave particular instructions with reference to different portions of the trust-estate.

By his trust-disposition and settlement dated 26th July 1890 Mr Hope, on the narrative of the deed of trust of 22d April 1890, brought under its operation the remainder of his estate, and conveyed the whole residue of the estate, heritable and moveable, belonging to him at the date of his death to trustees named, to be administered by them for the purposes set out in the deed of 22d April 1890, subject to certain minor directions with reference to particular portions of his estate, which it is not necessary to set out.

The codicils under reduction were for the most part concerned with legacies to persons of both sexes, conditional upon their being and continuing to be total abstainers from alcohol, tobacco, opium, and snuff, upon their not frequenting taverns, theatres, balls, and circuses, and upon their continuing to attend Divine Service in the Church of Scotland.

The pursuers, besides setting out or referring to the foregoing deeds and writings, averred;—(Cond. 8) "The said John Hope was in many respects a man of very eccentric habits, both of mind and body. For many years of his life he was subject to hallucinations, especially in regard to matters connected with temperance and total abstinence and with the Church of Rome. His speech, writings, and actions in regard to these topics were unreasonable and extravagant, and his mind in relation to said subjects was disordered and unhinged. Upon both the said topics he was subject to [insane] delusions. [He believed that he had a special and imperative duty to further the cause of total abstinence, and to oppose the Church of Rome, by devoting his pecuniary resources to these objects, in consequence of commands which he conceived he had received from the Deity, by direct communication, upon various occasions. These insane delusions dominated his mind, and mastered his judgment] to such an extent as to render him incapable of making a reasonable and proper settlement of his means and estate, or of taking a rational view of the matters to be considered in making a will. The pursuers believe and aver that at the dates of the said deeds and codicils, reduction of which is sought by the leading conclusion of the summons, the said John Hope was not of sound disposing mind. The said deeds and codicils are not the deeds of the said John Hope. . . ."

The words within brackets were added on amendment by the pursuers in the Inner-House.

The defenders denied the averments of insanity, and, inter alia, stated;—(Stat. 1) "The late Mr John Hope was a man of great business capacity. He was admitted to the Society of Writers to the Signet in 1829. Down to 1864 he was in partnership with the pursuer, Mr James Hope, and took the leading share in the conduct of the firm's business. After the firm was dissolved the late Mr John Hope continued to carry on business on his own account, and down to the date of his death he acted as agent for several important landed proprietors and other clients, all of whom placed the most implicit confidence in his professional ability and soundness of judgment. The deceased was also a man of great public spirit, and, besides attending to his professional business as a Writer to the Signet, he devoted much of his time to public affairs, and to the promotion of various schemes for the social and religious wellbeing of the people. In 1857, when he was fifty years of age, he entered the Town-Council of the city of Edinburgh as representing St George's ward, and he remained in the Town-Council, with the exception of a single year (1866 to 1867), for the long period of thirty-two years, retiring in November 1889 in his eighty-third year. . . . He took a special interest in the volunteer movement. In 1860 he was appointed a Captain in the 2d Edinburgh Rifle Volunteers, now the Queen's Brigade, having by his own efforts raised a company of 100 men . . . At the end of 1866 he started the 3d City of Edinburgh Rifle Volunteers, now known as the 4th Volunteer Battalion, The Royal Scots. Beginning with one company the corps grew year by year, until it was a fully equipped battalion of six companies. Mr Hope's connection with the Volunteers lasted until 1884, when he resigned.

"Mr Hope's views on social matters were broad and liberal, and in many cases he was far in advance of the times. He advocated free education as long ago as 1852. In 1848 he established a number of apprentice evening schools for males, and separate schools for females, where the ordinary branches of elementary education were taught by experienced teachers paid by himself. . . . These schools were continued by him till 1873, when the governors of George Heriot's Hospital made arrangements for having evening schools for young people. One of his female evening schools, attended by both Protestant and Roman Catholic girls, was continued by Mr Hope until his death, and is now carried on by his trustees. . . .

"Mr Hope's British League Cadet Corps, formed in 1860, one of the earliest, if not the first, in the kingdom, was the pioneer of the modern Boys' Brigade which was begun in 1883. For twenty-eight years, from 1860 to 1888, Mr Hope's Cadet Corps was a well-known institution in Edinburgh, and upwards of 6000 boys passed through the ranks. Prior to 1851, children attending the day schools in Edinburgh received no instruction in music or singing, and Mr Hope recognising the advantage of brightening school life by the introduction of these subjects, proposed to several of the teachers in Edinburgh that, at his own expense, he should send to the schools music masters who would give the children lessons in music and singing while in the schools. The offer was accepted, and for thirty years, from 1851 down till 1881, Mr Hope employed music-masters to visit and to teach music in forty of the Edinburgh day schools. The arrangement was only brought to an end in 1881 in consequence of ample provision for teaching music and singing having been by that time made by the school boards. . . .

"He assisted many young men in their University course, several of them becoming ministers of the Church. . . ."

(Stat. 2) "The late Mr Hope was particularly identified with the total abstinence and Protestant movements of the past fifty years. He himself became a total abstainer in 1839. In 1847 he founded the British League of Juvenile Abstainers. Branches of the British League Association were soon formed throughout the Lothians, and even in England, through Mr Hope's personal efforts; but Edinburgh was Mr Hope's special concern, and in the work of organising the Edinburgh branch, and in providing instruction by means of lectures, tracts, melodies, and in arranging public gatherings, entertainments, and excursions, he expended enormous energy. . . .

"In 1868 Mr Hope made an appeal to the minister of his own church for the use in the Communion service of unfermented wine. This proposal was not adopted, and in 1872 Mr Hope himself took up the idea of instituting special services to be held periodically in Edinburgh, at which the Lord's Supper could be dispensed with unfermented wine as a provision for those who had conscientious scruples against partaking of fermented wine at the Communion, and as the result of his exertions such services were ultimately, in 1882, begun. . . . When Mr Hope began these services very few congregations in Scotland used unfermented wine, but now upwards of five hundred congregations are doing so."

The defenders made further statements setting forth the interest of the testator, and the practical work done by him, in connection with the total abstinence and Protestant movements.

"From 1851 till 1859 Mr Hope carried on Protestant work in concert with the Committee on Popery appointed in 1851 by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. In 1859, when that committee was merged in the Home Mission Committee of that Church, Mr Hope took upon himself the whole burden of the classes, lectures, and other operations which had theretofore been in charge of that committee. . . . Mr Hope throughout the total abstinence and Protestant movements, with which he was identified, made large disbursements to meet the expenses attending the carrying on of the work. In November 1886 Mr George M'Gibbon, of the British League Office, prepared at Mr Hope's request from his books a statement of Mr Hope's expenses in connection with these operations carried on by him from 1st January 1847 to November 1886. The total amount was found to be, exclusive of interest, £70,583, 18s. 3d. The lowest expenditure in any year was that of 1847, namely, £269, 6s. 3d., and the highest was in 1875, namely, £2683, 8s. Between 1886 and 1890 Mr Hope, in contemplation of the inter vivos trust, which he subsequently executed, engaged several persons to carry on the trust work throughout the country. In 1889 he resigned his seat in the Town-Council, informing his constituents that he intended to devote what remained to him of life to operations which he had much at heart."

The pursuers answered these statements,—"The dates mentioned and the averments relative to matter of fact are believed to be substantially correct. Quoad ultra not known, and not admitted."

The pursuers pleaded;—Decree of reduction and declarator ought to be pronounced . . . in respect that at the dates of the documents sought to be reduced the said John Hope was not of sound disposing mind, and that the said documents are not his deeds.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons.

Hope v. Hope's Trustees.

On 18th June 1895, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.*

* "OPINION.—The late John Hope, W.S., died on 29th June 1893, at the advanced age of eighty-six. His nearest relatives who survived him were a brother and sister and several nephews and nieces, and they now seek to reduce the trust-deeds by which he devoted his large estates to the furtherance of certain social and ecclesiastical opinions to which he appears to have attached extreme importance. The deeds sought to be reduced (besides subordinate codicils, to which it is not necessary to attend) are three in number, two trust-dispositions and settlements dated respectively 2d August 1879 and 26th July 1890, the latter of which appears practically to supersede the former, and an inter vivos trust-deed dated 22d April 1890 dealing with large estates thereby conveyed, and designed to come into operation at its date. The trustees nominated in the two latter deeds are the same, except that Mr Hope was himself a trustee under the inter vivos deed. The body of trustees under the first deed—that of 1879—is somewhat different. It may be worth while to notice that the purposes of that deed were more diversified than the purposes of the later deeds. By the deed of 1879 the trustees were directed to employ the income of the estates (1) for the advancement of total abstinence; (2) in opposition to Romanism; (3) in disseminating a knowledge of the evidences of Christianity; (4) in promoting Sabbath observances, (5) Church establishment, and (6) monarchical and constitutional government.

"In the later deeds all these purposes except the first two are dropped, and the trustees are directed to expend from £1000 to £1500 per annum in advancing the cause of total abstinence, and the remainder and considerably larger portion of the revenue of the estates, in disseminating a knowledge of the antiscriptural character of the doctrine and practices of the Church of Rome, in awakening a sense of its evil influence upon the people's civil and religious liberties, and in opposing the introduction of ritualism into the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland. Mr Hope's deeds indicate a deeply rooted sense of the evils of intemperance, an unhesitating reliance on the beneficial effects of total abstinence, and an intense disapproval of and dislike to the Church of Rome and to all practices in any degree savouring of Romanism; and they formulate clearly conceived and comprehensive schemes, and give remarkably definite, comprehensive, and practical ideas about the appropriate methods by which his objects might be carried into effect.

"The point which has been debated is the relevancy of the pursuers' averments, and I have on consideration come to the conclusion that they are irrelevant, and not such as can be sent to proof.

"The pursuers' only plea is, that the deeds should be reduced because at their dates Mr Hope was not of sound disposing mind, and because they are not his deeds. The averments on which that plea is founded are contained in condescendence 8, the rest of the record consisting merely of a narrative of the deeds. In condescendence 8 it is averred that Mr Hope was not of sound disposing mind, and that the deeds were not his deeds. Now, no doubt, in a sense these averments, with the corresponding plea, are perfectly relevant, and if they were proved the deeds would be of course reduced. But they are entirely wanting in specification and detail. I consider that it is not sufficient merely to lay a deed before the Court, and aver that it was not the deed of its apparent granter. It is necessary, I conceive, to aver special facts from which the inability of the granter can be inferred, and which will inform the defender of the kind of case which he requires to meet. Accordingly the pursuers add to this general statement the averments that Mr Hope was for many years of his life subject to hallucinations, especially in regard to matters connected with temperance and total abstinence and with the Church of Rome; that his mind was in relation to these

The pursuers reclaimed, and were allowed to amend their record to the effect before stated. The reclaimers argued;—The question was, Was there mental disease? It was not necessary on record either to specify the physiological condition of the testator's brain, or to state the form of the delusions from which he suffered. The leading delusion from which Mr Hope suffered had been specified, but that merely led up to, and did not supersede what was the essential averment in the case,—and it was quite distinctly set out,—viz., that Mr Hope was unable to make a will. He was so dominated by the two ideas—antipopery and antidrink—that he was unable to give rational consideration to the disposal of his estate. Whether that was so or not was eminently a question of fact, and the pursuers were entitled to have it answered by a jury. It might be that partial mental disorder did not necessarily incapacitate a man from making a rational will, but it might, and the pursuers averred that it did so in this case, and there should be an inquiry into the nature and effect of the partial disorder. In Ballantyne's case,[1] the delusion averred had nothing to do with will-making, and yet there was inquiry.

subjects disordered and unhinged, and that he was subject to delusions in regard to them to such an extent as to render him incapable of making a reasonable and proper settlement of his estates. I think that these averments are still insufficient, and so defective in specification and definiteness as to be irrelevant. They probably indicate the nature of Mr Hope's mental defects intended to be averred, at least to the extent of shewing what kinds of mental defect are not intended. It is clearly not intended to be averred that Mr Hope was not of sound disposing mind either because of mental imbecility or of any failure of intellect incident to his great age. What is averred are hallucinations and delusions, and seeing that delusions and even hallucinations are not necessarily the product of insanity, I think it essential to relevancy that it should be averred that they were so in this case, or otherwise—in perhaps less exact language—that they were insane hallucinations and delusions. Counsel for the pursuers held that the addition of the word 'insane' added nothing to the meaning, but they stated that, nevertheless, they were willing to add this word. I think, however, that the record as so amended would still fall short of relevancy, and would not give the defenders the information as to the grounds on which it was intended to attack the deeds to which they are entitled.

"Mr Hope's opinions about total abstinence and Roman Catholicism may have been erroneous, extreme, and extravagant, and the importance which he attached to them may have been exaggerated out of reason. Many people, doubtless, think so; while there are, I have no doubt, not a few who consider them reasonable, wholesome, and beneficent; but unless he reached his opinions under the influence of some insane hallucination, the mere fact that his opinions were extreme, and were held with more than ordinary earnestness and tenacity, cannot, I apprehend, indicate insanity. If the pursuers knew enough to be able to aver that he laboured under delusions and hallucinations on these subjects, they must necessarily be able to say what these hallucinations and delusions were. They say—and perhaps are entitled to say—that if a man labours under certain insane delusions, it is not unlikely that other similar delusions may be discovered in the course of inquiry, and that they do not wish to tie themselves down to those delusions only which they have at present discovered, and it is possible that they might be entitled to add to a statement of specific delusions some general words which may meet such a case. Had they condescended on special insane delusions they might have made a case for inquiry, although Inquiry was much more necessary in a case like the present, where the delusion was directly concerned with the subject-matter of the will. The rationality of the will itself, moreover, was a very important matter, and should be submitted to a jury.[1] The deeds here were full of oddities, and saturated with the insane delusion from which the testator suffered.

Argued for the defenders;—There was no averment of general insanity here. No doubt the pursuers said the testator was of unsound mind, but then they admitted the defenders' statement of Mr Hope's life and work, which shewed, not only that Mr Hope was possessed of more than an ordinary business capacity for all sorts of affairs both private and public, but also that he had devoted a great deal of time and money during his lifetime to the very objects which formed the subject-matter of his will. That being so, very specific statements of the particular insanity from which the testator suffered,—its character, and the way it manifested itself,—required to be made to warrant a proof. There were none such here. In all the cases referred to by the pursuers, there were very precise and circumstantial statements of insanity. As regarded the particular delusion from which the testator was alleged to have suffered, the record was equally irrelevant. It might as well be said that anyone who believed in direct answer to prayer was not of sound disposing mind. There was nothing incoherent in the objects to which the testator had devoted his estate. His intense interest in their promotion did not in the least indicate even partial mental disorder, but even if it did, his general faculties were not affected by the so-called insane delusion.

it might not necessarily follow that the deeds would be reduced even if the hallucinations were proved. But I hold that they are not entitled to get into a proof while they withhold information, which ex hypothesi they possess, about the truster's insane hallucinations.

"The pursuers' counsel mentioned at the debate no special hallucinations, and seemed rather to put forward the view that Mr Hope's mind was so dominated and monopolised by the two ideas which possessed him, whether they were right ideas or wrong, as to be thrown clean off its balance, and rendered unable to take any rational view of other interests to which in making his settlements he ought to have had regard. That is hardly the case averred on record, and I am not prepared to say that an averment of that kind would be relevant.

"No authorities were quoted to me in regard to the amount of specification, and the definiteness of averment necessary for relevancy in an action of reduction of trust-deeds. Various important cases were referred to, and in particular the cases of Morrison v. Maclean's Trustees, 24 D. 625; Nisbet's Trustees v. Nisbet, June 30, 1871, 9 Macph. 937; Ballantyne v. Evans, March 3, 1886, 13 R. 652; Boughton & Marston v. Knight, &c., 1873, L. R., 3 Pro. and Div. 64; Jenkins v. Morris, 1880, L. R., 14 Ch. Div. 674; and the highly important case of Banks v. Goodfellow, 1870, L. R., 5 Q. B. 549. These cases, however, do not bear on the question of relevancy of averment, but on the effect of insane delusion on contractual or testamentary power.

"I proceed on the view that the defenders are entitled to more specific information than the record affords, and am of opinion that I cannot send the pursuers' averments to proof, but must, unless they propose to amend their record, sustain the first plea in defence and dismiss the action."

Such partial unsoundness of mind did not infer incapacity to make a will.[1]

Hope v. Hope's Trustees.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—My opinion is that the pursuers' case, as stated on record, does not entitle them to go to trial.

It may be that a bald averment that a testator was of unsound mind when he made his will, and that the will is therefore not his will, might be sustained as relevant without any more circumstantial statement. I do not pronounce upon this question of pleading, for it is not before me. The present pursuers have, with becoming frankness, done two things. They have substantially admitted the whole of what is a pretty full biographical account of the testator and of his relations during his life to the two public objects to which by his testamentary writings he has devoted his fortune after his death. They have also, by an amendment of the record, which can only be ascribed to a sincere desire to inform the Court, disclosed their reason for calling the testator insane.

It appears then, on the face of the pursuers' record, that this gentleman, during his life, not merely managed his own affairs, but was entrusted with the affairs of other people, and of the public. Concurrently with the performance of these professional and public duties he was devoting a great deal of energy and money to exactly the schemes which he has endowed by his will. All this went on for a period exceeding an ordinary lifetime.

I do not go into detail about all this, for it would never do to decide a case on relevancy by what are inferences from facts which might strike different minds differently, and are therefore appropriate to a jury, even although the true result might be easy of prognostication. But the point is, whether this admission by the pursuers of this very detailed account of the testator does not dislodge them from the position of being entitled to bid the Court take their word for it that the testator was of unsound mind, and that the will is not his will? I think that it does; and the pursuers seem to have thought so, for they have quitted the abstract, and have specified the kind of insanity which they allege.

Now, I do not think that the amendment of the record contains any good averment of unsoundness of mind. The crudeness of the language used cannot be permitted to enhance its significance; and it amounts to no more than this, that Mr Hope believed that in promoting the two objects in question he was obeying God's will, as made manifest by God to his conscience.

The amendment of the record seems to me, therefore, to weaken, and not to strengthen it. But, taking the record of the pursuers as a whole, including the admissions, the general statement of unsoundness of mind is to be read as relative to the will which it is said to invalidate. Now, let it be assumed as true that the intense interest which Mr Hope is said to have taken in abstinence from alcohol and in Protestantism made those causes the absorbing subjects of his thoughts, to the exclusion or to the prejudice of other matters, which are regarded by most men as of equal or greater importance. Some men devote their time and their means to what, on a fair view of life, will be regarded as matters of minor concern, and they exaggerate the importance of what, conversationally, are called their hobbies. But even one who does not sympathise with the peculiar views expressed in Mr Hope's will is constrained to allow that both his favourite causes touch large human interests, and are both susceptible of being advanced by such methods as he indicates. Now, if a man who has taken a lifelong interest in some specific subjects, even of minor importance, desires his fortune to be applied to their furtherance after he is dead, it cannot be said that the testamentary purpose is of itself presumptive of mental unsoundness, unless the sum bequeathed be so large and the object to be advanced so small that the application of the one to the other is impossible or preposterous. If Mr Hope's fortune had been a tenth or a fifth of what it was, I hardly think that his settlement would have caused surprise. But if regard be had to the far-reaching influences which he desired to counteract, to the unquestioned power of propagandism, and to the equally certain cost of such operations, there is no such palpable disproportion between the means and the ends as to presume unsoundness in a mind which desired to apply the one to the other. Accordingly, I do not think that res ipsa loquitur, so as to dispense with the need for particularising the kind of insanity which is said to invalidate the will of a man about whom the pursuers concur with the defenders in stating so much that is presumptive of sanity. As I have already pointed out, the pursuers have met the challenge for particulars by their amendment of the record; and for the reason already stated I think that it shews they have no case.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Pursuers (Respondents).—Balfour—Cooper.

ANDREW HUTTON, Defender (Reclaimer).—Dickson—Cook.

Property—Bounding Title—Measurement—Plan—Prescription.—A purchaser obtained a conveyance to four acres of ground excepting "those parts and portions thereof sold and disponed by me to A and B, all as specified and described in the disposition thereof by me in their favour, dated 11th July 1864." The disposition of 11th July referred to an annexed plan as delineating the ground conveyed, and also described that ground by measurement.

Held that the purchaser's title was a bounding title, and that he could not acquire by prescription any of the subjects excepted from the grant.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

UNDER powers conferred upon them by the North British (Galashiels and Peebles) Railway Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. cii.), the North British Railway Company acquired, by agreement, a piece of ground about 550 feet long by 50 feet wide, from Mr Robert Symington Grieve, merchant, Edinburgh, for the purpose of building a bridge over the River Tweed.

No. 96.

Feb. 19, 1896.
North British Railway Co. v. Hutton.

The disposition conveying the land was dated 11th July 1864, and the land was thus described:—"All and Whole these seven hundred and twelve decimals or one-thousandth parts of an acre imperial measure or thereby, being the portions of ground taken and used by the said North British Railway Company from the lands belonging to me hereinafter described, as the said portions of ground are delineated and coloured red on a plan thereof signed by me as relative hereto; and which portions of ground lie in the parish and county of Peebles, and form part of All and Whole these four acres of land of the Bridgelands, now called Walkershaugh, lying on the north side of the River Tweed, near the burgh and within the parish and sheriffdom of Peebles."

On 11th October 1864, Mr Grieve disponed the remainder of the four acres of Walkershaugh to Mr Archibald Marshall.

The disposition bore to convey the four acres; "but excepting and reserving always from the subjects before disponed those parts and portions thereof sold and disponed by me to the North British Railway Company for their line of railway from Peebles to Innerleithen, all as specified and described in the disposition thereof by me in their favour, dated the 11th day of July 1864."

In November 1894 Mr Marshall's testamentary trustees sold to Mr Andrew Hutton, printer, Edinburgh, the portion of the lands of Walkershaugh, "lying to the west of the North British Railway, extending to six hundred and fifty-one decimal or one-thousandth parts of an acre."

In 1895 Mr Hutton proceeded to erect a house on this land, when the North British Railway Company intimated to him that his operations were an encroachment on their property.

On 2d August 1895 the Railway Company raised an action against him to have him decerned and ordained to remove the building, or at least to take down and remove such part thereof as had been erected on any part of the lands belonging to the pursuers.

The defender in his statement of facts averred;—Stat. 5. "When the said Archibald Marshall so purchased the lands of Walkershaugh, under exception of the ground sold to the pursuers for their line of railway, there was delivered to him, with the titles of the lands, a copy of the disposition by Robert Symington Grieve in favour of the pursuers, dated 11th July 1864, but the said copy disposition had not annexed to it any copy of the plan annexed to the disposition in favour of the pursuers, without which the precise limits of the land sold to the pursuers could not be ascertained. Said plan was not validly incorporated in the pursuers' title so as to form the measure of their rights. They did not, under said disposition, acquire any right to the portion of ground now in dispute. The subjects disponed were only those 'taken and used' by them, which the said portion of ground never was, and under their statutes they had no right to acquire any others." Stat. 8. "A period of upwards of thirty years, being the full prescriptive period, elapsed between the date of Mr Marshall's purchase of the land in question and the date of the sale of it by his trustees to the defender, during the whole of which period Mr Marshall and his trustees had continuous, uninterrupted, and unquestioned possession of their ground, including a small portion thereof extending to about 24 square yards, to which portion the pursuers have now laid claim."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—5. The defender having set forth no title to the land in question which can compete with the pursuers', decree should be granted as concluded for.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—3. The defender having a good and valid title to the piece of ground in dispute (1) in virtue of his titles produced, or (2) in virtue of said titles and of prescriptive possession thereon, is entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons.

A proof was allowed. It was admitted that the area in question was within the pursuers' titles. It was proved that the area was within the alignment of the railway company's fences, that it had not been fenced off by the company, and that for thirty years it had been used by the defender and his author as part of a garden, the wall surrounding the area in question being upon the pursuers' land.

On 5th December 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor, finding that the defender had built upon a portion of the railway company's land, and ordaining the defender to remove such portion of the building as was erected on the pursuers' land.*

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The exception contained in his author's title was applicable only to land de facto "taken and used" by the railway company in the words of the disposition of 11th July 1864. But the area in question had not been even fenced, as the railway company were bound to fence it under section 60 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 33). He was not bound to refer to an unregistered plan annexed to the disposition. All a singular successor had to take notice of when he bought a property was what was in his own disposition, and what had entered the records. Now, here the defender found that certain portions of the land were not taken and used by the railway company, and he was therefore entitled to assume that these did not fall within the pursuers' disposition. Accordingly, it

* "OPINION.—In this case the first point to be decided is, whether the defender has acquired by prescription a right to the ground in question. He and his authors have had de facto possession for more than thirty years; that is to say, it has been occupied by their tenants along with the adjacent ground. But the pursuers dispute that the possession has been of the requisite character, and they maintain further that the title of the defender's author excluded the ground in controversy (being in fact a bounding title), and that therefore prescription cannot apply.

"I think that the proof sufficiently instructs the possession on which the defender founds; and if it had followed upon a title to which it could lawfully be ascribed, I see nothing in its character to deprive it of effect. But I am of opinion that, as regards the matter of title, the pursuers are right. The defender's title is deduced from a disposition by Robert Symington Grieve in favour of Archibald Marshall, dated 11th October 1864, and by that disposition there is expressly excepted from the conveyance the ground conveyed by Grieve to the railway company by disposition dated 11th July 1864. Now, turning to that last disposition it is not, I think, doubtful that it includes a conveyance of the ground in dispute. That ground is required to meet the measurement of the area disponed. The disposition is with reference to an annexed plan, which shews the ground in question as within the conveyance. And it does not appear to me that, because the disposition is of ground 'taken and used' by the railway company, that expression can reasonably be held to limit the disposition to such ground as might de facto be fenced off from the adjacent ground by a railway fence. That being so, I am compelled to hold that the area in question is within the pursuers' title, and is excluded from that of the defender, and that the defender has therefore no title upon which he can plead prescription. . . ."

No. 96.

Feb. 19, 1896.
North British Railway Co. v. Hutton.

could not be said that his was a bounding title,[1] which excluded prescription. The description was capable of the construction that it had included the ground in question. In short, there was an ambiguity on the face of the title which the defender was entitled to remove, by shewing, as he had done, that he had possessed exclusively for the prescriptive period the subjects in dispute.[2] Reid's[3] case was practically overruled by Auld's[4] case.

Argued for the pursuers;—The pursuers' title was a bounding title. Erskine's definition[1] of such a title as one pointing out the limits of the grant by "march-stone" was intelligible at a period when the country was not fenced. In such a case it was necessary to go outside the title itself. The modern conveyancer in drafting such a title referred as here to a plan and to measurement of the ground. What, then, the defender under his title obtained was part of the ground, minus what was disponed to the pursuers. Accordingly, he got an unequivocal reference to an unambiguous title, and in this view his own title was also a bounding one. Such being his title, no amount of prescriptive possession would avail him.[5]

LORD M'LAREN.—The question in this case is, whether the defender can maintain his possession against the heritable right of the pursuers.

I assume, in accordance with the fair import of the evidence, that the defender and his author Mr Marshall have had since 1864 all the possession of the land in dispute of which it is susceptible, but mere possession will not suffice to establish a right of property in the defender unless the possession is referable to charters and dispositions followed by sasine.

Where an estate is described in the title-deeds by a general name or in general terms so that its extent and boundaries cannot be ascertained from the title-deeds themselves, then anything that has been possessed under the general name or general descriptive words for the prescriptive period is deemed to be part of the estate, and it is not of much consequence whether we consider the subject possessed as having been acquired by prescription under the Scottish statute, or whether we consider the long possession as connected with a rule or principle of the common law for defining and ascertaining the original extent of the estate. In either view the person in possession has a prescriptive title to the land.

There is also a principle of the law of property, which is correlative and complementary to the principle I have stated, viz., that a proprietor cannot acquire by prescription a subject which is excluded by the terms of his title, because this would not be possession under charter and sasine, but would be possession contrary to the written title. The case of what is termed a bounding charter is an example, but not the only example, of a title which so defines the estate as to exclude the possibility of acquiring land by prescription in excess of the subjects actually conveyed.

In the present case the prescriptive title of the defender begins with the conveyance by Grieve to Marshall. In it the subjects previously conveyed to the North British Railway Company are expressly excepted, and the conveyance to the railway company is referred to by its date, so that the extent of the land conveyed to the railway company is just as clearly defined as if the description had been verbatim inserted in the disposition to Marshall.

Now, when the granter of a conveyance says, "I except from this conveyance so many fractional parts of an acre previously conveyed and delineated in a plan annexed to that conveyance," I think that, so far as relates to the bounding line which separates the areas first and second conveyed, he has just as clearly defined the boundary as if he had defined it by reference to march-stones or natural land-marks. I see no distinction between the cases; the principle is one and the same, that you cannot by long possession acquire a subject which your title-deed in terms excludes or declares to be the property of a conterminous proprietor. It follows, in my opinion, that the Lord Ordinary has rightly held that the defender is not in a position to plead prescription in answer to the pursuers' demand for the restoration of their property.

TEIND COURT.

ON 8th December 1891 the Rev. John Methven Robertson, minister of the parish of St Ninians, in Stirlingshire, presented a petition for authority to feu the glebe of St Ninians, and craved the Court, inter alia, to decern the amount of the expenses incurred by the petitioner in making and constructing roads, passages, drains, and sewers, in and through the glebe or any part thereof a permanent burden on the glebe.*

* The Glebe Lands (Scotland) Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. 71) enacts—

Authority to feu having been granted, the petitioner thereafter lodged a minute in which he set forth an account of the sums which had been expended by him in the construction of roads and other works, including a new gateway and approach to the manse, and craved the Court to inquire into and ascertain the amount of these expenses, and thereafter to decern these a permanent burden on the glebe.

A remit was made to a land-valuator, who, inter alia, reported—"In order to complete his new road the minister has altered the former approach to his manse, and made it a continuation of his new road or street through the feus.

"This new approach is, no doubt, a very great improvement and addition to the amenity of the manse, but it was not absolutely necessary, as the original approach could have remained as it was."

The account of the expenses of constructing the roads, &c., having thereafter been remitted to the Teind Clerk, he lodged a report, in which he disallowed the items relating to the gateway and new approach to the manse as not falling within the expenses sanctioned by the Glebe Lands Act.

The petitioner objected to the report, and argued that the items disallowed were reasonable charges which had been necessitated by the feuing of the glebe. The gateway and approach were really incidental to, and arose from, the making of a road through the glebe, and they were absolutely essential to the convenient occupation of the manse, and greatly improved its amenity.

LORD ADAM.—I think Mr Craigie's objection is not well founded. The first of the claims is that this road having been made for the convenience of the manse, the expense of making it is to form a charge against the future incumbent of the glebe. The claim arises in these circumstances. The glebe having been feued, it became desirable for the amenity of the manse that a new avenue should be made. That may be a matter of great importance for the manse, but it cannot be said that it has been made "with the view of the more advantageous feuing" of the glebe. But the words I have quoted are the words of section 14 of the Glebe Lands Act, which is the only authority that the Court has for allowing the expenses of making roads. Now, the road in question was made, not for the more advantageous feuing of the glebe, but was constructed after the feuing was completed, and solely for the convenience of the manse. The other two sums whose disallowance was objected to follow the fate of the first, for they represent expenses incurred in connection with the formation of this access to the manse. I therefore think that the Teind Clerk's report disallowing the items I have referred to should be approved.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think the only expenses which we are empowered to impose as a permanent burden on the glebe are the expenses required to

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Moncreiff.

DONALD MACKENZIE senior was, at the date of his death, tenant of the Trevelyan Hotel, Leith Street, Edinburgh, under a lease for nineteen years from Whitsunday 1886. The lease bore to be granted to "the said Donald Mackenzie and his heirs, but expressly excluding assignees and subtenants without the consent in writing of" the proprietors.

Mr Mackenzie, to whom Mr William Bain had been appointed curator bonis in January 1892, died on 30th November 1894. He left a disposition and settlement by which he disponed and assigned to his wife in liferent, and certain other persons in fee, his whole estate, including expressly the unexpired portion of the lease of the hotel.

The proprietors did not give their consent to this proposed assignation of the lease, and Mr Mackenzie's son, Donald Mackenzie junior, as heir of his father, took possession of the subjects, and carried on business there.

In June 1895 Mr Bain, as curator bonis to the late Mr Mackenzie, raised this action against Donald Mackenzie junior, concluding for payment, inter alia, of £298, 17s. 2d., being the sum alleged by the pursuer to be due and resting owing to him in connection with his intromissions with the curatory estate.

The facts before narrated were admitted by the parties.

The pursuer averred that the defender took up the lease as heir-at-law of his father, that the goodwill of the hotel was worth £700, and that the defender was to that extent lucratus.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The sum of £298, 17s. 2d. first sued for being due and resting owing to the pursuer, in connection with his intromissions as curator bonis to the late Donald Mackenzie senior, or alternatively the same, so far as undischarged, forming proper charges against the curatory estate, and the defender, as heir of the said Donald Mackenzie senior, being lucratus to the amount thereof, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of one or other alternative of the first conclusion of the summons, with expenses.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The action is irrelevant. (3) The lease referred to not being available to the deceased's creditors, the defender incurred no liability to them by taking up the same.

On 19th December 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff) sustained the third plea in law for the defender, and assoilzied him.*

* "OPINION.— . . . By the terms of the lease in question assignees and subtenants are excluded, the lease passing on the death of the tenant to his heir. The question, which, strangely enough, has not been definitely settled by decision, is, whether the heir of a tenant who takes up a lease in such circumstances incurs passive representation for his predecessor's debts? If passive representation depended solely upon whether the heir was lucratus by taking up the lease, this case would require to be sent to proof on that point, but it seems to me that it is also essential to the doctrine of passive representation that the property or asset which is taken up by the heir is one which the predecessor's creditors could have adjudged or attached had the heir abandoned it. The terms of a lease, including the destination, depend on contract in which the landlord is one of the parties interested, and therefore apart from statutory provisions conferring power to bequeath a lease, which do not apply to urban subjects, the same rules cannot be applied to the transmission of a lease as apply to succession to other kinds of property. Where assignees and subtenants are excluded, the creditors of the tenant have no power to adjudge the lease. If, on the death of the tenant, his heir abandons the lease, the creditors of the tenant cannot compel the landlord to receive them. The lease is in no way available to them should the landlord not consent. It seems to follow that when in such a case the heir of a tenant takes up the lease, he does so, not as representing his predecessor, but more as an heir of provision, or heir of entail, although his position is not precisely analogous.

"It appears from a note in 1 Bell's Commentaries (5th edition), p. 82—(p. 78, note 5, 7th edition)—that the question was raised in the unreported case of Campbell of Melford v. Gallanach, 11th July 1806. Lord Newton, in the Bill-Chamber, decided in favour of the present pursuer's contention, viz., that the heir incurred a passive title by taking up a lease under which assignees and subtenants were excluded. A petition was presented to the Court, but refused on a point of form, 'the Court regretting that the merits of the question could not be tried.' I gather from Mr Bell's observations that he doubts the soundness of Lord Newton's judgment. He says:—'It may be questioned whether the heir, who succeeds to the lease under such a clause, does not take it without incurring any passive title, further than as he can be shewn to have taken up a subject which, as properly belonging to the predecessor, his creditors could attach. The stocking of the farm is indeed the fund of the creditors, so are all arrears due by subtenants; but with regard to future and accruing profits, have the creditors right to them—their debtor's right having expired with his life, like that of an heir of entail?' I find the law stated to the same effect in Bell's Principles, section 1922 (4).

"I also find the same doubt expressed in More's Notes to Stair, 364, in which he says,—'And here, by the way, it may be observed that it has never been decided whether an heir succeeding to such a lease will incur a passive title so as to be liable for his father's debts. The principle upon which liability for such debts may be maintained in the ordinary case does not apply here. The heir takes the subject destined to him by a third

Feb. 25, 1896. Bain v. Mackenzie.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The original rule of common law was that an heir incurred universal liability, but that had been first modified by the introduction of the beneficium inventarii,[1] and his liability was now ascertained by section 12 of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94). Hence the test was whether the heir was lucratus. The defender here took in the character of heir,[2] and he was lucratus, the business being worth at least £700. It might be that he took as heir of provision—as the Lord Ordinary thought—he was none the less liable for his author's debts, so far as he was lucratus by the inheritance. The attachability of the estate by creditors was not the test of passive representation. Benefit to the person succeeding was the essential consideration in the question of liability. The clause excluding assignees was conceived only in the interest of the lessor,[3] and could not be founded on by the heir to party, like an heir of entail, and he does not deprive the creditors of his ancestor of any property which they could attach, or make responsible for the payment of their debts'; and then he mentions the case of Campbell v. Gallanach.

"Professor Rankine on Leases, p. 151 (1st ed.—p. 159, 2d ed.), says,—'It seems the better opinion . . . and to result especially from the fact that the heir to a lease takes as heir of provision (as in entails) and takes nothing of which his predecessor's creditors could make use in the event of his renouncing, that he incurs no passive title by entering, and that these creditors cannot attach the profits of the subject let, so far as accruing subsequently to the death of their debtor.'

"On the other hand, Mr Hunter, in his work on Landlord and Tenant, vol. i. p. 231, expresses an opinion to the opposite effect. He says,—'Although opinions against the heir's liability have been indicated, the view more consonant to principle appears to be in favour of the ordinary rule of representation. The analogy between an exclusive destination in a lease and succession under an entail so far holds good as to cut off the right of the heir of line and to bar alteration by the lessee. But there are no data for so extending the analogy as to alter the effects of representation as known to the common law. In almost every description of lease, agricultural, mineral, or manufacturing, the predecessor must have invested capital, the profits of which are to be reaped during its currency, and accrue to the successor, who thereby becomes lucratus, which is of the essence of representation. The exemption from liability, in the case of feudal property, is the creature of statute, and is repugnant to the common law, which therefore will not give it an analogical or constructive extension.'

"The question undoubtedly is one of difficulty; but I incline to the opinion indicated by Professor Bell, and the other writers to whom I have referred who seem to agree with him, namely, that a lease with such a destination, being a subject which the creditors could not attach, an element is awanting which is essential to the existence of passive representation, and that it is immaterial whether the heir, if he takes up the lease, is lucratus or not.

"As it is solely in respect of the lease that the pursuer maintains that the defender has incurred a passive title, and is therefore liable in the sums in question, I am prepared to assoilzie the defender from this part of the action."

exempt him from a liability which he would otherwise have incurred. The only case in which the present question appeared to have been raised was decided directly in favour of the pursuer's contention.[1]

Argued for the defender;—The defender was not heir in the sense that he had taken any inheritance from his author; all he had taken was from the lessor. Having acquired no estate, therefore, from his father, he was not liable for his father's debts. If he had renounced the lease the creditors would have had no claim under the lease, and the true test of representation was the passing to the heir of some estate which was subject to the diligence of the ancestor's creditors. There was none such here. The debtor's right in the lease expired with his life. He had no power to dispose of it by will to the prejudice of his heir. The case of Gallanach had never been accepted as an authority.[2]

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The question is whether, by taking possession of the subjects as heir of his father, no service or other writ having been needed to give him a title thereto, the defender has rendered himself liable for his father's debts on any of the passive titles known to the law. It is not specified on record which of the passive titles the defender is said to have incurred, but I suppose it is that known as gestio pro hærede.

The question raised in this case appears never to have been decided except by Lord Newton in the case of Campbell v. Gallanach,[1] and that case, as appears from the Lord Ordinary's opinion, has never been regarded as an authoritative decision.

For present purposes we must assume that the defender was lucratus by taking up the lease, but whether that will make him liable or not depends upon the nature of his own and his father's rights under the lease. Now, in this case, the lease was granted to the father and his heirs, excluding assignees and subtenants. It appears to me that under this destination the rights of the father under the lease were temporary, and limited to his own lifetime. He could not of his own motion effectually assign it, or otherwise dispose of it, to the prejudice of his son, as appears, indeed, clearly from the assignation which he attempted to grant in favour of his wife. On the other hand, I think the defender succeeded to the lease, not as representing his father, but in his own right by force of the destination in the lease granted by the proprietors.

In the next place, it is clear that the position of the creditors of his father was in no way affected by the defender's taking up the lease. If he had renounced it, it would have lapsed to the landlord, and the creditors could in no way have affected it for payment of their debts. That being so, it is difficult to see on what principle the fact that the defender took it up should accrue to their advantage. If in order to acquire a right to the lease the defender had required to serve to or represent his father, that might have followed as a legal consequence. But that is not, in my opinion, the position of the matter, as I think the right to the unexpired portion of the lease never was the property of the defender's father, but belonged to the defender in his own right.

[2] 1 Bell's Com. 78; More's Notes to Stair, 364.

Feb. 25, 1896. Bain v. Mackenzie.

Mr Erskine in treating of these passive titles, says (iii. 8, 92),—"The only reason for introducing passive titles was that the creditors might not suffer by the devices of heirs, who wilfully stood off from entering, and therefore if the heir who incurs a passive title be made liable as if he had entered the creditors of the deceased can demand no more." In this case it is clear that the creditors of the deceased have suffered no prejudice at all by the act of defender, and I fail to see why he should be made liable to pay the creditors of his father.

I therefore concur in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD M'LAREN.—This action raises a curious conflict between principle and practice, and if we suppose the case of a long lease extending to ninety-nine or even nine hundred and ninety-nine years (of which examples are known in our practice) granted to a person and his heirs, I am unable to see why in principle any different consequences should be deduced from such a right and the right under a grant in feu to the same person and his heirs. In the latter case no doubt the heir takes his inheritance as heir and represents his ancestor, the representation being limited to the value of the estate which he takes. This principle of the law would appear to me to lead to the recognition of a corresponding liability where the subject is let on lease for a term of years to a party and his heirs. But then, with the exception of a decision by a single Judge, the authority of which has been questioned, there is no authority for extending the principle of representation to an heir taking up a lease; and the fact that in the three centuries during which the decisions of this Court have been reported no decision seems to have been given upon the question, is good evidence that the profession, and the public as represented by the profession, have acquiesced in the view that representation does not apply under leases of ordinary duration and in favour of heirs only. Such constant practice in one direction is just what establishes a rule of common law. On that ground I agree with Lord Adam that this case must be treated as exceptional, and that the heir is to be considered as taking in the character of conditional institute or substitute under the destination, and not by inheritance, and consequently that he is not liable even to the extent of the interest which he takes for his ancestor's debts.

In this decision we only consider the case of a lease in favour of heirs and excluding assignees. It may be that when a lease is of such duration that it amounts in law to an alienation, the exclusion of assignees would be ineffectual, and so the question of representation would not arise in its present form.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have come to the same conclusion. I think that the defender cannot be made liable for his father's debts by reason of his taking up an interest under the lease which did not belong to the father, and which the creditors of the father could not have attached by diligence or reached in any way whatever. The father's right of tenancy determined with his life. He had no power to assign the lease; he had no power to nominate an heir, because it has been decided and cannot now be disputed, that where assignees are excluded and the heir is admitted by the terms of the lease, it must be taken by the heir of line. And therefore there was nothing in the father under this contract of lease at any time except the interest which it gave him during his own life.

It appears to me, therefore, that the heir does not take as representing his father, but takes directly under a contract which contains an offer to him upon the termination of his father's interest if he chose to avail himself of it. The practical ground upon which it would be unjust and unreasonable to subject the son to liability for his father's debts is just that stated by Professor Bell, that he has taken nothing from the creditors which they could possibly have reached but for him, and therefore his taking under a contract which is open to himself, and himself only, and not to the creditors of his father or to anyone deriving right from the act of his father, ought not to subject him to obligations with which he has otherwise no concern.

Taking that view, I should desire to confine my opinion to the case of such a lease as we have to consider here; that is to say, a lease of such duration as to make the exclusion of assignees both reasonable and effectual. I do not know that the same considerations would apply at all to a lease of so long duration as to be equivalent to a right of property, because in such a case the exclusion of assignees might be ineffectual, and, of course, my opinion would not be applicable to cases of feu—which, both in form and in substance, confer rights of property transmissible from one feuar to another—but applies solely to the particular case with which we are here concerned, which is that of a son taking up the remainder of a lease for a short duration by direct contract with the lessor, and not through or as representing his father.

If these views be sound I am unable to assent to the view expressed or sanctioned by the Lord Ordinary when he says that the heir of the lessee is to be considered as an heir of provision, although I am quite aware that that view has the very high authority of Professor Bell. But, then, an heir of provision represents the deceased, and in representing him he has to perform all the onerous obligations which his ancestor has undertaken, just as much as the heir of line, unless the estate is held under the fetters of an entail. He may be liable in a different order; if the debt is moveable he may have relief from the executor, and as heir of provision in a special subject he may have relief against the heir-general. But his representative character and his consequent liability to creditors are undisturbed. He takes the estate as an inheritance, and subject to the onerous obligations of the ancestor to whom he succeeds. That is the import of the judgment in the very important case of Leslie v. Macleod,[1] and I think the distinction between the character of an heir of provision taking property as an inheritance from his father, and that of an heir taking up a lease by virtue of a contract with the lessor, is very well brought out by a comparison of the case I have cited with that of Macalister,[2] in which the respective rights of successive lessees are explained by the late Lord President. The case of Macalister[2] differed from this in this respect, that the lease there was not given to the original lessee and his heirs, but to the original lessee, whom failing, to one particular son; but then the Court had occasion to point out the difference between the legal effect of the ordinary words of destination as used in a conveyance of property and the same words when used in a contract of lease. The case is an authority for holding that when a lease of ordinary duration is taken to one who has no power to assign to executors or to nominate heirs, and on his death, during the currency of the lease, to another, the second lessee is not bound by the obligations of the first, because he does not take by inheritance from his predecessor but by contract with the lessor.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right, although I am not prepared to accept his Lordship's definition of the character in which the heir takes up the lease.

WALTON POWELL, Pursuer (Respondent).—Jameson—Wilton.
HARRY ALFRED LONG, Defender (Reclaimer).—Comrie Thomson—Crabb Watt.

Reparation—Slander—Issue—Counter Issue.—In an action of damages for alleged slander contained in two leaflets issued by the defender, the pursuer averred that the leaflets falsely and calumniously represented him to be a dishonest and disreputable person, but only proposed to put in issue certain specific charges of dishonesty out of various charges which the leaflets contained. The defender pleaded veritas, averred a number of instances, in which he alleged the pursuer to have acted dishonestly, and proposed issues in justification.

Held (1) that the pursuer was entitled to limit his issues to certain of the specific charges of dishonesty contained in the leaflets, although these were only given in illustration of the general attack on his character; and (2) that the counter issues must be limited to these specific charges.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

THIS was an action of damages for slander at the instance of Walton Powell, against Harry Alfred Long, director of missions in Glasgow.

The pursuer averred, inter alia, that he had for some years been occupied in publicly opposing infidel opinions, and had recently come to Glasgow, and that the defender being jealous of his success had formed the malicious design of injuring him by spreading false and calumnious reports about his character. (Cond. 3) "In or about the month of August 1895 the defender caused to be printed and published, and to be widely circulated in Glasgow and elsewhere, a leaflet, of which the following is a copy of the letterpress of the front page thereof:—'Liverpool and Southport to the rescue.—Letter from Mr Thomas Thompson (of Liverpool) to Mr H. A. Long.—Sir,—I feel it my duty as a Christian to let you know something of the character of Walton Powell, who is troubling Glasgow, as he has other places. Of his life before his professed conversion I know nothing save what he or Mrs Powell have told me. Since his conversion he was fined at Bristol for violently assaulting a policeman, which is recorded in the Western Daily Press, October 1892. He left Bristol for Liverpool, residing there till he left for Glasgow. During his Liverpool residence he has been repeatedly before the County Court for non-payment of

The saloon carriage he has shewn off was obtained thus: A Mr Barber of Southport had it for sale. After much negotiation, Mr Powell got it under promise of paying £110, but paid down £25, which he borrowed from a colleague, giving the promise of monthly payment of the balance, of which, however, he has paid nothing; and, as a consequence, the mental health of Mr Barber has been seriously injured. —Thomas Thompson. 132 Boundary Lane, Liverpool.'" (Cond 4) "Further, in or about the month of September 1895, the defender caused to be printed and published and widely distributed in Glasgow and elsewhere, a handbill or advertisement, of which the following is a copy of the letterpress on the front thereof:—'Powellism Exploded! —Glasgow can endure its affliction no longer. The doings of Walton Powell to be shewn up, whether in Bath, Bristol, Manchester, Liverpool, Southport, Sunderland, Belfast, or Glasgow.—Public Meeting in the Blythswood Rooms on Monday 16th, at 8 P.M.—To be addressed by . . . Syllabus.—Mr Powell as a Medico in Ceylon. As a salvationist. His work in Bristol. Migrates to Liverpool, where he is converted, April 1893. Makes for Southport. Here is the story of the saloon carriage and horses two. Lectures at Failsworth: borrows largely, forgets to pay. Leaves Liverpool by louping the dyke and giving creditors the rue. The £100 story clearly told. . . .' The letterpress on the back of this handbill or advertisement is in identical terms with the part of the leaflet set forth in cond. 3." Both leaflets were of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represented, inter alia, that the pursuer was a dishonest and disreputable person. The defender was the author of these calumnies.

The defender denied that the leaflets would bear the construction which the pursuer sought to put upon them, but assuming that they were capable of that construction, he averred that the representations contained in them were true, and that in the towns where he resided before coming to Glasgow the defender habitually incurred pecuniary obligations, which he was either unwilling or unable to discharge, with the intention of evading payment. He gave a number of instances in which he alleged that the defender had acted in this way. Inter alia, the defender stated,—"(2) In the County Court at Liverpool judgment was given against the pursuer, on or about 15th August 1893, for 15s., with 3s. of costs, and on or about 28th September 1893 judgment for 4s. 2d., and 1s. of expenses, was averted by the said sums being paid into Court. Both of these summonses were at the instance of John Fothergill, 4 Dorothy Street, fish-dealer and dairyman." "(8) Mr Pottage, chemist, Picton Road, Liverpool, from 4th March 1893 onwards, gave him credit to a considerable sum, and . . . had to take judgment in the County Court for £1, 0s. 5d."

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) Veritas.

On 20th December 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) approved of the following issues and counter issues for trial of the cause:—

Issues:—

"(1) Whether, in or about the month of August 1895, the defender caused to be printed and published in Glasgow a leaflet in the terms set forth in the first schedule hereto appended; and whether the first portion of the said leaflet, purporting to be a letter from Thomas Thompson to the defender, or part thereof, is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer, while resident in Liverpool, upon several occasions, got work done for him, or produce or goods supplied to him, by tradesmen there, without the intention of paying therefor, and dishonestly withheld payment of the debts justly incurred by him therefor until actions had been raised and judgment entered against him therefor in the County Court; or makes similar false and calumnious representations of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage?

"(2) Whether the said first portion of the said leaflet, or part thereof, is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer had obtained a saloon carriage from Mr Barber of Southport, therein mentioned, upon the false representation that he would pay to the said Mr Barber the full price thereof on delivery, and that he dishonestly failed to pay to the said Mr Barber a balance of £85 due by him in respect thereof after deducting £25 paid by him on account of said price; or makes similar false and calumnious representations of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage?

"(3) Whether, in or about the month of September 1895, the defender caused to be printed and published in Glasgow a handbill or advertisement in the terms set forth in the second schedule hereto appended, and whether the said handbill, or part thereof, is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer borrowed money at Failsworth, which he dishonestly failed to repay, and that in or about August 1895 he absconded from Liverpool with the object of eluding his lawful creditors there, and of defrauding them of their just claims; or makes similar false and calumnious representations of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage?"

Counter issues:—

"(1) Whether the pursuer, in or about 1893, incurred the debts, amounting to £1, 0s. 3d., to John Fothergill, dairyman and fishdealer, Dorothy Street, Liverpool, and of £1, 0s. 5d. to Mr Pottage, chemist, Picton Road, Liverpool, when he knew he could not pay the said debts and without the intention of paying them, and dishonestly withheld or evaded the payment thereof?

"(2) Whether, in or about the month of June 1895, the pursuer obtained possession of the said saloon carriage belonging to the said Mr Barber under false pretences and promises of payment of the price thereof which he knew he could not fulfil; and whether he dishonestly withheld payment thereof?

"(3) Whether, in or about the winter of 1893-4, the pursuer came under an obligation to repay to Mr Butterworth, within three months, being the stipulated time, the sum of £25, which he had borrowed from him and dishonestly failed to fulfil said obligation; and whether, in or about said month of August 1895, the pursuer left Liverpool with the object of eluding his creditors there, and of defrauding them of their just claims?"

The defender reclaimed, and also presented a note wherein he craved the Lord President, in the event of the Court allowing the issues approved by the Lord Ordinary, to move the Court to vary the first counter issue so that it might read as follows:—"Whether the pursuer incurred the debts or obligations specified in the schedule *

* "SCHEDULE.—In or about the year 1882, £20 to Green & Marah, music-sellers, Bath."

(Here followed a number of entries, but none of them, with the exception hereto annexed, and at or about the dates therein mentioned, when he knew he could not pay or fulfil them, and dishonestly withheld or evaded the payment or fulfilment thereof, or of one or more of them, and left Liverpool to elude his creditors, or one or more of them"; or to substitute for these counter issues, approved by the Lord Ordinary, a counter issue in the following terms[1]:—"Whether from the year 1885 to 1895, or thereby, the pursuer has habitually incurred debts or obligations when he knew he could not pay or fulfil them, and dishonestly withheld or evaded the payment or fulfilment thereof, or of one or more of them, and whether in or about the month of August 1895 the pursuer left Liverpool with the object of eluding his creditors?"

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—It may be conceded to the defender that, if this action is brought for the vindication of character, the pursuer's methods are unusual. The import of the first of the two prints complained of was tersely stated by the pursuer himself, in condescendence 6, to be that he is a dishonest and disreputable person; and there is, to say the least, great plausibility in this averment of the meaning of the print. Prima facie the second print complained of has the same drift. Instead, however, of taking a general issue on this footing, the pursuer, by the issues which he asks, limits his complaint to certain specific statements in the two prints, which, to the ordinary reader, might appear to be made rather as illustrations of the general character of a rogue than as separate accusations of fraud.

In my opinion, the pursuer is legally entitled to take the course which he has chosen. First of all, he is entitled to treat the two prints, which were published at different times, as separate libels. Then, I think, he is also entitled to fasten upon one or two specific charges contained in the prints and make them the ground of action, ignoring the general attack on his character, which the specific charges were advanced to support. This course may not commend itself to persons of sensitive honour; but reparation for libel is a remedy not confined to that class. A man whose general character for honesty is indefensible, or is treated (by himself) for the purposes of the action as indefensible, is entitled to redress for accusations of specific acts of dishonesty of which he happens to be innocent, although the measure of damage may be as limited as his own ambition for good fame. In this view, I think that the Lord Ordinary has rightly allowed the first issue. If this be so, the logical result is that the relative counter issue must be correspondingly limited in its scope, and the first counter issue allowed by the Lord Ordinary meets this requirement. The charge which the pursuer resents being a local and specific one,—to wit, that in Liverpool he cheated tradesmen, who took him to the County Court,—it is not to the purpose to say that in ten specified cases he swindled people who either were not swindled in Liverpool, or, although swindled in Liverpool, were not trades-of the two debts mentioned in the first counter issue allowed by the Lord Ordinary, were tradesmen's accounts, incurred in Liverpool for which the pursuer had been sued in the County Court.)

The second issue and counter issue were not in dispute. So far as the third issue and counter issue were discussed, they fall within the same principle as determines the first.

It is unnecessary to add that the decision which I propose does not at all exclude the cross-examination of the pursuer on all or any of the matters which the defender desired to make the subject of counter issues.

Husband and Wife—Donation inter virum et uxorem—Implied revocation—Donation of heritage by husband—Subsequent granting of bond over property by him—Liability of wife for expenses connected with property.—A husband purchased a house, taking the title to himself and his wife, equally between them, and to their respective heirs and assignees. At the date of the purchase the house was burdened with a bond and disposition in security, and this was taken over in part payment of the price, the husband and the wife becoming liable in the personal obligation. Subsequently a second bond in security of a loan to the husband was granted over the property, the husband alone becoming liable in the personal obligation, and both he and his wife granting the disposition in security with joint consent and assent. The husband predeceased the wife, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which he directed his trustees, in the first place, to pay all his just and lawful debts. The house having been sold by the trustees, with consent of the widow, held, in a competition between her and the trustees, that one half of the sum in the bonds and of the expense of discharging the same fell to be deducted from the widow's half of the price, as regarded the first bond, on the ground that the gift to the wife was to be taken cum onere, and as regarded the second bond, on the ground that the husband, by burdening the property with the bond, had by implication revoked the gift to the extent of one-half of that bond.

Held further that the following liabilities in connection with the property incurred but not discharged, in the husband's lifetime, viz. (1) for a law-agent's account, (2) for compositions due to the superior, (3) for the expense of confirming the title, and (4) for taxes, feu-duties, and incidental expenses, were personal debts of the husband, and were not chargeable against the widow's share of the price.

2D DIVISION. IN June 1877 John Johnstone bought the house No. 20 Haddington Place, Edinburgh, for £364, the conveyance being taken "to and in favour of the said John Johnstone and Anne Wright or Johnstone, his spouse, equally between them, and to their respective heirs and assignees, heritably and irredeemably." At the date of the purchase the property was burdened with a bond for £100, and the property was taken over under burden of this bond in part payment of the price, Johnstone and his wife in the conveyance respectively binding themselves, and their respective heirs and assignees, in payment of the sum in the bond, and agreeing that the personal obligation should transmit against themselves and their foresaids, in terms of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, section 47. Johnstone paid the balance of the price in cash.

Subsequently, on 29th July 1891, Johnstone borrowed a further sum of £130 upon a bond and disposition in security of the Haddington Place subjects. The acknowledgment of receipt and the personal obligation in the bond were granted by Johnstone alone, but the disposition was granted by him and his wife, with joint consent and assent.

Johnstone died on 17th October 1894, survived by his wife and by two children, and leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 28th November 1892, by which he directed his trustees, in the first place, to pay all his "just and lawful debts," and in the second place, to convey one-third of the residue of his estate to his widow, and the remaining two-thirds to his two children.

The trustees having, with the consent of the widow, sold the Haddington Place property, the widow claimed one-half of the price without deduction in respect of the bonds, interest thereon, and the expenses of the discharge of the bonds, all of which she maintained fell to be paid by the trustees out of the husband's estate. The trustees maintained that one-half of the amount of the bonds, and of interest and the expenses of discharge, fell to be deducted from the widow's half of the price.

The widow and the trustees also maintained similar contentions with respect to the following liabilities which had been incurred in connection with the Haddington Place property in the testator's lifetime but had not been discharged by him, viz. (1) the amount of a business account incurred by the testator to Millar, Robson, & Company, S.S.C., in connection with an ineffectual attempt to sell the Haddington Place property; (2) compositions upon several past transmissions of that property, the right of relief for which was of no value, and on the transmission to the testator and his wife; (3) the expense of a minute confirming the title, which had been irritated in respect (a) of the omission fully to refer to burdens, &c., in a deed of gift from the Crown in March 1886, and (b) of failure timeously to pay compositions; and (4) taxes, feu-duties, and generally all sums of money payable in respect of the Haddington Place property prior to the testator's death.

In these circumstances, a special case was presented, to which the trustees were the first parties, the widow was the second party, and the two children were the third parties.

The following question of law was stated:—"(a) Are the first parties, in accounting to the second party for her share of the proceeds of the said subjects in Haddington Place, entitled to debit her with one-half of all or any of the following items, viz. (1) the bond for £100, interest, and expenses of discharging the same; (2) the bond for £130, interest, and expenses of discharging the same; (3) the amount of Millar, Robson, & Company's said business account; (4) the compositions, amounting to £52, 10s.; (5) the expense of the minute confirming the title; and (6) the feu-duty, taxes, and incidental expenses connected with the said property, down to the date of truster's death? Or (b) Is the second party entitled to receive payment of one-half of the price of the said subjects, without any or what deductions?"

Argued for the first and third parties;—The gift of one-half of the Haddington Place property to the second party was to be taken as subject, in the first place, to the bond for £100 with which the property was burdened at the date when it was purchased by the husband. The general rule was that a gift was to be taken cum onere, unless it was clear that the donor intended to discharge the burden. There was no evidence of such intention on the husband's part here. He could of course have directed his trustees to discharge the bond out of his general estate, but an ordinary clause of style directing payment of his debts was not to be construed as importing such a direction. Then as regarded the second bond, the gift being a donatio inter virum et uxorem, was revocable by the husband, in whole or in part, expressly or by implication; and the husband, by burdening the property with an additional bond, had by implication revoked the gift to the extent of one-half of the bond, there being no evidence of a contrary intention.[1] The wife was a party to both bonds, and was personally liable under the first. The other items specified in the question, being liabilities incurred in connection with the subject of the gift, were also proper burdens on the gift.

Argued for the second party;—The husband was the real debtor under both bonds, and in his settlement he had directed payment of all his just and lawful debts. Prima facie, therefore, the bonds fell to be paid wholly out of his general estate, and not to any extent out of the widow's share of the price; and there was no evidence to rebut this presumption. Of the two the second bond was the stronger for the widow's contention. Under it she was not personally bound to repay the debt, and merely consented to the disposition in security because of the state of the title. A wife consenting to the burdening of her property for her husband's behoof was entitled to relief out of his estate.[2] Further, while the first bond was open to the argument that the wife must take the gift cum onere, the only argument against her on the second bond was implied partial revocation of the gift. But it was not sufficient to sustain the inference of an intention to revoke that the husband had for his own convenience burdened—it might be temporarily—property which he had given to his wife. To the second bond the clause directing payment of the husband's debts clearly applied. With respect to the remaining items the case for the widow was very strong. These items were in no sense burdens on the property, but were simply personal debts of the husband. In so far as they were concerned, therefore, the inference of partial revocation was out of the question.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question which we have here to determine, as regards the first two items, relates to two bonds, the first for £100, and the second for £130, over a property in Haddington Place which the husband purchased. These bonds the widow maintains should be paid otherwise than by deduction from her half share of these subjects. Now, what came to her was a gift from her husband, and not only was she bound to take that gift subject to the burdens which were on it when she got it, but her husband was quite entitled to take back again what he had given, in whole or in part. I have therefore no doubt that the widow is not entitled to decree as regards the first and second items. As to the other items, I think she is entitled to obtain what she asks for.

LORD YOUNG.—I entirely agree that the widow must take the property which was gifted to her subject to the burdens which were upon it at the date of her husband's death. He was entitled to put any burdens that he pleased on the property during his life. That disposes of the second bond, and the first bond is in a stronger position even than the second. What the husband gave his wife was a gift with the burdens which were on it. I do not think, however, that it was intended that her share should suffer deduction in respect of all expenses connected with the property. I am of opinion, therefore, that she is entitled to receive payment of one-half of the price of the property, less one-half of the two bonds for £100 and £130 respectively.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. About the first bond I think there can be little question. It was a burden on the property when the husband made the donation. As regards the second bond there is perhaps more room for argument, but, I think, no room for doubt. The husband, in the exercise of the power which he unquestionably had over what was virtually his own property, burdened it with a further sum of £130. The wife must take the gift subject to the burdens put upon it by him during his life. With regard to the other items, they were personal debts of the husband, and I do not think they can be made chargeable against the wife.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT answered the question "by declaring that the second party is entitled to her share of the proceeds of the subjects in Haddington Place subject to one-half of the principal sums due under the bonds for £100 and £130, and the expenses of discharging the same: Find and declare accordingly, and decern."

2D DIVISION. Ld. Moncreiff.

Opinion, that the power of a school board to nominate a person to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of a member does not ipso facto cease on the lapse of eight weeks from the date of the resignation.

IN October 1895 the School Board of Cabrach brought an action against John Macdonald, certificated schoolmaster, who had been appointed teacher of Upper Cabrach Public School in 1887. The leading conclusions of the action were for declarator that the defender had been validly dismissed from the office of teacher in that school, and that his tenure of office came to an end not later than 2d October 1895; for decree ordaining him to remove from the school dwelling-house, and for interdict against him interfering with the school and pertinents thereof. There was also a conclusion for reduction (if necessary for giving effect to the foregoing conclusions) of the interlocutor after mentioned pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute of Banffshire on 20th March 1895.

The action arose in the following circumstances, as appearing from the admissions of the parties.*

* The parties referred to the following statutory enactments:—

"The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62) (the principal Act referred to), sec. 13, enacts,—" . . . Should a vacancy occur in any board during the currency of its period of office, such vacancy shall be supplied by the board itself nominating a person to supply such vacancy, and every person so nominated shall go out of office at the same date as the school board."

Section 15, enacts,—"In case the election of any person or persons shall be declared to be invalid, and the full number of members shall not without such person or persons have been validly elected, the school board, if a quorum exist, shall nominate and appoint a person or persons to be a member or members of the school board in room and place of such person or persons whose election has been declared to be invalid . . . and all persons who shall be so nominated and appointed by the school board shall be deemed and taken to be duly elected members of the school board."

The Education (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 78), sec. 15, enacts,—"A member of a school board may resign on giving to the board one month's previous notice in writing of his intention so to do. The vacancy so caused shall, where a quorum remains, be supplied by the school board in the manner provided in section 13 of the principal Act, and if the school board fail for eight weeks to fill up the vacancy, the Scotch Education Department may nominate a person to fill such vacancy, or may issue an order for an election of a person to fill such vacancy at such time and place and in such manner as the said department shall determine."

The Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 18), sec. 3, enacts,—"In order to secure that no certificated teacher appointed by and holding office under a school board in Scotland shall be dismissed from such office without due notice to the teacher, and due deliberation on the part of the school board, the following provisions shall from and after the passing of this Act have effect,—that is to say,

"(1) No resolution of a school board for the dismissal of a certificated teacher shall be valid unless adopted at a meeting called not less than three weeks previously by circular sent to each member intimating that such dismissal is to be considered, and unless notice of the motion for his dismissal shall have been sent to the teacher not less than three weeks previous to the meeting. . . .

"(2) No resolution of a school board for the dismissal of a certificated teacher shall be valid unless agreed to by a majority of the full number of members of the board."

School Board of Cabrach v. Macdonald.

The School Board of Cabrach consisted, in terms of the statutes, of five members, three being a quorum.

By letter dated 30th April 1894 Mr W. M. Skinner, a member of the board, wrote to the board intimating his resignation of office. This resignation was accepted by the board on 9th June.

On 19th July the board appointed the Rev. George G. Macmillan, minister of the parish, to be member in place of Mr Skinner.

This appointment having been intimated to Mr Macmillan, he, on 6th August, sent to the board a letter in which he begged "to state that I shall on no consideration accept office in the Cabrach School Board."

This letter was considered by the board at a meeting on 16th August. The minute of that meeting, relating to the matter, was in these terms:—"The clerk read and laid on the table a letter dated 6th August curt., from Rev. George G. Macmillan, declining to accept the office of member of board conferred upon him at last meeting of the board. The board, in these circumstances, unanimously elected, in the room and place of Mr Skinner resigned, Mr William Beattie junior, Todholes."

Mr Beattie accepted office on 20th August.

On 29th August, one of the original members of the board gave notice that at a meeting of the board, to be held on 27th September, he would move that the defender should be dismissed from his office of teacher at the Upper Cabrach Public School.

Notice of this motion was sent to the four original members of the board, to Mr Beattie, and to the defender, but no notice was sent to the Rev. Mr Macmillan.

On 27th September, at a meeting at which the four original members, together with Mr Beattie, were present, the defender was unanimously dismissed from his office, on a motion made and seconded by original members of the board—the dismissal to take effect three months from the date of the meeting, viz., on 27th December 1894.

Thereafter, the defender having declined to vacate the schoolhouse, the board brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Banff to have him interdicted from entering the school or its pertinents. In this action, the Sheriff-substitute (Grant), by interlocutor, dated 20th March 1895 (being the interlocutor under reduction), refused to grant interdict, holding that when the procedure for the defender's dismissal was initiated the Rev. Mr Macmillan was a member of the board, and consequently that the dismissal was invalid, in respect that no notice of the motion for dismissal was sent to Mr Macmillan in terms of the Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers Act, 1882, sec. 3, subsec. 1.

The board did not appeal against this judgment, but began procedure de novo for the dismissal of the defender, on the assumption that Mr Beattie had not been validly appointed a member of the board. On 12th April 1895, the Rev. Mr Macmillan sent a letter to the board formally resigning office as a member of the board. The board (Mr Beattie being absent) accepted this resignation on 13th May, and on 16th May nominated Mr Beattie a member of the board "to fill the vacancy caused by Mr Macmillan's resignation." Mr Beattie accepted office on the same day.

Thereafter at a meeting held on 6th June, at which the four original members and Mr Beattie were present, one of the original members gave notice that on 29th June he would move that the defender be dismissed from office.

Notice of this motion was sent to each of the four original members, to Mr Beattie, and to the defender; and on 29th June (the four original members and Mr Beattie being present) the member who had given notice of motion moved that three months after 2d July 1895 the services of the defender as teacher would no longer be required. This motion was seconded by another of the original members, and carried unanimously.

On the expiration of the three months—on 2d October—the defender still declined to remove from the schoolhouse, and in consequence the present action was raised.

The pursuers maintained that the defender had been validly dismissed in terms of the resolution of 27th September 1894; and, in any event, that he had been validly dismissed in terms of the resolution of 29th June 1895.

With respect to the resolution of 27th September 1894, the defender maintained that the Rev. Mr Macmillan on being nominated ipso facto became a member of the board; that he could not relieve himself of that office except by resigning; that his letter of 6th August 1894 was an intimation of his intention to resign, but that in terms of section 15 of the Education Act of 1878, his resignation did not take effect until 6th September 1894; that, as he was thus at the time a member of the board, intimation of the notice of dismissal given on 29th August ought, under section 3, subsection 1, of the Teachers Act, 1882, to have been sent to him; and that therefore, as such intimation had not been sent to him, the resolution of 27th September was invalid.

With respect to the resolution of 29th June 1895, the defender maintained that it was invalid, on the ground that at its date Mr Beattie (who took part in the resolution) was not a validly nominated member of the board. The defender contended (1) that Mr Beattie's nomination on 16th August 1894 was invalid, in respect that Mr Macmillan's resignation had not then taken effect; and (2) that Mr Beattie's nomination of 16th May 1895 was invalid under the 15th section of the Education Act, 1878, as having taken place more than eight weeks after the time when Mr Macmillan's resignation took effect, viz., on 6th September 1894. The defender contended that Mr Macmillan's first resignation being effectual, his second was nugatory.

On 15th January 1896, the Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, finds and declares in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons and of the conclusions for removing and interdict, and decerns: Finds it unnecessary to dispose of the reductive conclusions of the summons: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

* "OPINION.—(After setting forth the facts, including the opinion of the Sheriff-substitute in his decision of 20th March 1895)—I do not find it necessary to decide whether the Sheriff was right or not, because I am prepared to hold that the defender was effectually dismissed in 1895, if not in 1894; but I do not wish to be understood as accepting the Sheriff's views. The Sheriff's judgment involves this—that a person who has been nominated without his knowledge or against his will, and who refuses to accept office and never acts, nevertheless becomes and must remain a member of the board unless he resigns in terms of the statute. The question must be tested by considering how matters would have stood if the question had arisen before the passing of the Education Act of 1878, under which, for the first time, members of the school board were empowered to resign office. In the case of a triennial election, a person nominated without his permis-

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The defender in this case maintains that at the date of his first dismissal Mr Macmillan was a member of the School Board, and that notice of the motion for defender's dismissal ought to have been sent to him. Mr Macmillan had been nominated by the School Board, but he had refused to accept office. I see no ground for holding that a person who has been thus nominated is a member if he declines to accept office. The analogy which was attempted to be drawn between this case and the case of an elected member of Parliament is inadmissible, because the position of a member of Parliament is entirely different. He has no right to resign. Although it is common to speak of a member of Parliament resigning, that is not really what takes place. The member cannot resign. He must accept an office under the Crown, the acceptance of which by statute vacates his seat in Parliament. Here we have an entirely different state of sion is given an opportunity of having his name withdrawn, because he is entitled to receive notice of his nomination. But in the case of a nomination by a quorum of the School Board, under section 13 of the Act of 1872, no such opportunity is given under the statute to the person nominated to object; and therefore unless he is to be held bound to act against his will, the only thing he can do is to decline to accept. It would be strange if a person nominated by a school board were in this matter placed in a worse position than a candidate nominated at a triennial election. Indeed it is a novel view to me that membership of a school board is a munus publicum which a citizen cannot decline to accept.

"But I do not pursue this further, because, in my opinion, the defender was well dismissed in 1895. The pursuers, acting on the view which the Sheriff took that Mr Macmillan became a member of the School Board in July 1894, in order to obviate any difficulty, proceeded de novo, obtained from Mr Macmillan a formal notice of resignation of office, and on the expiry of the statutory period of one month, of new appointed Mr Beattie to fill his place. Thereafter, in due form, they again unanimously dismissed the defender. One would have thought that there would have been an end of the matter; but the defender, who had previously * ignored the nomination of Mr Macmillan in order to make out that there was an interval of more than eight weeks between Mr Skinner's resignation and the nomination of Mr Beattie in August 1894, now maintains not only that Mr Macmillan was duly elected, but that he resigned office in August or September 1894; and that as there was an interval of more than eight weeks from the time when his resignation took effect before the Board filled up the vacancy, the right of nomination devolved upon the Scotch Education Department under section 15 of the Education Act of 1878.

"It seems to me that there is a simple ground of decision which renders unnecessary consideration of that defence. The defender is in this dilemma. If Mr Macmillan never became a member of the Board the first dismissal was effectual. If, again, he became a member of the Board he could ex hypothesi only demit office by resigning. This he did not do until April 1895, and if so, it cannot be disputed that the defender's objection to the second dismissal fails. Refusal to accept office and resignation are not the circumstances. I have no doubt that Mr Macmillan could quite competently refuse to accept office. In that view the Board were bound to proceed to get someone else instead of him, and on 16th August 1894 William Beattie was nominated to fill the vacancy. Thereafter, when the proper period of notice had elapsed, which was necessary to enable such a motion to be dealt with, the defender was dismissed. I think this was all perfectly regular.

But it is not necessary to rely solely on this dismissal, as I think there can be no doubt that the defender's second dismissal was entirely free from exception. The defender maintains that Mr Macmillan's letter of refusal to act must be read as a resignation, and that as such it did not take effect till 9th September 1894; that consequently Mr Beattie's nomination on 16th August was inept, there being then no vacancy, and that no nomination by the Board to fill the vacancy was made till 16th May 1895. Accordingly he says that more than eight weeks elapsed before the Board proceeded to supply the vacancy, and that consequently the Board must be held to have lost their right of nomination, which, he submits, after the elapse of eight weeks, passed to the Scotch Education Department. It does not appear to me that the power given to the Scotch Education Department to fill vacancies after the elapse of eight weeks in any way puts an end to the right of school boards to make nominations after the expiry of that period. If the Education Department does not execute the power given to it, I think the School Board can at any time competently exercise the power conferred upon them. But, in any view, I am clear that it is not within the right of a third party to come forward and vindicate the rights of the Department, when the Department is not claiming any rights for itself.

I am therefore of opinion that Beattie was legally nominated in May same thing. This ground of judgment may be technical, but it is scarcely for the defender to object to it on that ground. Holding this view, I shall only say a word or two on the remaining answers to the defence, which do not need to be considered if what I have stated is correct.

"As to the defender's contention that the right of nomination devolved upon the Scotch Education Department, the provision in section 15 of the Act of 1878 was introduced for the purpose of meeting the case of a school board refusing or delaying to fulfil their statutory duties. I doubt whether it applies at all to a case like the present, where the remaining members of the Board did not fail to nominate a new member within eight weeks of a vacancy occurring. The nomination may have been invalid on account of the omission of some statutory requisite, but there was a timeous nomination. I would only further observe that, so far as I know, the Scotch Education Department has not hitherto acted on the view that on the expiry of eight weeks the right of nomination passes entirely from the School Board and devolves upon the Department, even where the Department is satisfied that there has been no wilful failure on the part of the School Board, and raises no objection to the vacancy being filled up by the School Board—(See the case of Skene, reported in Mr Sellar's Manual, 9th edition, p. 309, note).

"Even if the Court were to hold that Mr Beattie was not validly nominated in May 1895, it does not follow that the acts of the School Board while he acted as a member of it would be invalidated by reason of any judgment subsequently pronounced—(See section 44 of 53 & 54 Vict. cap. 55. Further, if Mr Beattie's vote were left out of view, there remained more than a quorum of the board who voted for the dismissal of the defender. . . . ."

1895, and if that be so, then there is no doubt that whatever may have been the case with regard to the first dismissal the defender was duly dismissed on 29th June 1895. I think the reclaiming note should be refused, and the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor affirmed.

Succession—Collation—Intestate Moveable Succession (Scotland) Act, 1855 (18 and 19 Vict. c. 23), sec. 2.—The Intestate Moveable Succession Act, sec. 1, enacts that in cases of intestate moveable succession "where any person who, had he survived the intestate, would have been among his next of kin shall have predeceased such intestate, the lawful child or children of such person so predeceasing shall come in place of such person," and shall have right to the share of the moveable estate to which he would have been entitled had he survived, "provided always that no representation shall be admitted among collaterals after brothers and sisters descendants."

Sec. 2 enacts,—"Where the person predeceasing would have been the heir in heritage of an intestate leaving heritable as well as moveable estate had he survived such intestate, his child, being the heir in heritage of such intestate, shall be entitled to collate the heritage to the effect of claiming the share of the moveable estate which might have been claimed by the predeceaser upon collation if he had survived the intestate."

An intestate, leaving heritable and moveable estate, was survived by an aunt, his sole next of kin, and was predeceased by his uncle, who, had he survived, would have been his heir in heritage and one of his next of kin. Held that the only child of the uncle being heir in heritage of the intestate, was entitled under sec. 2 to call upon the next of kin to collate, although in consequence of the proviso in sec. 1 she would not have been entitled under that section to a share of the moveable estate.

THOMAS ANDERSON, picture-dealer, Glasgow, died on 29th July 1895, unmarried and intestate, leaving estate amounting to £18,750, of which about £17,000 was moveable and £1,750 was heritable.

Anderson's sole next of kin was his aunt, Mrs Jane Anderson or Jamieson, and his heir-at-law was Mrs Annie Anderson or Walker, who was the only child of William Blair Anderson, a predeceasing uncle of the intestate. On 22d August 1895 Mrs Jamieson was confirmed executrix-dative qua next of kin of the intestate.

Mrs Walker having claimed right to collate the heritage with the moveable estate,* a special case was presented by (1) Mrs Jamieson as executrix, (2) Mrs Jamieson as next of kin and her husband as her administrator-at-law and for his own interest, and (3) Mrs Walker as heir-at-law.

The second parties maintained that Mrs Jamieson, as sole next of kin of the deceased was entitled to the whole of the moveable estate left by him, and that the third party had no right or title to any share in the same.

The third party maintained that she, the heir in heritage of the deceased, being the only child of William Blair Anderson, who, had he survived, would have been not only heir in heritage, but also one of the next of kin of the deceased, was entitled to collate the heritage to the effect of claiming one-half of the combined heritable and moveable fund, as her father could have done if he had survived the deceased.

The questions of law were,—"(1) Is Mrs Jamieson, as the sole surviving next of kin of the said Thomas Anderson, entitled to the whole of his moveable estate, to the exclusion of any right of collation by the heir-at-law, Mrs Walker? Or (2) is Mrs Walker entitled to collate the heritage, and to receive one half of the combined moveable and heritable estate, the other half thereof falling to Mrs Jamieson?"

Argued for the second parties;—At common law the third party could not collate, because at common law the heir in heritage was not entitled to collate in moveables, unless he himself was one of the next of kin,[1] which the third party was not. Nor was her right better under the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855. While the language of section 2, taken by itself, was perhaps sufficient to support her claim, that section could only be read along with section 1; the section began "where the person predeceasing," not "a" person predeceasing. Then, in consequence of the provisions of section 1, the third party, being the child of an uncle, would not have been entitled to share in the moveable estate (along with her aunt) as representing a person who would have been among the intestate's next of kin.[2] It followed that she was not entitled to share by right of collation.

Argued for the third party;—Sections 1 and 2 were separate and independent, and the third party fulfilled in every particular the conditions of section 2, and was therefore entitled to collate.[3]

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The question presented to us for decision under this special case does not appear to me to be attended with any difficulty. Indeed, if the view which I take is correct, the question is already decided by the express and unambiguous language of an Act of Parliament. Prior to the passing of the Act 18 and 19 Vict. cap. 23, an heir in heritage had no right of collation unless he was also among the next of kin of the deceased. By the second section of that Act, however, the right to collate was extended. It provided that when the person who would have been heir in heritage of an intestate predeceased the intestate, his child (being the heir in heritage of the intestate) should have the same right to collate which his parent would have had had he survived. That is exactly the case here. It was admitted in the argument addressed to us by Mr Dundas that this must be the result if the second section of the Act I have cited is read as a substantive provision independent of the first section. I think it is the result whether the sections are read separately or together. But I have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the sections are independent of each other. They deal with separate matters, and are intended to effect changes in our law quite distinct from each other. The first clause introduced representation in intestate moveable succession, thus admitting persons who were not next of kin to share in the intestate succession with persons who were. The second introduced the right of an heir in heritage who was not of the next of kin to the benefit of collation. I am therefore

MRS MARY DOLAN, Pursuer (Appellant).—Graham Stewart.
ROBERT BURNET, Defender (Respondent).—Shaw—T. B. Morison.

Reparation—Negligence—Defective condition of shop floor—Liability of tenant of shop for injuries to customers—Latent defect.—In an action of damages against the tenant of a shop by a woman who, after making some purchases, had fallen through the floor of the shop into a cellar, the following facts were proved:—The shop was an old building. The portion of the floor which gave way underneath the pursuer had been patched many years before, the patching having been effected by sawing off the flooring flush with the two adjacent joists, and nailing pieces of wood termed "fillets" along the joists, upon which was supported the new flooring. The flooring probably gave way owing to the nails fixing the fillets to the joists having become insufficient for that purpose. Previous to the accident, the surface of the floor was to all appearance safe. Anyone going below into the cellar might have seen that the portion in question of the floor rested on fillets and not on the joists; but there was evidence to the effect that such a person merely by looking upwards would not have noticed anything wrong. The defender, who was a yearly tenant, and had been in possession for about three years, had never made any inspection of the floor, and had never been in the cellar (which, though within his tenancy, he did not use), and did not suspect that anything was wrong with the floor.

Held (diss. Lord Trayner) that although the defender had no reason to suspect that the floor was insecure, he was in fault in not having it inspected and kept in a safe condition for customers, and that he was liable in damages.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN August 1895, Mrs Mary Dolan, wife of William Dolan, bricklayer, Glasgow, with consent and concurrence of her husband, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, against Robert Burnet, grocer at, and tenant of, the shop 52 Stevenson Street there, for damages on account of injuries sustained by her in consequence of falling through the floor of the defender's shop into a cellar, the floor having given way when she was leaving the shop after making purchases in it.

The pursuer averred,—(Cond. 4) "The said fall and pursuer's injuries were due to the fault of the defender. The said shop is in an old building, and the woodwork of the floor is old and worn. It is defective in respect that the floor, when the accident occurred, was patched in an imperfect manner—the flooring was not nailed on to the joists, but on to a strip of wood which was nailed on to the joist at the place of accident. . . ."

In his statement of facts the defender averred,—(Stat. 5) "The floor of the shop in question was an old floor, but quite sufficient for the purpose required, and never shewed any signs of giving way, or the floor would have been put right."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having sustained loss, injury, and damage through the fault of the defender, is entitled to compensation, with expenses. (2) The defender being tenant and occupant of said shop, warrants to the public that the same is safe.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer not having sustained any loss or damage for which the defender is liable, defender should be assoilzied, with costs. (2) The slight injuries sustained by pursuer having been occasioned through no fault of defender, or through circumstances for which the defender can be held responsible, defender should be assoilzied, with costs. (3) The floor in question having shewn no previous sign of weakness the defender is not responsible for an unexplained accident.

A proof was allowed. The following was the import of the evidence:—The building in question was at least fifty years old. The extent of flooring which gave way underneath the weight of the pursuer (which was about fourteen stone) was about two feet square. This portion of the floor had been patched up by the flooring between the two adjacent joists being sawn off and replaced by new flooring. There was no positive evidence as to when or why this patching was put in. William Lorimer, the landlord's factor, deponed that he "did not know that had been done, for it was before I had anything to do with the property. It must have been done previous to 13½ years ago, for I have been factor for that time." As the old flooring had been sawn off flush with the joists, the new flooring could not have rested on them, and consequently strips of wood termed "fillets" had been nailed along the joists, and the new flooring rested on these fillets. Two joiners, who (on the landlord's instructions) repaired the place after the accident, deponed that the giving way of the floor was probably due to the nails fixing the fillets to the joists becoming defective or losing their hold. The surface of the floor, though worn, was to all appearance safe and sound. The cellar was about five feet high, and was well lighted. Anyone going below into it could at once have seen that the portion in question of the floor rested on fillets and not on the joists, as the ceiling of the cellar was not plastered; but the joiners already mentioned gave it as their opinion that the defender or his servants would not have noticed that anything was wrong with the fillets merely by looking up at the floor from the cellar.

The defender had at the date of the accident been tenant of the shop for over three years—on a yearly tenancy. The cellar was part of the subjects let to him. He deponed,—" . . . If there is anything I see going to be dangerous I send word at once to the [landlord's] factor to get it sorted. I did not examine this floor carefully at different times, it is not the rule in the trade. I did not ask anyone to go over the floor to see if it was safe. I took the premises to be safe, and I never heard of anyone going over a floor before for that purpose. I never looked up from the cellar to see if the floor was safe, because we never used the cellar. . . . Cross.—It is the landlord's duty to keep my floor in order, and he has always done so.* That is the custom of the trade. For any alterations that we are going to make we require to get the landlord's sanction, and anything the landlord has to do he generally does it immediately. I did not see anything wrong with the floor. That part of the floor that gave way is not a place we use greatly [and was, as witness explained in another part of his evidence, back from the counter, and out of the ordinary line used by customers]. We generally put barrels or boxes on it. If there had been any possible weakness, that would have found it out, because there are sometimes good weights on the floor with these barrels and boxes. I have seen as much as 2 hundredweights and 2½ hundredweights there, and I have seen as high a weight as 3 hundredweights, but I never saw any signs of weakness or of the thing giving way."* Witness further, and in answer to the Court, gave this evidence,—"During the three years I have been in the shop two or three repairs were made at the back of the counter, and I think there was a small repair made at the front of it, but not at that part that gave way . . . I must say the building is in a rotten condition. I had no reason to suppose that the floor was in a rotten condition; when it was always kept in repair I thought it safe enough. I did not think the floor was rotten. . . . I did not know the floor was patched. I did not know that the floor was not nailed on to the joists. . . ."

* Lorimer, the landlord's factor, and William Logan, another house-factor in Glasgow, gave evidence to the effect that it was the landlord's duty, according to the custom in Glasgow, to see to the repair of the floor in the case of yearly tenants.

On 18th December 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) pronounced this interlocutor (after findings in fact):—"Finds that it was the duty of the defender to use reasonable care in examining the condition of his shop so as to discover defects and dangers to prevent accidents to his customers, but there is nothing to shew that the defender did not exercise such care and diligence: Finds that the accident happened through the pursuer (who weighs fourteen stone) standing upon a patched portion of the floor which gave way with her, and that patched portion was quite unknown to the defender, and he could not have discovered it by the exercise of ordinary care: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action," &c.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The defender, the tenant, by inviting customers to his shop, impliedly undertook that his premises should be in a safe condition.[1] If it was necessary to shew that he had been guilty of personal fault that was established. The proof shewed that the floor had been patched, and the defender admitted that he had taken no means whatever to make such inspection and examination of the premises as he was bound to do. Now, it was clear that both in Scotland and England the landlord, in such a condition of the premises, would be held to be in fault, and therefore liable. If that were so, it followed that the tenant, whose liability was wider, would also be held liable.[2]

* Samuel M'Ivor, who had been shopman with the defender for over two years, deponed that he had never observed anything wrong with the floor, and corroborated the defender generally as to the use made of the part in question of the floor.

Dolan v. Burnet.

Argued for the defender;—The accident was due to a latent defect in the floor, and no one therefore was liable for the accident. At all events, the defender was not liable, or fault had not been proved against him. It was not clear upon the evidence that the defender could have discovered any patching even if he had gone into the cellar below. The defender, at anyrate, was under no duty of inspection. It was said that the pursuer having been invited by the defender to enter his shop was entitled to rely upon the shop being safe, and thus was entitled to damages from the defender on account of injuries due to its insecurity. But in law the landlord was liable for the sufficiency of the premises, and if he failed to keep the floor in repair, and the tenant did not know and had no reason to suspect that anything was wrong, the landlord might be liable, but not the tenant.[1] The mere fact that the tenant was in occupancy of the premises would not make him liable.[2]

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—On 27th June 1895 Mrs Dolan, wife of a bricklayer, after making some purchases in a grocer's shop kept by Robert Burnet in Stevenson Street, Glasgow, turned to leave the shop by the door by which she entered, when she walked upon a weak part of the floor, which gave way under her weight, with the result that she fell into the cellar beneath and suffered personal injuries.

In this action of damages against the grocer I think the only fact which is distinctly admitted is that the floor did give way under Mrs Dolan's weight, and that she suffered the injuries complained of.

The pursuer says (and this is the ground of her action) that the floor gave way because, owing to age, tear and wear, and its being repaired by patching in an improper manner, it was insufficient for the purpose to which it was put.

The defender, on the other hand, says that although it gave way it was quite sufficient for the purpose of a shop floor. He says, in statement 5, "The floor of the shop in question was an old floor, but quite sufficient for the purpose required, and never shewed any signs of giving way, or the floor would have been put right"; and it would appear from his third plea in law that he maintains that the accident is unexplained.

Now, in point of fact, I am prepared to affirm on the evidence the pursuer's averment as regards the insufficiency of the floor, and to negative that of the defender that it was sufficient. In short, I am prepared to affirm what the pursuer says in the fourth article of her condescendence.

That being so, the question of law only remains whether there was fault or anything in the defender's conduct affording a ground of action against him. I am of opinion that there was.

Now, I confess that I had not, till this case occurred, thought it doubtful that a shopkeeper who opens the door of his shop to the public and invites them to enter as customers for his own gain and profit, is bound to have the floor of his shop in a safe and sufficient condition, and that a floor which will not bear the weight of those entering, but gives way, is not in a safe and sufficient condition. I think it will be admitted that when a shop is first constructed there is a duty to construct the floor so that it shall be safe as a shop floor,—that is to say, that it shall be of sufficient strength to bear the weight of customers invited to come to the shop, and that if it is not, but is nevertheless used as a shop, there is blame in someone.

Then I suppose it is equally clear that a shop floor, however safe it is made at first, will not remain so unless it is attended to.

Then I should say it is also a clear proposition that a person who takes a shop as tenant, or buys it as proprietor, or takes it over as a gift, or gets the use of it from a friend as a favour without paying any rent for it, and who uses it as a shop, is bound to see that it is in a safe condition for the use to which he puts it, and if it is not, he will be responsible to those who suffer, and if when he acquires it in property, or lease, or by gift, or by mere permission, it is in a safe condition, it will be for him to see that it continues so as long as he continues to use it.

Now, I do not think that a person who suffers from its not being attended to and becoming insufficient is interested to inquire whether the man who puts it to use has a contract with another person regarding it or not. If the person who uses it has a contract with the landlord, it will depend upon the contract whether the landlord was bound to him to keep it safe during the tenancy. We have laws on the subject, and one permanent one is that the contract between them is such as they choose to make it—either that the tenant is to take it as it is and see that it is sufficient for his use without any claim against the landlord, and maintain it, or that the landlord is to put it in a safe condition, and the tenant is to keep it so. All that depends upon the contract between them. If the landlord fulfils his contract, the tenant will not have any relief against him. If the landlord fails to fulfil his contract, then the tenant will have relief. But, in my opinion, the persons whom the tenant invites into his shop, and who frequent it, have no occasion to inquire into the contract between the shopkeeper and another person.

Now, the defender here says it was for the landlord to keep the floor in repair. I cannot enter into that. If it was, and the landlord failed in his obligation, he will be liable to relieve him of the consequences. If it was not, then the result is, the shopkeeper has no claim against him for relief; but his duty remains the same to his customers—to see that the shop shall be in a good condition while he uses it as such. Of course nothing I have said is meant to indicate the idea that a shopkeeper guarantees that the floor will not ever give way. He would not be responsible if the floor gave way under an earthquake, or from the effects of a dynamite explosion.

On the whole matter I am prepared to affirm what I stated previously, that the floor was in a rotten condition owing to age and bad patching, and gave way from inattention; that the shopkeeper was bound to see that it was in a safe condition, and was kept so; and that having failed in this he is liable for the accident to the pursuer.

LORD TRAYNER.—This is an action for damages, and before the defender can be found liable, it must be shewn that the damage or injury complained of, and for which compensation is sought, has been occasioned by his fault. This rule is well settled, and needs no citation of authority in its support, but I take leave to quote a single sentence from the opinion of Lord Gifford in the case of Moffat & Company v. Park,[1] as a sound expression of the rule. His Lordship says,—"In all cases of damage for which reparation is sought, I think it may be regarded as the leading principle that the damage or injury must be caused by the culpa or fault of the defender. The pursuer must shew that the defender is to blame."

The pursuer in this case has shewn that she was injured, but has she shewn that she was injured through the fault of the defender—that the defender was to blame? That is the one question raised here. I have considered this case very carefully, but have failed to find any evidence that the defender was in fault.

I admit that the defender, by keeping open shop for the sale of certain commodities, invited the public to enter his shop for their purchase; that the pursuer, in acceptance of that invitation, entered the defender's shop; that while there she fell through the floor of the shop and was injured; and that the shop floor was defective and in an unsafe condition.

It is proved to my satisfaction—I do not think the matter is open to doubt or controversy—that the defender was not aware of the defective condition of the floor. On the contrary, he had reason to believe that the floor was in a safe condition, as he had used it for some three years, in a way which tested its sufficiency for all the purposes of his business, sufficient to bear the weight of any and all customers who had used it, and sufficient to bear the still greater weight of goods placed upon it. At the place where the floor gave way there had been a repair executed, and perhaps badly executed, but of this the defender had no knowledge. It was a repair executed before he entered on the tenancy of the shop. So far, it appears to me, there is no room for imputing any fault or blame to the defender in connection with the defective floor. The only fault alleged against him is that he could have discovered the defect which led to the pursuer's injury if he had gone down to the cellar below and there examined the floor, the floor of the shop being the ceiling of the cellar. I am by no means satisfied on the proof that he could have done so. The proof is certainly not all one way on this subject. I doubt—indeed more than doubt—whether the defender, who is a grocer, was competent to make such an examination, and whether any examination by him would have informed him that the floor of the shop was defective or unsafe. But I am far from thinking that any such examination was a duty incumbent on the defender for the neglect of which he would be liable in damages as for fault. The cellar, although part of the premises let to the defender and occupied by him, was never used by him. It still contained, and only contained, some old boxes and other rubbish which the preceding tenant had left when he vacated the premises years before. The defender had therefore, in ordinary course, no occasion to visit or inspect the cellar.

I demur to any finding to the effect that a tenant of a house or shop, into which he invites others for the purposes of business, is bound in all circumstances to guarantee its safety and stability to all comers. He is bound undoubtedly to make secure anything which he knows to be defective or dangerous, and if he has any reason to doubt or suspect the safety and stability of his premises, to examine, inquire, and so far as may be necessary to repair or strengthen. But when a tenant takes a house or shop, he is entitled, in my judgment, to rely (having no knowledge or reason to suspect the contrary) upon the premises let to him being reasonably sufficient for the purposes for which they are so let. If he is not, then every tenant of a shop will be bound to examine floor, ceiling, walls of the premises proposed to be leased by him, so as to insure that they are as represented, or take the risk of an action of damages if through any cause, short of a damnum fatale, injury or damage may be caused to any customer who takes advantage of his open door. Such a burden has never, so far as I know, been placed upon a tenant before.

The judgment which your Lordships propose to announce appears to me to be contrary to the views expressed by the Court in the case of M'Ewen v. Lowden,[1]—a case in all material respects (so far as any legal principle is involved) not distinguishable from the present.

For the reasons I have stated I must respectfully dissent from the proposed judgment. I am of opinion that no fault has been established against the defender, and that the interlocutor appealed against is well founded and should be affirmed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Young, and in the grounds of his judgment.

The defect in the floor was one which was visible from part of the premises, viz., a cellar. The defender, it is true, did not use the cellar below. But it was let to him, and it is in evidence that if an inspection had been made of the ceiling of the cellar the defect would have been seen.

The view I take is, that when a tenant of a shop invites customers to do business with him in that shop, he must be found liable if anything happens which could have been prevented by his inspecting the premises with a view to thus seeing that they were in safe condition.

It may be that a tenant in such a case will not be the ultimate sufferer for the consequences of the accident to a person visiting the premises. He may have such terms in his contract with his landlord as will enable him to recover from him any damages he may be found liable to pay to the injured party. But with this the injured party is not concerned. His injury is caused to him by the insecure state of premises which the tenant throws open to him. It is a question of fact whether such injury was the result of fault. Such an accident may happen from a latent fault which reasonable inspection could not bring to light. But if the defect was easily observable by a person exercising reasonable care, either directly or by the employment of persons competent to make inspection, then I think that to a member of the public who comes on invitation, the tenant in occupation who so invites him must be primarily liable for injuries resulting from the bad state of repair of the premises.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal and recall the interlocutor appealed against: Find in fact . . . that the said accident was caused owing to the floor being through old age insufficient and not reasonably safe; that the said defective condition of the said floor was due to the fault of the defender: Find in law that the defender is responsible for said accident: Therefore ordain the defender to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £25 sterling," &c.

Property—Superior and Vassal—Building Restrictions—"Villa."—A feu-charter provided that the vassal should not be entitled to erect on the feu "buildings other than villas." He proposed to erect thereon a row of contiguous self-contained houses of two storeys, with separate gardens, before and behind. The superior objected.

Held that the proposed buildings were not "villas."

2D DIVISION. Dean of Guild Court, Edinburgh.

By feu-charter dated 29th January 1870, David Deuchar, of Morningside, disponed to the Corporation of the Royal Edinburgh Asylum for the Insane part of the lands of Morningside under certain conditions, including (2) "that the said Corporation shall not be entitled to erect on any part of the stripe of ground hereby disponed houses or buildings, other than villas or offices, except with the consent of me and my heirs and successors, and said stripe of ground shall not be used for any purpose injurious to the amenity of the adjoining ground."

By disposition dated 1890, Mr Deuchar conveyed the superiority of the ground to the trustees of the Endowment Committee of the Church of Scotland.

By disposition dated 9th January 1895, which imported the conditions of the feu-charter dated 29th January 1870, the Asylum Corporation disponed the ground to James Millar, builder, Edinburgh.

In November 1895, Millar presented a petition to the Dean of Guild Court, Edinburgh, for warrant to erect "six self-contained dwelling-houses" on the south side of Morningside Park, Edinburgh, and on the ground disponed to him.

The plans produced with the petition shewed a row of contiguous houses of two storeys, with gardens in front about 15 feet square, separated by iron railings and with separate gardens behind.

No. 105.

Mar. 4, 1896. Millar v. Trustees for Endowment Committee of Church of Scotland.

The superiors, the trustees of the Endowment Committee of the Church of Scotland opposed the petition, inter alia, on the ground that the houses which it was proposed to erect were not "villas" within the meaning of the feu-charter.

On 2d January 1896 the Dean of Guild sustained this defence and refused the warrant.*

The petitioner appealed, and argued;—Restrictions upon property such as the one in question fell to be construed as favourably as possible to the disponee. The houses proposed fulfilled all the conditions of the modern idea of a "villa." They were houses of an ornamental character, such as were used in the suburbs of a town, each occupied separately as a dwelling-house, and with plots of ground in front. It was not essential that they should each be surrounded on three sides by vacant ground. The undernoted cases[1] shewed that where it was intended that a villa should stand by itself, the feu-contract provided that it should be "self-contained" and "detached."

Argued for the respondents;—The petitioner's contention involved the unwarrantable view that "villas" and "dwelling-houses" were synonymous terms. The cases cited by him did not aid him, for it was clear that in them the word "detached" was inserted into the feu-charters in order to avoid the risk of "semi-detached" houses being erected. The skilled opinion of the Dean of Guild and his council made it clear that the proposed buildings were not "villas" in the present sense of that term.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question in this case is whether what the appellant proposes to do is in accordance with the condition in the title, which requires that no houses or buildings shall be erected on the feu "other than villas or offices," that being one term for a building for residence with suitable offices.

The term "villa" is an expression the meaning of which may change or be modified at different times. It is a term to be interpreted by practical men engaged in the building trade and other trades connected therewith.

* "NOTE.— . . . In order to be able to pronounce an authoritative opinion on this point, whether the proposed buildings were truly 'villas,' the Dean of Guild thought it right to call a special meeting of his Court, which was attended by all the members except two, who are merchants. The members present included, besides the Dean of Guild, who is a civil engineer, an architect, house-agents, licensed valuators, and masters of the trades of builders, joiners, and cabinetmakers. The members of the Court were unanimously of opinion that the term 'villa' still denotes exclusively a self-contained house of individual and separate character, standing within its own grounds; further, that if any modification of the term were intended, it would require to be expressed, as by the use of the term 'semi-detached villa'; and that at the present day the semi-detached villa represented the furthest extent to which the qualification of the original meaning of the term villa had been recognised by the building trade.

"The Dean of Guild and his Court are unanimously of opinion that the houses proposed by the petitioner would form a row or short street of self-contained houses. . . . "

Millar v. Trustees for Endowment Committee of Church of Scotland.

Here we have the decided opinion of the Dean of Guild, who is a civil engineer, and other members of his Court—builders and other men of business, skilled and experienced in these matters, and having no interest in the case—that the houses in question being built up against one another and joined together are not "villas," as the term is at present understood. I think we must accept the opinion of these gentlemen on these subjects, and affirm the judgment of the Dean of Guild Court.

LORD TRAYNER.—The petitioner is by his title restricted from erecting on his land anything but "villas or offices," which I take to mean villas for residences with suitable accommodation offices.

The question here is, whether the buildings proposed to be erected are of this character. From the discussion before us it appears that the term "villa" has a somewhat technical meaning, and we are thus under the necessity of resorting to the opinions of experts to ascertain what the technical language of the petitioner's title imports. The Dean of Guild and his council (whom he has consulted) are all experts in this matter, and are just the class of men whose opinion or evidence in such a matter would be taken. As they are unanimous in thinking that the proposed buildings are not villas, I think the only course open to us is to affirm the judgment appealed against, and dismiss this appeal.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

THE REV. WILLIAM M. METCALFE AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers). —Sol.-Gen. Murray—Dickson—Pitman.

Jurisdiction—Privy Council—Ordinance of University Commissioners—University (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. c. 55), sec. 16—Agreement under this section.—An action was brought for reduction (1) of an agreement bearing to be on behalf of the University Court of St Andrews University and on behalf of the Council of University College, Dundee, consenting to the affiliation of the said College to the University of St Andrews, and relative documents; and (2) of an order by the University Commissioners proceeding on the agreement affiliating the College with said University. The Second Division assoilzied the defenders.

In an appeal the House of Lords pronounced a judgment finding that the pursuers were entitled to reduction of the order, on the ground that it was an ordinance in the sense of the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, and that it had not been laid before both Houses of Parliament, and thereafter submitted for the approval of Her Majesty in Council in terms of the statute, and remitting to the Second Division to pronounce decree to that effect, and "to dispose of the conclusions of the summons with respect to" the other documents sought to be reduced.

At the date when the Second Division were called on to dispose of these conclusions a second ordinance had been issued by the University Commissioners to the same effect as the former, and proceeding on the same agreement; but with regard to this ordinance the statutory procedure had been followed, and the ordinance was before the Privy Council for approval.

The Court dismissed the remaining conclusions for reduction on the ground that the validity and effect of the documents sought to be reduced were questions within the jurisdiction of the Privy Council in dealing with the second ordinance.

2D DIVISION.
Ld Stormonth-Darling.

(ANTE, Dec. 21, 1894, vol. xxii. p. 210, and May 7, 1895, vol. xxii. (H. L.) p. 14.)

On 8th April 1895 the House of Lords pronounced a judgment declaring that the pursuers and appellants were entitled to a decree reducing and setting aside the orders of the Scottish Universities Commissioners of the 21st of March and the 10th of April 1890, and remitted the cause to the Second Division of the Court of Session with directions "to pronounce decree to that effect, and to dispose of the conclusions of the summons with respect to the documents first, second, and third called for and sought to be reduced." These documents were (1) a minute of the University Court of the University of St Andrews dated 15th February 1890, bearing to consent to the union of University College, Dundee, and the University of St Andrews; (2) the agreement between the University of St Andrews and the University College, Dundee, dated 15th February 1890, on which the order of the Commissioners was based; and (3) a docquet appended to a copy of a letter of the clerk of the Commissioners dated 4th March 1890, bearing to be a consent by the University Court of the University of St Andrews to the alteration made by the Commissioners on the terms of the agreement.

On 4th June 1895 the Court applied the judgment of the House of Lords and reduced the affiliation order of the Commissioners dated 21st March 1890, and the order constituting the new University Court of the University of St Andrews dated 10th April 1890, and continued the cause quoad the first three documents called for. The parties were subsequently heard upon them.

The grounds of reduction were, inter alia;—1. That the agreement was ultra vires, in respect (1) that the agreement provided that the union should be dissoluble by Act of Parliament only, and that this was at variance with section 15, subsection 3, of the Act of 1889; (2) that the 6th article of the agreement made the principal and professors of the Dundee College professors of the University of St Andrews and members of the Senatus Academicus, and that this was contrary to the Universities Act of 1858, 21 and 22 Vict. cap. 83, sec. 5. 2. That the docquet was invalid, as it had not been considered by the University Court, but had only been signed by individual members thereof.

It was stated at the hearing that after the ordinance had been challenged the Commissioners had issued another ordinance,* in regard

* The ordinance, dated 3d February 1894, bore,—"And whereas, by an order issued by the said Commissioners on the 21st day of March 1890, by virtue of the powers conferred by section 16 of the first mentioned Act, the University College of Dundee was affiliated to, and made to form part of, the said University of St Andrews, with the consent of the University Court, and also of the Council of the said College, and upon the conditions set forth in an agreement between the said bodies scheduled to the said order. Therefore the Commissioners under the first mentioned Act statut-to which the statutory procedure had been observed, and which, at the date of the present hearing, had been laid before the Privy Council for approval, in terms of section 20 of the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889.

Argued for the pursuers;—The agreement must stand or fall as a whole. To erase the clause as to the permanence of the union would be to strike out an important condition of the agreement, and would result in making an agreement for the parties different from their original intention. The only course was to set aside the agreement. Under the remit from the House of Lords the pursuers were entitled to have the question as to the validity of the agreement disposed of before the new ordinance was considered by the Privy Council. The Universities Committee of the Privy Council were not a judicial body; some of the members were laymen.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The first point was whether the questions argued were before the Court at all. The Court was not competent, and the Privy Council was the proper judicatory for their consideration. But (2) the agreement was not inconsistent with the statute. If it was it might be amended. It had been acted upon, and could not be resiled from, even although an erroneous term of duration had been agreed to. But the main point was that the new ordinance of the Commissioners proceeded upon these documents, and the Privy Council must consider them in dealing with the ordinance. The action, quoad the documents, should therefore be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—When this case was formerly before us, the question was whether an order pronounced by the Universities Commission professedly under section 16 of the Universities Act should be reduced, because it was an order not issued after the procedure prescribed in the Act, as applicable to ordinances to be pronounced by the Commission. The Commission had proceeded on the footing that they had special powers in regard to the matter they dealt with, which made the other parts of the Act in regard to ordinances inoperative. That view was held to be unsound in the House of Lords, and accordingly that order has been reduced. The question now before the Court is whether the pursuers are further entitled to reduction of certain documents, viz., a minute of agreement between the University of St Andrews and University College, Dundee, as the basis of arrangement for affiliation of the latter to the former, and a relative minute and docquet of the University Court of St Andrews.

The position of matters is this, that the Universities Commission have now to proceed by ordinance in the manner prescribed by the statute in dealing with the affiliation of these two educational bodies. The statute in its clauses regarding such procedure provides the most ample means for securing that no arrangement shall be sanctioned without the fullest consideration by responsible authorities, and that the consent of Parliament shall and ordain with reference to the University of St Andrews as follows:—1. Without prejudice to, but in corroboration of, the order made by the said Commissioners on the 21st day of March 1890, the University College of Dundee is hereby affiliated to, and made to form part of, the University of St Andrews, subject to the conditions set forth in the agreement scheduled to the said order, and which order and agreement are set forth in schedule I., hereunto annexed."

also be necessary. Ordinances before being passed must be sent in draft to the University and College authorities affected, and must be published by the Commissioners, and they must hear all objections to the terms proposed by those directly interested, or any public body or persons directly affected, and three months are to be allowed for such procedure (section 19). When an ordinance is issued it must be published in the Gazette, and laid before both Houses of Parliament, and submitted for the approval of Her Majesty the Queen in Council, and either House may present an address praying that consent be withheld from the ordinance in whole or in part. Further, the University Court, Senatus Academicus, or the General Council, or any governing body, or any trustee or patrons of any foundation, mortification, bursary, or endowment, or any other person directly affected, may petition Her Majesty to the same effect, and Her Majesty may remit the matter to the Universities Committee of the Privy Council, who must report specially to Her Majesty in Council. Her Majesty may then by Order in Council approve in whole or in part, or disapprove in whole or in part.

It appears to me that the Legislature has thus provided the machinery for dealing with ordinances issued by the Commission, and that it is for the authorities nominated in the statute to deal with any case which may be brought before them. The documents which we are asked to deal with depend necessarily for the operative effect of anything contained in them—whether the whole or a part—upon their receiving the imprimatur of the authorities provided by the statute for dealing with them. I am therefore of opinion that they are not documents with which this Court should deal as the pursuers propose, by considering the question of subjecting them to reduction. It is for the Queen in Council to deal with questions relating to them.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur. The only difficulty which occurred to me was the direction in the judgment of the House of Lords. Their judgment bears,—"It is further ordered that the cause be, and the same is hereby remitted back to the Second Division of the Court of Session with directions to pronounce decree to that effect." We have done that. But it goes on "and to dispose of the conclusions of the summons with respect to the documents first, second, and third called for and sought to be reduced." I read upon consideration that word "dispose" as meaning merely to deal with—to deal with these conclusions—and we deal with them, and in that sense dispose of them as your Lordship has proposed, in which proposal I concur.

LORD TRAYNER.—This action was instituted primarily for the purpose of having reduced and set aside an ordinance issued by the University Commissioners by which they affiliated University College, Dundee, to the University of St Andrews, and declared that College to be part of the University. Other writs, which I shall notice immediately, were also sought to be reduced, and certain declarators were sought as following upon or in connection with the reductive conclusions. By a judgment of the House of Lords, reversing a judgment of this Court, the ordinance issued by the University Commissioners has been reduced, along with a declaration or order by the Commissioners, dated 10th April 1890, being two of the writs reduction of which was concluded for. The case has come back to us under remit from the House of Lords to dispose of the conclusions of the summons "with respect to the documents first, second, and third called for and sought to be reduced," and under that remit we have heard the parties on the matters remitted. The documents referred to in the remit are (1) minute of the University Court of St Andrews bearing to consent to the College being affiliated to and made to form part of the University; (2) an agreement between the University Court and the Council of the College setting forth the terms and conditions of the affiliation and union; and (3) a minute consenting to certain alterations in the agreement. A decree reducing these writs is still sought by the pursuers.

No. 105.

Metcalfe v. University of St Andrews.

The ordinance of the Commissioners which has been reduced was set aside by the House of Lords (to state it generally) in respect it was ultra vires of the Commissioners, they having failed to observe certain procedure prescribed by statute and necessary to give their ordinance validity. After that ordinance had been challenged, and before any judgment on the merits had been pronounced in this action, the Commissioners issued another ordinance, in regard to which, so far as we know, the prescribed statutory proceedings were observed. The last ordinance is now before the Privy Council for approval or disapproval under the second subsection of the 20th section of the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889. It appears to me that the effect of that section is to reserve to Her Majesty in Council the right to approve or disapprove in whole or in part of any such ordinance, and of the conditions on which such approval, if given, should proceed. The three writs I have above mentioned as being still unreduced are challenged on the ground that they were ultra vires of the parties to them. They all related to the same subject-matter,—that is, they all have reference to the terms and conditions on which the representatives of the University and the College respectively consented, or are said to have consented, to the affiliation in question; and on a consideration of which, inter alia, the Commissioners proceeded in issuing the ordinance now before the Privy Council. Any reduction of them appears to me to be unnecessary, because if they are lawful and proper agreements and conditions, they will be given effect to, if not, they will be disregarded by the Privy Council. In a word, their legality and effect will be considered as bearing directly on the question whether the ordinance is to be approved of or disapproved, and if approved, on what conditions. Not only do I think reduction of these writs unnecessary, but I venture to think that in the circumstances any judgment of this Court in regard to them would be encroaching on a jurisdiction expressly reserved for another tribunal.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark was absent.

The Court dismissed the action quoad the first three documents sought to be reduced, and found no expenses due to or by either party.

Opinion (per Lord Young) contra.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN July 1895 William Morrison, baker, Crookston Street, Glasgow, as tutor and administrator-in-law for his pupil son Hector Morrison, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Glasgow against Alexander M'Ara, lime and cement-merchant, Glasgow, for £500 as damages, on account of injuries sustained by Hector Morrison through coming in contact with a wheel of a lorry belonging to the defender.

The general nature of the circumstances out of which the action arose appear from the following findings in fact in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, which were affirmed by the Court on appeal:—"Finds that on the 21st of March 1895 the defender's lorry, loaded with bags of lime and driven by his servant Hugh Connell, was standing in Crookston Street, S.S., Glasgow, opposite the public-house of Craig: Finds that Connell, the carter, on the invitation of an acquaintance, went into the public-house to get a dram, and was absent for a few minutes: Finds that the horse's head could be seen from the counter of the public-house: Finds that the pursuer's son Hector Morrison, then less than six years of age, was playing with two companions in the street; that he threw the cap of one of these, named Black, under the lorry while the carter was absent; that Black went under the lorry, got his cap and returned, and then threw Hector Morrison's cap under the lorry; that Morrison went between the wheels on the off-side of the lorry to get his cap, and was under the lorry when Connell returned and got on the lorry from the near side (which was next the public-house) and drove away: Finds that when the lorry moved away the boy attempted to get out between the wheels, as he had got in, and was seriously injured."

The pursuer averred that the accident was caused through the fault and negligence of the defender's servant Connell in leaving his horse and lorry in the street unattended,* or in negligently driving off without looking to see that all was right.

* The Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. cclxxiii.), sec. 149, subsection 16, enacted,—"Every . . . person who suffers any waggon,

No. 106.

The defender denied that his carter had been guilty of any negligence, and further pleaded contributory negligence.

A proof was allowed. The details of the evidence sufficiently appear from the notes of the Sheriffs, and the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young.

On 13th November 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced an interlocutor, in which, after the findings in fact narrated above, he found "that Connell was in fault in driving away without looking whether the wheels of the lorry were clear, and that the injury was due to his negligence; therefore finds the defender liable in damages: Assesses the damages at the sum of £150, and decerns against the defender therefor," &c.*

cart, or carriage . . . to stand longer than is necessary for loading or unloading goods . . ." shall be liable to a penalty.

* "NOTE.—I do not accept the view put forward by the pursuer that the defender is liable because his carter contravened a section of the Glasgow Police Act by leaving his horse unattended while he visited a public-house. There are many necessary, or usual and venial occasions for which a carter may or must leave his horse, and having regard to all the circumstances I could not find damages due merely because the man by doing so gave occasion to boys to indulge in larks about the lorry. Had the horse run off during his absence, perhaps the question might be different. However we look at the facts of the case, and whatever effect we give to the statute referred to, the man Connell's absence was not the proximate cause of the accident.

"Contrary to the impression which I had formed during the leading of the proof, and before I had directed my attention to the structure of the lorries one sees in the street—especially to the height of the body above the ground—I am now satisfied that the carter's failure to use his eyes, so as to make sure that his lorry was clear of all obstruction and all danger to the lieges before he jumped on it and drove off, was the immediate cause of the injury to the boy. No one can look attentively at an ordinary lorry without being aware that, if Connell while crossing the footway from the public-house door had looked at all at his vehicle, he must have seen that the child was underneath it. That this was the state of things seems to be clearly proved by the evidence of the boys who were playing with the injured child; and that it was the carter's business so to look about is admitted by Connell himself.

"There is no doubt that the boy was in fault himself in going under the lorry, and some reference has been made to the cases in which the contributory negligence of children has been considered. I do not go into this question, because assuming the boy to be capable of negligence, and in a certain measure guilty of it, I am of opinion that the facts do not support what is called the plea of 'contributory' fault. It seems clear, on the evidence, that the proximate cause of the accident, looking at the critical moment and final stage of the occurrence, was the carter's failure to look whether he could safely drive on. The boy was foolishly and recklessly below the lorry, yet (to adopt the language of Lord Penzance in Radley v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 1 App. Ca. 759), the carter could in the result, by using ordinary care and diligence, have avoided the mischief which happened, and therefore the pursuer's negligence will not excuse him.

"One observation remains to be made. It may be argued that even on this view the boy was in fault in trying to escape from his position by going between the wheels. It rather seems that the boy's instinctive effort to escape when he found the lorry in motion is not to be regarded as a fault causing the accident. It was a blunder made by a child in an emergency, in a moment of excitement and danger, such as is not to be regarded as

On appeal the Sheriff (Berry) adhered.*

M'Ara appealed, and argued;—(1) Connell's contravention of section 16 of the Glasgow Police Act was not sufficient to render the defender liable.[1] It was not the proximate cause of the accident. (2) The child's recklessness was the cause of the accident.[2] (3) The damages were extravagant.

Argued for the pursuer;—The accident, though directly due to Connell's want of examination of the lorry before he started off, was nevertheless partly due to his stopping to have a drink in the public-house, and leaving his horse unattended to while he was there.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts of this case, shortly stated, are these. Connell, the defender's carter, left his cart and went into a public-house to get a drink. A school was coming out at the time, and the children were playing on the footpath and street. One of the boys threw the pursuer's child's cap under the lorry, and the child went underneath to get it out. While he was there Connell came out of the public-house and drove off. The child tried to creep out between the wheels, and while doing so was caught by them and injured.

I quite agree with the Sheriffs that the proximate cause of the accident was not Connell's going into the public-house. A public-house was no culpa—(See some illustrations and dicta cited in Guthrie Smith on Reparation, pages 24 and 99). When one considers how low the axle-bar between the hind wheels of the lorry is, and that even a child to avoid it would have to be flat on the ground, while there is a wide space between the wheels at the side, it is not surprising that in his excitement the child should have taken the wrong way of escape."

* "NOTE.—The witnesses are not altogether at one as to the way in which the accident to the boy Morrison occurred, but the explanation on which the Sheriff-substitute has proceeded seems to me that to which the proof points as the most probable, namely, that the boys had been larking about the lorry while Connell, the carter, was in the public-house, and that Morrison's cap being the last that had been thrown in, he was under the lorry at the time when the carter came out and started it again. If Connell's evidence were to be accepted, the inference would be that Morrison was not under the lorry at the time when he started it, but went under it afterwards while it was going, or after Connell had taken his seat. That seems to me an improbable story, and the substantially concurring account given by the three boys as to what was going on, and as to Morrison sitting under the lorry at the time it started, is to be preferred. Taking that to be the true state of matters, I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute has correctly applied the law to the facts. Whether there was any transgression of the Police Act by Connell in going into the public-house and leaving his horse and lorry standing at the door, need not be considered. His doing so was in no respect the immediate cause of the accident. The real cause was his starting his horse again without giving a sufficient look to see that nobody was about or under his lorry, so as to make it safe for him to go on. He says, no doubt, that he did look under it, but I am afraid that his statement on that point cannot be accepted as in accordance with the fact. At all events, the look he may have given had not been sufficient. . . ."

doubt a place in which he had no business to be at that time, but the only weight I attach to that is that being where he had no right to be he may have come out quickly and driven off hastily to escape observation, without much thought as to any person being about his lorry.

The evidence he gives us is that he did look under the cart before driving off. This is the natural and proper course for a person in charge of a vehicle to take before driving off when he finds a school coming out and a number of children about. Connell himself says it is the usual course, and says he did it. But I am satisfied that if he had done what he thinks he did, he could not have failed to see the child.

In that state of matters we have to consider whether there is any ground for interfering with the judgment of the Sheriffs. After giving the best consideration I can to the matter, I think there are no such grounds, and am of opinion that we should affirm the judgments appealed against.

On the question of damages, I think these are too high. No doubt one leg is a little shorter than the other, but looking to the child's age, and the walks of life which he has to follow, I do not think his prospects are materially injured by reason of the accident; but I cannot say that they are so high that we ought to interfere.

LORD YOUNG.—I also see no ground for interfering with the judgment of the Sheriffs.

I have, as I shall presently explain, my own views, which do not concur with those of the Sheriff as to the effect of the conduct of the carter in stopping his lorry at the public-house in order that he might have a drink, which was admittedly an improper proceeding on his part.

But the facts of the case otherwise, and including that, must be attended to.

Hugh Connell, the carter, says that he went on the invitation of an old friend to a public-house to have a glass of whisky, leaving his lorry unattended to at the door while he was absent. He excuses himself by saying he was always in such a position that he could see the lorry standing on the street, and could run out if he saw it moving on, and that he did not take a minute to drink his whisky, and then jumped on the lorry and drove off.

But it is quite certain that during his absence in the public-house—it could not be more than a few minutes—the child got into a position of danger. If he had not stopped his lorry at the public-house door I think the accident would not have happened.

There were a number of children playing on the street, and amongst them the injured child, and two other little boys, Black and Muirhead. It appears that Morrison threw Black's cap under the lorry, and Black got it out, and then proceeded to retaliate on Morrison, throwing Morrison's cap under the lorry, and then Morrison ran after his cap to get it from under the lorry. Black says,—"I threw Morrison's bonnet in below the lorry. He threw in mine first, and when I came out I threw his in, and he went in for his," and then Muirhead says,—"The wheel would only be about an inch from the pavement. Hector Morrison took Black's bonnet off and threw it under the lorry, and Black went in for it, and came out again, and then Black took off Morrison's bonnet and threw it under the lorry, and the carter came out and jumped on the lorry, and made the horse go. Morrison was trying to run out, and the wheel knocked him down and ran over him. . . . The boy Morrison was not long under the lorry. He lifted his bonnet and put it on his head, and sat under for a wee while." Then a witness, Mrs Findlay, depones,—"He would be about two minutes under the lorry." You cannot take measurements of time from the witnesses, but it appears that one of the boys called to Morrison to come out from the lorry, and he replied he would not come for him or for anyone else.

Now, I say here that these things would take some little time, and could not have happened at all if the carter had done his duty, and had been attending to his horse when it was standing on the street,—indeed, one may confidently affirm that there would have been a good prospect of this accident not happening at all.

I think the section of the Glasgow Police Act which this carter transgressed was enacted for the very purpose of keeping the street safer than it would have been had the lorries been allowed to stand without attention. He distinctly transgressed the section, no doubt for a short time, but it would have been the same in the result had he done so for an hour. There is, of course, greater risk of an accident during a long than during a short period, but the risk is there during the period, and it was caused by him. That is the meaning of the expression versans in illicito. An accident which happens when a man is not versans in illicito,—when he is not doing anything illegal although damage ensues,—is in a different position as regards his responsibility, or that of those who are responsible for him, from an accident which happens when he is doing something illegal,—when he is versans in illicito.

He was versans in illicito in stopping his horse when he had no occasion to do so. It was on account of the fault involved in that that the child got into a position of danger which it could not have got into if he had done his duty.

But I also think that there is no ground for arriving at another conclusion on the view of the Sheriff-substitute, that if he had used that care in coming out of the public-house which he himself says he did use, he would have seen what all the children say they saw. He could from the position of the lorry have seen this from inside the public-house. It is plain he just came out and jumped on to the lorry and drove off. Now, I cannot say that that was legitimate conduct on the part of a man who was versans in illicito by being in the public-house at all, and therefore, so far as my own opinion is concerned, I can see no ground for saying that the Sheriff came to an erroneous conclusion.

On the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that there was fault here. As regards the damages I am not of opinion that £150 is too large a sum to award where a child has his leg so smashed that there is a probability of his having one leg shorter than the other for the rest of his life.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the Sheriffs were right in disregarding in this case the alleged infraction by the defender's servant of the Glasgow Police Act, they being both of opinion—an opinion in which I concur—that such infraction was not the proximate cause of the injury for which damages are sought. My agreement with the Sheriffs ends there, for I am of opinion that no fault has been established against the defender's servant for which the defender could be made liable. It appears clear to me on the evidence that the injured boy was to blame, and following the judgment in the case of Fraser[1] (and there are others to a like effect) I am for recalling the interlocutors appealed against, and granting absolvitor.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Dismiss the appeal: Find in fact and in law in terms of the findings in fact and in law in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 13th November 1895; therefore of new find the defender liable in damages, and assess the damage at the sum of £150."

THE ASSETS COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Balfour—Salvesen.
LAMB & GIBSON, Defenders (Respondents).—Lees—D. Dundas.

Property—Restrictions on building—Superior and Vassal—Feu-disposition—Plan annexed to disposition.—A proprietor who had prepared a general feuing-plan of his estate sold part of it and bound himself in the disposition granted by him "to adhere to the general feuing-plan of our said lands, and to erect on the lands houses of the character and style indicated thereupon . . . a reduced copy whereof is hereto annexed, and signed as relative hereto, and to give effect to this condition in all feu-contracts, dispositions, and other conveyances of the plots of ground shewn on the said feuing-plan, and which declaration is also hereby declared to be a real lien and burden upon our said lands."

The plan was merely a ground-plan shewing the building line of the streets. On the line of the building were written the words "for self-contained lodgings and corner tenements."

In an action by the disponer against the disponees for declarator that the restriction was not binding, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) held that the clause was to be construed as meaning that if the disponer erected buildings on his lands they should be of the style and character indicated on the plan, and that the restriction was binding on the disponer.

On a reclaiming note held (reversing the judgment) that the clause imported no more than it expressed, viz., an obligation on the disponer to build houses of a certain description, and that, as it was not contended that anyone could compel the disponer to build, the clause had no effect.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

THIS was an action by the Assets Company, Limited, the singular successors of the City of Glasgow Bank, for ascertainment of the building restrictions applicable to the lands of North Woodside, Glasgow, of which the pursuers were proprietors. The pursuers concluded for declarator that they were duly vest and seised in, and were in right of fee of certain pieces of ground, and were "entitled to erect on the said subjects tenements of dwelling-houses or tenements of dwelling-houses and shops or such other buildings as they think fit, provided that such tenements or buildings are not inferior in character and design to the houses already built upon the said subjects."

Mar. 6, 1896. Assets Co., Limited, v. Lamb & Gibson.

Separate defences were lodged for three sets of feuars. It is only necessary to refer to those lodged for Lamb & Gibson and Robert and James Anderson, singular successors of Baird & Brown.

The facts were these:—

On 30th June 1871 the City of Glasgow Bank disponed to Messrs Baird & Brown, timber-merchants, Glasgow, a portion of the lands of North Woodside, under, inter alia, the following declaration:—"And further declaring that we and our foresaids shall be bound, as we hereby bind and oblige ourselves and our foresaids, to adhere to the general feuing-plan of our said lands, and to erect on the said lands houses of the character and style indicated thereupon, a copy whereof was signed as relative to the foresaid agreement between us and our said disponees, a reduced copy whereof is hereto annexed and signed as relative hereto, and to give effect to this condition in all feu-contracts, dispositions, and other conveyances of the plots of ground shewn on the said feuing-plan, and which declaration is also hereby declared to be a real lien and burden upon our said lands."

The plan annexed to the disposition was only a ground-plan. It did not indicate the character or style of the buildings by any elevation or sketch. It shewed only the line of terraces and streets. On the line of the buildings so indicated were the words "for self-contained lodgings and corner tenements."

Baird & Brown disponed the land to the defenders Messrs Lamb & Gibson, builders, who disponed parts of it to the defenders Robert and James Anderson.

The defenders pleaded that the pursuers, being bound by the terms of the disposition of 30th June 1871, were restricted from erecting any buildings other than self-contained houses and corner tenements.

On 20th December 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"(2) Finds that the pursuers are bound by the conditions in regard to building on the lands of North Woodside contained in the disposition granted by the pursuers' authors, the City of Glasgow Bank, in favour of Baird & Brown, dated 29th and 30th June 1871, and forming No. 16 of process: (3) Finds that the defenders Lamb & Gibson, and Robert and James Anderson, are the singular successors of Baird & Brown, and are in right to insist on the conditions contained in said disposition: (4) Finds that the second conclusion for declarator is inconsistent with the conditions in reference to building on said lands of North Woodside contained in said disposition, and that as in a question with these defenders the pursuers are not entitled to insist on decree in terms of the said second conclusion, and that the said defenders are entitled to absolvitor from the said declaratory conclusion, and assoilzies the said defenders therefrom accordingly: Finds them entitled to expenses, and decerns."*

* "OPINION.—This is an action relating to building restrictions affecting the lands of North Woodside, in the vicinity of Glasgow. Questions of the kind have been frequently before the Court, but this action raises the question in an unusual, perhaps unprecedented form. Generally such actions have related to alleged infringements of the building restrictions by an individual feuar, and have taken the form of actions of interdict by the superior or by a co-feuar, or of appeals from judgments of a Dean of Guild Court. But this action is raised by the superior or disponer, and it seeks to have the building restrictions which restrained him defined by decree of declarator. These restrictions are usually ascertained by the feu-right Assets Co., Limited, v. Lamb & Gibson.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The declaration relied on by the defenders was only an indication of intention, and did not amount to an enforceable obligation. If total prohibition of shops and flats had been intended, this should have been clearly expressed. This was the first attempt to construe a clause in a deed by a plan. The plan did not enter the record. It was incompetent even to read an obligation written on a plan into a deed, but there was no such obligation here. The plan only shewed the building line, and although it might indicate something of character, it failed to do so with the definiteness necessary to restrictions on property. Elevations, at least, were essential, and the words on the plan were not sufficient.[1] Plans were only imported into a contract for the particular purpose for which they were intended,[2] and here the plan only shewed the situation, and not the character of buildings. The tendency of the Court was to interpret strictly restrictions such as those here.[3] Ewing v. Hunter[4] was distinguishable, and did not bear on the present. It was a case of prohibition as to use, not as to building.

which have been granted by the superior, combined with a feuing-plan, and it seems a difficult and delicate task to gather up the conditions expressed in different words in various dispositions, and express them all in one decree of declarator.

"The action in its terms relates to the whole of the lands of North Woodside which have not been feued or disponed, but the debate before me was conducted with reference to a certain part of the lands, shewn conveniently on a small feuing-plan, on which are laid down certain terraces and rows, which are now called Doune Terrace and Doune Gardens, and Carlton Terrace and Carlton Gardens. The whole of Doune Terrace and Doune Gardens has been given out and built on, and so have the western parts of Carlton Terrace and Carlton Gardens. But the eastern portions of Carlton Terrace and Carlton Gardens are still in the hands of the superior, and the main immediate purpose of this action is to ascertain the superior's rights as to building on these portions, although the conclusions of the action relate to the whole lands of North Woodside still in the hands of the superior.

"The pursuers, the Assets Company, are the singular successors of the City of Glasgow Bank, and no question has been raised about their title, neither has it been questioned on either side that they are bound by the conditions in the feu-dispositions granted by the City of Glasgow Bank, and are entitled to enforce these conditions, in precisely the same manner as the City of Glasgow Bank was bound and entitled.

"The defenders are all the persons who hold feu-rights of the lands of North Woodside, and they have all lodged defences founding on the clauses in their several feu-contracts.

"The conclusion is for declarator that the pursuers 'are entitled to erect on said subjects tenements of dwelling-houses, or tenements of dwelling-houses and shops, or such other buildings as they think fit, provided that such buildings are not inferior in character and design to the houses already built on said subjects'—that is to say, it affirms that the pursuers are entitled to erect on the unfeued portions of Carlton Terrace and Carlton Gardens tenements which are not self-contained,—shops and buildings of any

Argued for the defenders;—There was a valid and enforceable prohibition respecting buildings. It was validly imposed. The plan was referred to at every turn, and was intended to bind parties. The plan was part of the contract, and did not only shew intention.[1] It was objected that the plan did not enter the record, but the purchaser was put on his inquiry as to what was in the plan, and accepted his bargain with reference to it. The words meant that the superior must abstain from doing anything else. This practically amounted to offer and acceptance. The cases shewed that the Court would not interfere with the internal arrangement of a house, but it would uphold an obligation respecting the outside character if this was clearly expressed by plan.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The pursuers in this action are the proprietors of certain lands situated in the west of Glasgow, known as the lands of North Woodside, and the purpose of this action is to have it declared that the said lands are free from certain building restrictions which the defenders sort, provided they reach a certain character and design. Now, seeing that the pursuers are entitled to do what they please with their own property, so far as not restricted by contract, they are, no doubt, entitled to declarator in these terms, unless they are inconsistent with the conditions in any of the defenders' titles. But if they should be shewn to be inconsistent with any of the conditions of any of the dispositions or contracts constituting the titles of the defenders, decree of declarator to that effect cannot be pronounced, unless circumstances have intervened which make these conditions inapplicable or incapable of enforcement. . . .

"Lamb & Gibson are singular successors of Baird & Brown, whose feu-disposition from the City of Glasgow Bank is No. 16 of process, and is dated 29th and 30th June 1871. I understand that their feu was the earliest given off, and it consisted of about five acres at the northern extremity of the lands of North Woodside, separated from Doune Terrace and Carlton Terrace by a road called on the record Wilton Terrace Road.

"This feu-disposition contains the following declaration by the City of Glasgow Bank:—(His Lordship read the declaration above quoted).

"There seems to be a question in regard to the general feuing-plan here mentioned; it seems doubtful whether it is extant, and the parties are not at one about it. But there is no doubt that the plan to which this contract relates is the reduced copy appended to the disposition No. 16 of process, and signed on behalf of the bank. The clause may be read as if no other plan had been mentioned; and I think it clear that that plan is written into the deed and forms a part of it.

"Now the obligation of the superior, as regards buildings under this clause, is no more than this, that he binds himself and his successors to erect on the lands houses of the character and style indicated on the plan annexed to the feu-disposition, and I understand that these words express the only restriction on the pursuers' right to build on the unfeued land contained in the disposition. The words, however, no doubt require construction, for the clause cannot mean what the words express. They express a positive obligation to erect buildings. But it is certain that that is not what the parties meant. Nobody contends that the superior was bound to build on the lands. He was free to leave them unbuilt on, if and as long as he chose. The words must mean that, if the superior erected buildings on the lands, they should be of the character and style indicated on the maintain were imposed thereon by the terms of a conveyance executed in June 1871 by the pursuers in favour of Messrs Baird & Brown. With regard to the defenders who derive their right from Baird & Brown, the Lord Ordinary has held that the alleged building restrictions are binding on the pursuers, and he has assoilzied these defenders. The question argued before us, and which we have now to determine, relates only to that part of the interlocutor which holds the building restrictions binding on the pursuers, as in a question with Messrs Lamb & Gibson and Messrs Anderson, who derive their rights through Baird & Brown.

The general principle of law on which the question now to be decided depends is a well-settled one, and it is this, that no restriction on the right of property is ever presumed, that any such restriction to be binding and enforceable must be duly imposed in language which is express and unambiguous, and that failing this, the presumption is in favour of liberty. If therefore the restrictions which the defenders contend for are so imposed on the pursuers' property, the restrictions will be binding and enforceable, plan. Unless the clause means that, it has no meaning at all; and that is what, in my opinion, the clause does mean. Now this clause, as so interpreted, depends for its meaning on the plan; apart from the plan there is no building restriction at all.

"But the plan is nothing but a plan of the surface. It does not indicate the character or style of the buildings by any elevation or sketch. It shews only the line of the terraces and streets; and it does not even require uniformity in the character and style of the buildings. On the line of the buildings so indicated there are the words 'for self-contained lodgings and corner tenements.' On other parts of the plan there are the same words, and on other parts the words are different. There is one space shewn as a line of houses on which are the words 'tenements and shops.' Now, it is clear that the reference to the plan in the feu-disposition is not for identification, but for obligation; and I therefore read the clause in the disposition as an obligation imposed on the superior to build no houses in Carlton Terrace or Doune Terrace except self-contained houses and corner tenements. If that be so, the question comes to be whether the declarator asked in this action is consistent with that condition or not.

"I am of opinion that it is not, but is in direct contradiction of it. I think that the words 'for self-contained lodgings' import a prohibition of tenements not self-contained, and a prohibition of shops. I do not know that it can be said to be a settled point that a limitation to dwelling-houses implies a prohibition of shops. That was decided in the case of Greenhill v. Allan, 6th July 1825, 4 S. 160; but that must be regarded as a somewhat early case, having in view the nature of the question, and it is very shortly reported. In Ewing v. Hunter, 12th January 1878, 5 R. 439, a restriction to a dwelling-house was held to import a prohibition to use the house as a school. Cases were referred to in which, when detached or self-contained buildings only were permitted, operations which converted the buildings into two-flatted tenements were held not to violate the prohibitions —See Moir's Trustees v. M'Ewan, 15th July 1880, 7 R. 1141; Buchanan v. Marr, 7th March 1883, 10 R. 936; Millar v. Carmichael, 19th July 1888, 15 R. 991. But these cases fall very far short of holding that a prohibition against any buildings except self-contained lodgings can be consistent with a declarator which would sanction dwelling-houses not self-contained and shops. On the whole, I think it fairly clear that there is a radical inconsistency between the clause in the feu-disposition to Baird & Brown and that in the conclusions of declarator.

if otherwise, not. Of necessity this sends us to the clause of the deed by which the restrictions are said to be imposed, and it is in the following terms:—"Declaring that we and our foresaids shall be bound, as we hereby bind and oblige ourselves and our foresaids, to adhere to the general feuing-plan of our said lands, and to erect on the said lands houses of the character and style indicated thereupon, a copy whereof was signed as relative to the foresaid agreement between us and our said disponees, a reduced copy whereof is hereto annexed and signed as relative hereto, and to give effect to this condition in all feu-contracts, dispositions, and other conveyances of the plots of ground shewn on the said feuing-plan, and which declaration is also hereby declared to be a real lien and burden upon our said lands."

The first observation that occurs on reading that clause is, that it expresses a direct obligation on the granters of the deed (the superiors of the subjects) to build houses on the said lands of a certain character and style. But, as the Lord Ordinary observes, that is an obligation in which there is no creditor—no one can compel the superior to build anything on these lands unless he pleases. "Nobody contends (says the Lord Ordinary) that

"But then it is said that circumstances have altered, and that Lamb and Gibson have now no interest, and therefore no right, to enforce this condition. In a recent action between Lamb & Gibson and the present pursuers, it was held that Lamb & Gibson were not bound by the clause under consideration, because they were creditors under the clause and not obligants; and it is said that, in consequence of that decision, tenements of dwelling-houses (I understand not self-contained) have been built on their feu. But I am unable to see how that should affect their right or interest to enforce the obligation of the contract in regard to adjoining lands.

"Again, it is said that in the immediate vicinity large tenements have recently been built, and, among other things, workmen's houses; that the quarter has ceased to be residential; and that there is now no demand for self-contained houses in that locality.

"The pursuers—naturally desirous to utilise their land to the best advantage—wish to feu it for the sort of buildings which are in request in the neighbourhood, and they maintain that all interest to insist that the houses to be built on the unfeued parts of Carlton Terrace and Doune Terrace shall be self-contained has ceased to exist. There have been cases in which the Court has refused to enforce building restrictions, as for example in Fraser v. Downie, 22d June 1877, 4 R. 942, and other cases noticed in Rankine's Land Rights, p. 419. But these have been cases in which the person seeking to enforce the restrictions has been met by a plea of personal bar, or where he has acquiesced in deviations from the building-plan. But there is nothing of that kind in this case. It is not averred that the conditions in the contracts granted by the superior have ever been infringed, and there is therefore no basis for the contention that the right to enforce the building conditions has been abandoned. The fact that buildings of a different character from those stipulated have been built on other lands in the immediate vicinity is, I think, totally irrelevant; and in this question with Lamb & Gibson there is no need to inquire into the averments about that matter.

"I am therefore of opinion that the pursuers cannot prevail against Lamb & Gibson, and that these defenders are entitled to object to the decree of declarator concluded for, and to be assoilzied from the action; and it follows that the decree of declarator concluded for against them cannot be granted."

the superior was bound to build on the lands. He was free to leave them unbuilt on if and as long as he chose." If, however, there is no obligation to build at all, there can be no obligation to build of a certain character and style. The Lord Ordinary, however, goes on to say that the clause must have some meaning, and that the only meaning it can have is, that if the superior does build, he shall only build houses of a certain character and quality as indicated on the plan, and that interpretation of the clause his Lordship adopts. I suppose the Lord Ordinary has adopted this view on the principle that where a contractual clause admits of two constructions, that construction should be preferred by which the clause will be made of some avail, rather than that which would destroy it. Against that principle I have nothing to say. But the construction so preferred must be one which the words of the clause or contract admits of, not one which is only inferred from what may in the circumstances be supposed to have been the intention of parties. Now, here, the contract as expressed is not ambiguous—the obligation is clearly expressed, but there is no one in right to enforce it. To reach the meaning which the Lord Ordinary puts upon the clause, some word or words must be read into it which are not there. For example, if the clause had said that the superior, "if he built," should be bound to erect "only" houses of a certain character—the Lord Ordinary's view might have been sustained. But it is not permissible to add words to a clause in that way. Especially when, as it stands, the clause is apparently complete. On the clause, as it stands, I am unable to give that construction or meaning to it which the Lord Ordinary has done. This is no doubt dealing very strictly with the clause, but that is what I think we are bound to do in construing deeds affecting real rights. The clause in question, as expressed, appears to me to impose an obligation to build, and not a clause restraining building except of a certain character.

Even if I were to adopt the meaning of the clause which the Lord Ordinary gives to it, I doubt whether I could give it the effect which he has done. The restriction in that view of the case would be to the building of houses "of the character and style indicated" on the plan annexed to the disposition. But "character and style" are words which indicate appearance and architectural design rather than size, or use by the occupier. Now, of character and style in that sense, nothing is indicated on the plan. No doubt the plan may be said to indicate "character" by noting "self-contained lodgings and corner tenements." But a full observance of these words might lead to a somewhat curious result. One building might be a very humble brick erection of two apartments—that would be a self-contained lodging. The next building to it might be a house of two storeys in which one family might reside, the lower storey occupied as their dwelling-house, the upper as their warehouse or workroom. This again would be a self-contained lodging, and yet, while compliance with the directions in the plan would thus be given, no uniformity of building would be observed, and the amenity of the place seriously injured. Yet the preservation of uniformity of building and amenity were the only two purposes suggested as in the contemplation of the clause. Again, the phrase "corner tenements" places no restriction on the extent of ground which they are to occupy. Accordingly, a "corner tenement" might extend indefinitely along the two streets at the corner of which it is placed. It might therefore, while still in strict accordance with the words on the plan, be much more in the street than at the corner.

To restrict the rights of property by the use of terms so vague as those on the plan in question, would be going farther, I think, in that direction than has ever yet been done. I can find no precedent for doing so, and am not inclined to make one.

I think the decision of the question before us is attended with considerable difficulty, but on the best consideration I can give it, I am of opinion that we should recall the second, third, and fourth findings of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and decern as concluded for against the defenders Lamb & Gibson and Robert and James Anderson, and quoad ultra adhere, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—That is the opinion of the Court.

THE COURT [the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, and LORD TRAYNER] pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the second, third, and fourth findings in the interlocutor reclaimed against, including the finding as to expenses in favour of the defenders Lamb & Gibson, and decern in terms of the conclusions of the action against Lamb & Gibson and Robert and James Anderson, and find them liable to the pursuers in the expenses of process, including expenses since the date of the reclaiming note. . . ."

ANN SOMERVILLE, Pursuer.—A. M. Anderson.
COLIN THOMSON, Defender.—M'Lennan.

Process—Proof—Diligence—Breach of Promise of Marriage—Diligence for recovery of documents disclosing defender's financial position.—In an action of damages for breach of promise of marriage the pursuer moved for a diligence to recover the defender's business books and bank books in order to disclose his financial position. Circumstances in which the Court refused the motion.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that the pursuer of an action of damages for breach of promise of marriage is not entitled to a diligence to recover documents to shew the defender's financial position.

Opinion (per Lord Trayner) on the general question reserved.

2D DIVISION.

ANN SOMERVILLE, Elder Park Street, Govan, sued Colin Thomson, livery stable keeper, High Street, Cromarty, for £1000 as damages for breach of promise of marriage.

The pursuer averred that in his business the defender employed three horses and seven or eight conveyances.

The defender explained that his business consisted of a small posting establishment employing two horses, and his farm or croft of £20 rent per annum.

Notice of trial having been given for the Spring Sittings, the pursuer moved the Court for a diligence to recover the business books of the defender relating to his posting business and farm, and the bank account books and deposit-receipts of the defender, and the bank books belonging to the defender's banks shewing the state of his account. No. 108. Mar. 6, 1896. Somerville v. Thomson.

Argued for the pursuer;—The information sought was material to the issue. The pursuer alleged a substantial financial position on the part of the defender which he denied. If the jury were in the pursuer's favour they would require some definite ground for their award of damages.

Argued for the defender;—The diligence craved was incompetent. The ordinary rule was that a person was entitled to exclude his private business from inspection. This case raised no exception.[1] The case was different where the pursuer puts his business affairs in issue.[2]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that we ought not to grant the diligence asked for.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think that in this case there is no necessity for the diligence which the pursuer craves, for the parties are practically at one with regard to the defender's financial position. I wish, however, in consequence of some observations made in the course of the discussion, to guard myself from being supposed to hold that there is any principle or general rule which would exclude the pursuer of an action of damages for breach of promise from obtaining such a diligence if the extent of the defender's business or the state of his financial position were important to the proper determination of the case.

LORD YOUNG.—Perhaps it is right that I should state my opinion on the general question without going into details. I am of opinion that the pursuer of an action of damages for breach of promise of marriage is not entitled to a diligence to disclose the defender's financial position.

THE COURT refused the motion.

within the description in the titles of lot No. 2, but were occupied in connection with lot No. 1, the following marginal addition was made to the description of lot No. 1 in the articles, "as the said subjects are presently occupied and possessed by" the persons then in occupation of lot No. 1 and of the back buildings. This marginal addition was not referred to in the testing-clause, and no corresponding addition was made to the description of lot No. 2 in the articles.

At the roup lot No. 1 was knocked down first—to Lawrie—but one of the instrumentary witnesses never signed the minute of enactment in his favour.

Lot No. 2 was knocked down to Moncrieff, in whose favour a minute of enactment was duly executed.

Moncrieff, after the sale, claimed a conveyance, including the back ground and buildings, as falling within the description of the subjects sold to him. Morison's trustees at first objected, but subsequently granted a conveyance in his favour of lot No. 2 as described in the articles, without any qualification. This conveyance was delivered and recorded before the conveyance to Lawrie of lot No. 1, which was described in that conveyance as in the articles with the marginal addition.

Lawrie having entered into possession of the back ground and buildings, Moncrieff brought an action against him for declarator of property and for removing. Morison's trustees having been sisted as defenders along with Lawrie, the defenders maintained that they ought to be assoilzied on the ground that Morison's trustees were, to the knowledge of the pursuer, at the time of the sale under essential error as to the extent of the subjects sold as lot No. 2; and the defender Lawrie further maintained that he ought to be assoilzied on the ground that a sale of the back subjects to him had, to the knowledge of the pursuer, been completed prior to the sale of lot No. 2.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) after a proof granted decree in favour of the pursuer, holding (1) that it was not open, either to Morison's trustees or to Lawrie, to plead essential error on the part of Morison's trustees after Morison's trustees had granted an unqualified conveyance to the pursuer in the knowledge that he claimed the back subjects; and (2) that the special defence maintained by Lawrie was ill founded, no prior contract of sale having been completed, owing to the absence of the signature of the instrumentary witness to the minute.

On a reclaiming note the Court adhered, but on the ground that, as the titles stood, the buildings in question must be held to belong to the pursuer and not to Lawrie.

Opinions reserved whether the pursuer's title was open to reduction at the instance of the defenders.

2d Division.
Ld. Kyllachy.

In 1894 the trustees of Stephen Nicol Morison, bookseller and publisher, Alloa, were proprietors of two properties in Alloa, viz. (1) certain shops and houses in Mill Street, and (2) certain shops and houses in Mar Street, which was at right angles to Mill Street. These two properties were contiguous, but were held under different titles. A back shop, bedroom above, and wash-house adjoining, were situated on certain back ground, which was within the titles to the Mar Street property, but these back buildings themselves had been erected and were used in connection with the Mill Street property.

On 3d March 1894 Morison's trustees exposed both properties for sale by public roup, under the same articles, the Mill Street property being lot No. 1, and the Mar Street property being lot No. 2. The original description of each lot was taken from the titles, according to which the back buildings would have gone with the Mar Street property (lot No. 2), but as it was the intention of the trustees that these buildings should go with the Mill Street property (lot No. 1), a marginal addition was made to the description of lot No. 1 in the articles in these terms, "as the said subjects are presently occupied and possessed by the representatives of the late Mr Stephen Nicol Morison and the London and Newcastle Tea Company,"—the Mill Street subjects, including the back buildings, having been occupied in part by the truster's representatives and in part by the London and Newcastle Tea Company. This marginal addition was read at the roup as part of the articles, but it was not mentioned in the testing-clause, nor was there any corresponding alteration in the description of lot No. 2 (Mar Street.)

Lot No. 1 (Mill Street) was first exposed, and was knocked down to Thomas Lawrie, temperance hotelkeeper, Alloa, but the minute of enactment in his favour was not subscribed by one of the instrumentary witnesses.

Lot No. 2 (Mar Street) was knocked down to John Balleny Moncrieff, insurance-agent, Ochil Street, Alloa, and a minute of enactment in his favour was duly executed.

After the sale Moncrieff intimated to Morison's trustees that he claimed the back ground and buildings thereon as falling within the description in the articles of the subjects sold to him. Morison's trustees repudiated this claim, but after some correspondence they granted a conveyance in favour of Moncrieff in which the subjects were described as in the description of lot No. 2 in the articles, without any qualification. This conveyance was dated 14th, and was recorded in the Register of Sasines 16th May 1894.

Morison's trustees also granted a conveyance in favour of Lawrie of the subjects forming lot No. 1, the subjects being described as in the articles of roup, including the marginal addition thereto. This conveyance was dated 14th May 1894, but was delivered after the delivery of the conveyance to Moncrieff, and was not recorded in the register of sasines until the 25th May.

Lawrie having entered into possession of the back ground and buildings thereon, Moncrieff, on 4th May 1895, brought an action against him for declarator of property in these subjects, and for removing.

Lawrie lodged defences, and on 16th October 1895 Morison's trustees were allowed to sist themselves as defenders, and they adopted the defences.

A proof was allowed. The defenders led at the proof. The evidence established the foregoing facts, in so far as they had been in dispute, and the questions at issue between the parties, as arising upon the proof, were shortly these:—

(1) The defenders maintained that they ought to be assoilzied on the ground that the pursuer had bought lot No. 2 in the knowledge that Morison's trustees had no intention of selling the back ground and buildings as part of that lot, and were consequently under essential error as to the extent of the subjects sold. The defenders further maintained that they were not barred from taking this plea by reason of Morison's trustees having granted an unqualified conveyance in favour of the pursuer, in respect that in granting the conveyance Morison's trustees had no intention of giving up their legal rights, and that they bona fide believed, at the date when the conveyance was granted, that the back subjects in question were not carried by the conveyance, the defenders' contention being that Morison's trustees at the date of the conveyance were under the belief that the old titles carried the back subjects as part of lot No. 1, or at least that these titles were ambiguous and required to be explained by the state of possession. In answer, the pursuer maintained that the sale to him was not invalid on the ground of essential error, and in any event that the defenders were barred from taking that plea, in respect that Morison's trustees had granted in his favour an unqualified conveyance of the subjects, in full knowledge of the dispute that had arisen.

(2) Lawrie further maintained that the subjects in question having, to the pursuer's knowledge, been sold to him (Lawrie) prior to the alleged sale to the pursuer, the pursuer was barred from claiming the subjects. In answer the pursuer maintained that there had been no prior completed sale of the subjects in question to Lawrie, in respect that the marginal addition was not authenticated by reference in the testing-clause, and, further, in respect of the absence of the subscription of one of the instrumentary witnesses to the minute of enactment in favour of Lawrie.

On 8th January 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) granted decree of declarator against Lawrie and Morison's trustees, and decree of removing against Lawrie.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuer in this case seeks to have it declared that certain back premises adjacent to a certain tenement belonging to him in Mar Street, Alloa, belong in property to him (the pursuer). He also seeks to have decree of removal against the defender—the owner of a neighbouring tenement—who is in possession of the back premises. Both parties derive right from a common author, viz., Morison's trustees, and these trustees have been allowed to sist themselves as defenders to the action, and to adopt the defences. The case has accordingly been taken as if these trustees had been called as defenders, and as if the conclusions of the summons—or at least the declaratory conclusion—had been directed also against them.

"One peculiarity of the case is that the pursuer has undoubtedly obtained a title to the premises in question, and a title prior in date to that alleged by the defender. This is not admitted on record, but the proof shews, I think, conclusively, that the description in the pursuer's title includes the ground on which the buildings in dispute stand. It also appears, and indeed was not disputed, that the pursuer's title was prior in date, and was first recorded in the Register of Sasines.

"It is therefore perhaps doubtful whether the defenders should have been allowed to try the question raised upon this record without bringing, in the first place, an action of reduction. I have not, however, felt bound to decide the case upon that technical point. I incline to think that the defenders, having come into Court in response to the pursuer's challenge, are entitled to table all defences which go to negative the pursuer's right. At all events, as some proof was necessary, I (rightly or wrongly) allowed proof in general terms, and, the whole case being now before me, I propose to decide it upon its merits.

"The facts are shortly these. Morison's trustees were owners of two sets of subjects in Alloa, viz., (1) certain shops and houses in Mill Street; and (2) certain shops and houses in Mar Street. The two properties were contiguous, but held under different titles, and there was certain back ground between them, which, beyond doubt, belonged to the Mar Street property, but on which a back shop, bedroom above, and wash-house adjoining, had been erected and used in connection with the Mill Street property. Both properties were exposed for public sale on the same day, and under the same articles—the Mill Street property being the first lot and the Mar Street the second. The description of each lot was taken from the old titles, by which, as I have said, the back buildings went with Mar Street (lot No. 2). This, however, not being intended, a marginal note was added

Mar. 6, 1896. Moncrieff v. Lawrie.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The evidence shewed that Morison's trustees had no intention of selling the back ground and subjects thereon as part of lot No. 2, and that the pursuer was aware of this prior to the sale to him. He was not entitled, therefore, to take advantage of the error.[1] The conveyance in favour of the pursuer did not bar the defenders from pleading this essential error. In order that the conveyance should have that effect it was necessary that the granters should have known that the contract upon which the conveyance proceeded was open to objection on the ground of essential error, and that they should have intended to waive this objection by granting a conveyance which should have the effect of barring them from pleading the error.[2] The evidence did not establish these conditions. Morison's trustees at the time of the sale, and when they granted the conveyance, thought that the titles carried the subjects in dispute as part of lot No. 1, or at least that the titles were ambiguous, and required to be explained by the state of possession. That might be an error, but if the error continued down to the granting of the conveyance it was a sufficient answer to the plea to the description in the articles of lot No. 1 (the Mill Street subjects) in these terms, 'as the said subjects are presently occupied and possessed by the representatives of the late Mr Stephen Nicol Morison and the London and Newcastle Tea Company, &c.' (the Mill Street tenants). This marginal note was read at the roup as part of the articles, but was not authenticated by being mentioned in the testing-clause, nor was any corresponding alteration made in the description of lot 2. The roup having proceeded, lot 1 (Mill Street) was (subject to the point which I shall presently notice) purchased by the defender Lawrie. Lot 2 (Mar Street) was similarly purchased by the pursuer, Moncrieff. And I have no doubt whatever that the pursuer and his agent knew quite well (1) that according to the description of lot 2 in the articles (read in connection with the situation and history of the premises) he (the pursuer) was purchasing the back premises in question; and (2) that the exposers (Morison's trustees) were under a different belief, and had no intention of selling these premises as part of lot 2.

"In these circumstances, if the question had been at once raised and tried whether the pursuer could hold to his bargain and enforce implement of it according to its legal construction, I should have had little doubt that the decision must have been in the negative. The exposers were in error as to the extent of the subjects sold, and the pursuer knew of their error, and took advantage of it. The pursuer allowed the exposers to agree with him in certain terms, knowing that the exposers attached one meaning to those terms, while he, the pursuer, attached to them another and different meaning. A contract so made the law will not enforce, and will, if necessary, reduce. The case would have come within the principle of Steuart's Trustees v. Hart, 3 R. 192. See also the English cases collected in Addison on Contracts, 6th ed. pp. 133-139.

"What happened, however, was this. The pursuer at once tabled his construction of the articles, and claimed a conveyance of the Mar Street property as therein described—avowing that he held, and meant to maintain, that the back shop, bedroom, and wash-house were within the description. The exposers demurred, but after some correspondence, they gave way; and in of bar. (2) As in a question with the defender Lawrie, at all events the pursuer's case failed since he knew that prior to his contract for the purchase of lot No. 2 the back subjects in question had been sold to Lawrie.[1] It might be that the sale to Lawrie was open to technical objections, although even that was doubtful, since the subscription of an instrumentary witness might be adhibited ex intervallo, and it was not clear that the failure to mention a marginal addition was fatal to the validity of the addition. But assuming the soundness of the objections per se, they were res inter alios as in a question between Lawrie and the pursuer, who was no party to the contract between Morison's trustees and Lawrie.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) As in a question with Morison's trustees the case for the pursuer was clear. The contract between them and him was ex facie unobjectionable, and it was now not disputed that, according to its terms, it carried the subjects in question. This contract was followed by a conveyance of precisely the same subjects, without qualification or reservation, as had been sold under the contract, and the conveyance was granted after the very question the full knowledge not only of the pursuer's contention, but of its unsoundness in point of fact, granted him the conveyance which he claimed. In other words, having power to repudiate the contract of sale, they preferred not to do so, but accepted it as valid, and executed it; and did so by disposition delivered prior to the defender's disposition, and with the result, as I have already said, that the pursuer's disposition was the first to be made real by infeftment.

"I cannot, I confess, see how in that state of the facts the defenders, or either of them, can appeal to the doctrine of Steuart's Trustees v. Hart. Whatever may have been their error as to the effect of the articles, the trustees and exposers were under no error as to the effect of the disposition. They had ample notice of the pursuer's contention, and for reasons, good or bad, they accepted it. That is their position, and as regards this ground of defence, it does not appear to me that the defender Lawrie is in a better position or can have higher rights than his authors.

"It remains to consider whether the defender Lawrie has not, in virtue of his prior purchase of the Mill Street subjects, and of the pursuer's knowledge of what was embraced in that purchase, a separate and independent ground of challenge of the pursuer's title so far as applying to the premises in dispute. There is no doubt that the Mill Street subjects were first exposed and sold at the roup. There is also no doubt that by the marginal addition to the articles of roup, these subjects were described in terms which may be held to cover the out-buildings in question. It is also certain that the pursuer heard the articles of roup read, including the marginal addition, before he himself bought the Mar Street subjects, and saw and heard the Mill Street subjects knocked down and sold to the defender Lawrie. If therefore the sale of the Mill Street subjects was a completed sale—if Lawrie had a completed contract right to those subjects before the Mar Street subjects were exposed and sold—I do not at present see reason to doubt that the defender Lawrie might reduce the pursuer's title as a title obtained and taken by the pursuer in the knowledge of his (Lawrie's) prior right. That would appear to follow from the legal doctrine established by the cases in the Dictionary under the head of 'Private Knowledge of a Prior Right,' Mor. 1689, et seq.; and by the more recent cases of Marshall v. Hynd, 6 S. 384; Petrie v. Forsyth, 2 R. 214; Stodart now in dispute had been discussed by the pursuer and Morison's trustees. In these circumstances it was vain for Morison's trustees to plead essential error, and equally so for Lawrie, whose only remedy, if he had any remedy, was an action against his authors, Morison's trustees. (2) The special defence stated by Lawrie was also ill-founded. It might be that Lawrie would have had a good ground of defence if to the knowledge of the pursuer there had been a concluded contract for the sale to Lawrie of the subjects in dispute. But in the first place the marginal addition did not form part of the contract, as it had not been validly incorporated with the articles, not having been mentioned in the testing-clause. Then the addition, even if it were taken as part of the articles, had not the effect of carrying the subjects in dispute as part of lot No. 1. Further, it had not been shewn that the pursuer either knew or was bound to know the terms of the description of lot No. 1, which he had no thought of buying. Apart, however, from these objections, there was this conclusive answer to Lawrie, that no contract of any sort between him and Morison's trustees had been constituted by the articles of roup and the minute of enactment. The absence of the subscription of one of the instrumentary witnesses to the minute made the minute valueless unless the defect could be remedied, and it was too late to remedy it

v. Dalzell, 4 R. 236. See also the English cases noted in Lord Shand's note in the last of these cases.

"But the difficulty here is that, by an unfortunate oversight in the conduct of the sale, there was not only an omission to authenticate the marginal addition on which the defender Lawrie's case depends, but also an omission to have the minute of enactment which constituted his purchase subscribed by one of the instrumentary witnesses. The pursuer maintains that these omissions are fatal to the defender's case, inasmuch as the alleged prior right was, as it now appears, not a completed right. He says—what is clear—that writing was necessary, and the only writing being improbative, he contends that at the time of his (the pursuer's) purchase of the Mar Street property there was locus pœnitentiæ with respect to the Mill Street subjects on the part of all concerned.

"So far as the marginal addition is concerned, I am disposed to think that this difficulty might be met. There appears to be some doubt how far a marginal addition requires, as matter of solemnity, to be noticed in the testing-clause (Bell's Lect. i. p. 75); and in any case it may perhaps be held that the defect of authentication was here redressed by rei interventus. But the failure to obtain the subscription of one of the instrumentary witnesses to the minute of enactment is a more serious matter, and after full consideration I have been unable to see any answer to the objection. It may be that the non-subscribing witness might have subscribed ex intervallo. That is a question not, I think, quite settled (see Thomson v. Clarkson's Trustees, 20 R. 59). But in point of fact the witness has not yet subscribed, and it can hardly be suggested that he can now do so. The 38th and 39th sections of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 do not, I am afraid, either of them apply, and under the old law there can, I think, be no doubt that the minute of enactment is still improbative.

"On the whole, therefore, I have been compelled to the conclusion that the pursuer is entitled to decree. I regret that such is the result, because I think it clear that he took and obtained an unfair advantage. But as against Morison's trustees, he obtained that advantage while the latter had their eyes fully open; and as against the defender Lawrie, he prevails by reason simply of the unfortunate mistake made with respect to the authentication of the minute of enactment."

now.[1] That being so, it was clear in law that no contract for the sale of heritage had been completed between Lawrie and Morison's trustees[2] —prior, that was to say, to the delivery of the conveyance to Lawrie. Either he or Morison's trustees might have resiled. It was open to the pursuer to take the objection, for it was an objection patent on the face of the alleged contract which was pleaded against the pursuer's otherwise (on the assumption of the present branch of the argument) undoubted title to the subjects. Besides, Lawrie's only remedy on the contract was by action against Morison's trustees, who, if sued by Lawrie, would be bound to state the objection after having given the present pursuer a title to the subjects to which, ex hypothesi, Morison's trustees could state no objection.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts in this case are these :—Morison's trustees were owners of two sets of subjects, one situated in Mar Street and the other in Mill Street, Alloa. These two properties were contiguous, but they were held under different titles. There was a certain piece of back ground, now in question, belonging to the Mar Street subjects on which certain buildings were erected. After these buildings were erected they were used not in connection with the Mar Street subjects, but in connection with the Mill Street subjects. Both properties were exposed for sale under articles of roup, the descriptions in which were taken from the old descriptions in the titles, and accordingly the description of the Mar Street subjects included the back premises, which had been used in connection with the Mill Street property. To correct this a marginal addition was added to the description of the Mill Street subjects, which I need not quote. The effect of that addition was to indicate that the piece of ground which under the descriptions of the two properties really belonged to the Mar Street subjects was to go with the Mill Street subjects. Accordingly, the sale was conducted under that supposition. It is not disputed that this was announced and well known to Mr Moncrieff. What happened was very peculiar. The pursuer bought the Mar Street property, and at once claimed the back premises as being included under the description in the articles of roup. Correspondence followed, but after some letters had passed between the parties the trustees gave the pursuer a disposition with a description in terms of the old titles, thus including the back premises in question. Accordingly, I think we must hold that that conveyance carried these back premises and gave the pursuer a good title to them.

Another question has arisen, whether the pursuer, who had perfect knowledge before he bought the Mar Street property that the Mill Street property as described, subject to the marginal addition, had been knocked down to Mr Lawrie, can, in spite of his knowledge of what was intended, succeed in his contention as in a question between him and Mr Lawrie? In this respect we have also a very extraordinary state of matters. Not only was the marginal addition never authenticated, by being mentioned in the testing-clause, but the signature of the second witness was never appended to the minute of enactment which concluded the contract of sale with Mr Lawrie. Assuming that a marginal addition must be authenticated by being mentioned in the testing-clause, in this case the question would arise whether there had not been rei interventus; but in my opinion the failure to obtain the signature of the instrumentary witness is a much more serious defect, and indeed fatal to the validity of the deed. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that for the purpose of defeating the rights of Mr Moncrieff the omission cannot be supplied now.

On the whole matter I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and think his judgment is correct.

Upon the question whether or not the defender may have a right to have the pursuer's title set aside in other proceedings, I give no opinion, —indeed I expressly reserve my opinion.

LORD YOUNG.—My opinion is to the same effect, but without any disposition to make any reservation or give any encouragement to any such proceedings as your Lordship has mentioned.

My opinion on the merits is clear and simple, and can be shortly expressed.

This is a summons at the instance of a Mr Moncrieff as proprietor of certain property. The conclusions are (1) for declarator that these back premises are comprehended under the description of the property, and that the same pertain heritably in property to the pursuer; and (2) for decree of removing against the defender Lawrie. I am of opinion, and indeed it was not disputed, that the property in question is included under the pursuer's title, his title being such as to give him a good title to it. The defender, on the other hand, is in possession of the property, and he has no title except the disposition produced, which does not include it. He has no other title. I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer, who has a title to these premises, is entitled to have the defender, who has none, removed.

Whether the defender Lawrie, by other proceedings, can have this property taken out of the pursuer's title and included under his, I give no opinion; but I would not like to say one word to encourage the defender to believe that such proceedings would be successful. I make no reservation except this, that the defender can take any proceedings which the law allows.

I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree in the result arrived at by the Lord Ordinary. The property here in dispute is certainly within the pursuer's title. It was duly conveyed to him, and he is infeft therein. It is equally certain that the property in dispute is not in the defender Lawrie's title—was never conveyed to him. In this state of the title I see no answer to the pursuer's case. It may be that there is a question behind this, whether in the circumstances the pursuer can maintain his title as it now stands, or whether it is liable to reduction at the instance of either of the defenders. That question may be a very serious one for the pursuer, but it is not the question now before us.

Company—Resolution to alter Memorandum of Association—Extension to new business—Confirmation by Court—Conditions—Change of name to indicate extended business—Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. c. 62) sec. 1.—The Scottish Accident Insurance Company, incorporated in 1877, under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance against accident, presented a petition under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, for confirmation of a special resolution altering its memorandum of association so as to extend its business to life, sickness, employers' liability and fidelity insurance. The Court granted the petition on condition that the name of the company was changed to the Scottish Accident, Life, and Fidelity Insurance Company, or to such other name as might be approved of by the Board of Trade, and by the Court, to indicate the extended nature of the company's business.

1ST DIVISION. THIS was a petition presented under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890,* by the Scottish Accident Insurance Company, Limited, for confirmation of a special resolution unanimously adopted at two extraordinary general meetings of the company altering its memorandum of association.

The company was incorporated in 1877, under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, the object for which it was established, as set forth in its memorandum of association, being generally the carrying on of the business of assurers, either as principals or agents, against or upon accidental injuries to human life. The original memorandum included the further object of insurance against injury to or destruction of property arising from any accident other than fire, but it was

* By the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. c. 62), section 1, subsection (1) it is, inter alia, provided that: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, may, by special resolution, alter the provisions of its memorandum of association or deed of settlement with respect to the objects of the company, so far as may be required for any of the purposes hereinafter specified. . . . but in no case shall any such alteration take effect until confirmed on petition by the Court which has jurisdiction to make an order for winding up the company."

By section 1, subsections (3) and (5), it is provided:—Subsection (3) "An order confirming any such alteration may be made on such terms and subject to such conditions as to the Court seems fit. . . ." Subsection (5) "The Court may confirm, either wholly or in part, any such alteration as aforesaid with respect to the objects of the company if it appears that the alteration is required in order to enable the company (a) to carry on its business more economically or more efficiently; or (b) to attain its main purpose by new or improved means; or (c) to enlarge or change the local area of its operations; or (d) to carry on some business or businesses which under existing circumstances may conveniently or advantageously be combined with the business of the company; or (e) to restrict or abandon any of the objects specified in the memorandum of association or deed of settlement."

provided that that object could only be carried out if authorised by a special resolution of the company.

The objects proposed to be added by the alteration of the memorandum were the carrying on of life, sickness, employers' liability, and fidelity insurance. It was also proposed to abandon the power of insuring property against injury or destruction from accident other than fire.

On 5th December 1895 the Court remitted to Mr C. B. Logan, W.S., to inquire and report as to the regularity of the proceedings, and the reasons for the proposed alteration of the memorandum of association.

Mr Logan, inter alia, reported as below.*

* "It will be seen that the proposed extension is very wide, including in fact all the ordinary business of life insurance, accident and sickness, employers' liability and guarantee companies. . . .

"Although the various kinds of insurance above referred to are quite distinct in character, there are a considerable number of companies in the United Kingdom which combine the various classes of insurance business which the petitioners now propose to embrace under the powers sought for. Life insurance is of wider and greater importance than accident insurance, and that portion of accident insurance which relates to fatal accidents is obviously a description of life insurance, limited to a special risk. In that respect the businesses may be said to be similar. It has been pointed out to me, in support of the view that life and accident insurance business is closely allied, that in 1894 the Board of Trade, acting on the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, refused to permit the registration of new companies seeking to transact fatal accident insurance business, unless the requirements of the Life Assurance Companies Act of 1870 were complied with, on the ground that a policy of insurance covering payment of a sum of money in the event of death by accident is a policy of insurance upon human life within section 2 of the 1870 statute. Your Lordships have in a previous case sanctioned, under the Act of 1890, the extension of the business of a life assurance company so as to include accident insurance, and have also permitted an accident insurance company to obtain powers to transact fidelity and guarantee business, but I have not been able to ascertain that there have been any cases, either in Scotland or in England, in which the Courts have authorised under the statute of 1890 so important an extension of business as is now sought for. . . .

"I have therefore some difficulty in reporting whether the proposed extension can be held to be covered by the provisions of the Act, or whether it may not be necessary to reconstitute the company in order to accomplish the change. This is a matter which I feel it to be my duty to bring specially under your Lordships' consideration. . . .

"Another matter which I think should be brought under your Lordships' attention in the event of the proposed powers, or any of them, being granted, is the name of the company. In certain cases in the English Courts the extension of powers has been granted only upon the name of the company being changed so as to indicate the addition of the new business. . . . It humbly appears to me that if the extension of powers asked for is granted by your Lordships, either in whole or in part, it would be proper that the name of the company should be altered so as to indicate the increased nature of the business. The petitioners are willing that the name of the company be changed to 'The Scottish Accident, Life, and Fidelity Insurance Company, Limited,' and they are in communication with the Board of Trade for its approval to this change, as provided for under section 13 of the Companies Act of 1862.

"I have examined the proceedings, and have to report that they have been carried out with due regularity."

No. 110.

Mar. 12, 1896. Scottish Accident Insurance Co., Limited.

The petitioners argued;—It would be for the undoubted advantage of the company if the alteration were allowed. Alterations of a memorandum were sanctioned by the Court in cases where the new business which it was proposed to combine with the original business was of the same class or kind.[1] That was so here, for all the new business was insurance business. The practice in England was the same.[2] It was only where the object of the alteration was to empower the company to carry on a business entirely foreign to the purposes of the original memorandum,[3] or where the powers sought were vague and indefinite,[4] that the Court refused its sanction.

THE COURT [the LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR] pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Confirm the alteration of the memorandum of association with respect to the objects of the company set forth in the special resolution of the company passed on 31st October and 15th November 1895 with the exception of" [one head, which is not above referred to, having been withdrawn by the petitioners], "but subject always to the condition that the name of the company be changed to 'The Scottish Accident, Life, and Fidelity Insurance Company, Limited,' or such other name as may be resolved upon by the company and approved of by the Board of Trade, as provided for by section 13 of the Companies Act, 1862, and be approved by the Court under this petition; and for this end continue the cause, and decern."

Husband and Wife—Divorce for desertion—Separation—Cruelty—Charge of immoral conduct not amounting to adultery, and unknown to spouse founding on it until actions in Court—Relevancy.—A husband brought an action of divorce for desertion against his wife, who stated in defence that she had left her husband on account of his continued cruelty. The wife also brought an action for separation on the ground of cruelty against the husband. After the records had been closed the wife craved leave to add in both cases an averment of facts which had come to her knowledge subsequent to the closing of the records, to the effect that, while she was still living with her husband, he had attempted on one occasion to have connection with her niece.

The Lord Ordinary (Low) having allowed an amendment in both actions, the Court refused to interfere with his decision, holding that proof of the alleged misconduct of the husband might be relevant as shewing his animus towards his wife, although that misconduct, being unknown to the wife, could not constitute a case of cruel maltreatment.

A v. B.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

On 12th November 1895 A brought an action of divorce for desertion against B, his wife. He stated that they had been married in March 1890, and that she had deserted him in January 1891.

In defence B averred that she had left her husband because of his continued cruelty towards her.

On 25th November 1895 B brought an action for separation against her husband on the ground of cruelty.

After the records had been closed and proof allowed the wife lodged a minute in both actions craving leave to amend the records by adding an averment (of facts which had come to her knowledge after the records had been closed) to the effect that, while she was still living with her husband, he had attempted on one occasion to have connection with her niece, who was staying with them.

On 22d February 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Low) allowed the proposed amendment in both actions.

The husband reclaimed, and argued;—The averments contained in the amendment were irrelevant in both cases. (1) Separation Case.—While adultery was a good ground for separation,[1] it was not legal cruelty,[2] and the conduct alleged in the minute did not amount to adultery. The cases of Lessly[3] and Letham,[3] relied on by the other side, established no more than that the protracted adultery of a husband in the house where his wife resided amounted to cruelty. In any case there could be no cruelty to the wife in conduct of which she confessedly knew nothing. (2) Divorce Case.—A wife could not plead as an excuse for non-adherence conduct on her husband's part of which she was ignorant when the action was brought, just as under the old law an offer to adhere was too late after decree of adherence—then a necessary preliminary to an action of divorce for desertion—had been pronounced.[4]

Argued for the wife;—The conduct alleged in the minute of amendment would have justified the wife in refusing to live with her husband. The allegations would accordingly have been a good answer to an action of adherence. They were therefore a good answer under the present procedure to an action of divorce for desertion.[5] Non-adherence might be justified on grounds which would not support an action for separation.[6] Moreover, the minute contained relevant averments of cruelty.[7] If not sufficient by themselves as an answer to the action for divorce or as a ground for separation, these averments were at least relevant to shew the character of the husband's feelings towards his wife, and proof of them would assist the Court in judging of the truth of the charge of cruelty made against him.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I take the action of separation first, and the question is, not whether the conduct averred in the new article constitutes a case of cruel maltreatment falling under the terms of this summons. If that were the question, I confess that my opinion would be that it should be decided in the reclaimer's favour, because I cannot see how a case of suffering from the misconduct of the defender—which is the essential quality of cruelty—can be made out when the pursuer was unconscious of the misconduct in question. But that is not the question. The question is, whether this alleged conduct on the defender's part can have any bearing on the case of cruel maltreatment alleged on record. The suggestion is that the animus of the defender is necessarily in controversy, and in the question of how he treated his wife it may be material to know that he really was diverting his affection from his wife and had been tampering with this other woman. I do not think that the averment in question is so manifestly irrelevant that we should interfere with the manner in which the Lord Ordinary has exercised his discretion.

As regards the divorce case, it is clear that the same reasoning applies. The allegation against the husband is in that case made by way of defence, but its relevancy rests on substantially the same grounds, as the cruelty of the husband is the subject of investigation. Accordingly, I think we should refuse the reclaiming note.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

MRS MARGARET SIMPSON raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, for herself and as tutrix for her pupil children, against Burrell & Son, and John Paton, jointly and severally, for payment of damages on account of the death of her husband.

The pursuer alleged that her husband had been killed while in the employment of John Paton, who was a stevedore in Glasgow. Paton had been employed by Burrell & Son, who were the owners of the s.s. "Strathavon," to do some work in connection with that vessel, and had ordered the deceased to remove the hatch covers from the forehold. (Cond. 3) "After receiving this order the deceased went to the forehold of the said vessel to remove the hatch covers in order to get below. The hatch covers in said vessel are divided into two sections, which are supported by fore and aft and thwart-ship beams. These fore and aft and thwart-ship beams fit into sockets. While engaged taking off one of the covers of the hatch, the supports suddenly and without warning gave way, and the deceased was precipitated to the bottom of the hold, a distance of about 24 feet, and received such injuries that he shortly thereafter died." (Cond. 5) "The said accident was . . . caused through the fault of the . . . defender, Paton, in culpably failing to see (as was his duty before setting his men to work) that the ways and plant used by the deceased in the course of his employment were sufficient and in good order, in so far as the said thwart-ship beam was weak and bent, the said hatch covers were off the square and had not sufficient hold, and there was only one defective fore and after, in place of four strong fore and afters. It is usual, necessary, and safe in ships of the class in question for the stevedore to see that the ways and plant are in sufficient order before setting his men to work, to have the thwart-ship beam straight and of sufficient strength and length to support the fore and afters, and the covers in their places, to have the hatch covers fitted evenly and with sufficient hold of the supports, and to have four strong fore and afters supporting the covers. The said accident was also caused through defender Paton culpably ordering the deceased to remove the hatch covers. It was his duty as stevedore to remove said hatch covers, as is usual, necessary, and safe in vessels of this description at the Queen's Dock, Glasgow."

The defender Paton pleaded that the action was irrelevant.

On 7th February 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour), before answer, allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed to the First Division for jury trial.

The defender Paton objected to the relevancy of the action as against him, and argued;—A stevedore was not responsible for defects in a ship on which he was employed. No duty lay upon him to inspect the ship before ordering his men to start work.[1]

Argued for the pursuer;—It was the duty of a stevedore to see that the parts of a ship where his men were going to work were in proper order. The defects alleged were not latent. There was therefore a sufficient allegation of fault against the stevedore.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It seems to me to be clear that there is no case against the stevedore, there being no allegation of particular circumstances such as to impose on him the wide duty of examining the ship on which he was employed, and an entire absence of all grounds to constitute liability against him.

LORD ADAM.—I do not think that there is a stateable case against the stevedore.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree, and after the two cases which have been referred to I should have thought it hopeless, or at least unnecessary, to bring an action against a stevedore in respect of the insufficiency of the ship on which he was employed.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the action as against Paton, and approved an issue for trial of the case against Burrell & Son.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Responsibility of stevedore for defect in ship.—Held that a stevedore was not liable for injuries sustained by one of his servants in consequence of defects in the ship upon which the stevedore was employed, there being no particular circumstances to lay the duty of inspection upon him.

Nelson v. Scott, Croall & Sons, 19 R. 425; Robinson v. John Watson, Limited, 20 R. 144, followed.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

MRS MARGARET SIMPSON raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, for herself and as tutrix for her pupil children, against Burrell & Son, and John Paton, jointly and severally, for payment of damages on account of the death of her husband.

The pursuer alleged that her husband had been killed while in the employment of John Paton, who was a stevedore in Glasgow. Paton had been employed by Burrell & Son, who were the owners of the s.s. "Strathavon," to do some work in connection with that vessel, and had ordered the deceased to remove the hatch covers from the forehold. (Cond. 3) "After receiving this order the deceased went to the forehold of the said vessel to remove the hatch covers in order to get below. The hatch covers in said vessel are divided into two sections, which are supported by fore and aft and thwart-ship beams. These fore and aft and thwart-ship beams fit into sockets. While engaged taking off one of the covers of the hatch, the supports suddenly and without warning gave way, and the deceased was precipitated to the bottom of the hold, a distance of about 24 feet, and received such injuries that he shortly thereafter died." (Cond. 5) "The said accident was . . . caused through the fault of the . . . defender, Paton, in culpably failing to see (as was his duty before setting his men to work) that the ways and plant used by the deceased in the course of his employment were sufficient and in good order, in so far as the said thwart-ship beam was weak and bent, the said hatch covers were off the square and had not sufficient hold, and there was only one defective fore and after, in place of four strong fore and afters. It is usual, necessary, and safe in ships of the class in question for the stevedore to see that the ways and plant are in sufficient order before setting his men to work, to have the thwart-ship beam straight and of sufficient strength and length to support the fore and afters, and the covers in their places, to have the hatch covers fitted evenly and with sufficient hold of the supports, and to have four strong fore and afters supporting the covers. The said accident was also caused through defender Paton culpably ordering the deceased to remove the hatch covers. It was his duty as stevedore to remove said hatch covers, as is usual, necessary, and safe in vessels of this description at the Queen's Dock, Glasgow."

The defender Paton pleaded that the action was irrelevant.

On 7th February 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour), before answer, allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed to the First Division for jury trial.

The defender Paton objected to the relevancy of the action as against him, and argued;—A stevedore was not responsible for defects in a ship on which he was employed. No duty lay upon him to inspect the ship before ordering his men to start work.[1]

Argued for the pursuer;—It was the duty of a stevedore to see that the parts of a ship where his men were going to work were in proper order. The defects alleged were not latent. There was therefore a sufficient allegation of fault against the stevedore.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It seems to me to be clear that there is no case against the stevedore, there being no allegation of particular circumstances such as to impose on him the wide duty of examining the ship on which he was employed, and an entire absence of all grounds to constitute liability against him.

LORD ADAM.—I do not think that there is a stateable case against the stevedore.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree, and after the two cases which have been referred to I should have thought it hopeless, or at least unnecessary, to bring an action against a stevedore in respect of the insufficiency of the ship on which he was employed.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the action as against Paton, and approved an issue for trial of the case against Burrell & Son.

No. 113. THE GOVERNORS OF THE JONATHAN ANDERSON TRUST, Petitioners.—Jameson—Craigie.

Mar. 12, 1896. Governors of Jonathan Anderson Trust.

Charitable Trust—School—Alteration of scheme framed under Educational Endowments Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 59).—In a petition presented by the Governors of a charitable institution for the alteration of a scheme framed by the Educational Endowment Commissioners for the administration of the charity, the Court sanctioned a scheme for transferring the use of school buildings and funds applicable to teachers' salaries, which had hitherto been devoted to the free elementary education of poor children, to a school board for the sole purpose of providing efficient secondary education to which a certain number of poor children should be admitted without charge, secondary education being a purpose for which the school board was not entitled to levy rates.

Kirk-Session of Prestonpans v. School Board of Prestonpans, 19 R. 193, commented on.

1ST DIVISION. THE JONATHAN ANDERSON TRUST, Forres, held certain funds and estates bequeathed for educational purposes, since 1888. The Governors administered these under a scheme framed by the Commissioners under the Educational Endowment (Scotland) Act, 1882, which provided, inter alia, that it should be in the power of the Court of Session to alter the scheme upon application made to them with consent of the Scotch Education Department by the governing body or any person interested.

In October 1895 the Governors of the trust, with consent of the Scotch Education Department, presented a petition to the Court "to alter the provision of the scheme, dated 3d May 1888, and numbered 280 under the Education Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882, for the administration of the endowments known as Jonathan Anderson's Institution and Fraser's Bequest, as at 1st January 1896, in terms of the schedule hereto annexed." *

The petitioners stated that under the present scheme they maintained a school in the buildings of the Institution for the elementary education of children, and that since free education was now provided in the board schools it was unnecessary to continue to do so. They

* The schedule contained, inter alia, the following proposed alterations,—"(4) Section 27 of the scheme shall be cancelled, and the following section shall be substituted therefor:—'The Governors shall make over the use of the buildings of Jonathan Anderson's Institution, the playgrounds, teacher's house, outbuildings, and garden, to the School Board of the Burgh of Forres for educational purposes, and shall also pay over annually to the said board that portion of the revenues of the trust which, by section 27 of the said scheme hereby cancelled, is available for the salaries of teachers, and the said school board shall administer the same for that purpose with a special view to the establishment and maintenance of an efficient Secondary Department in connection with the Forres Public School.' (5) Sections 28 and 29 of the scheme shall be cancelled, and section 30 shall be amended by substituting for the first paragraph thereof the following paragraph:—'The school board shall admit into the Forres Public School, or any department thereof, without charge, a number of children (herein referred to as free scholars), not exceeding at any time one hundred, who shall be natives of or resident in the parish of Forres, Kinloss, or Rafford, and whose parents or guardians, not being in receipt of parochial relief, are in such circumstances as to require aid for providing elementary education. The Governors shall provide, without charge, such books, stationery, and other school material as may be necessary for the said free scholars in the said school, or any department thereof.' (The remainder of the section to remain as at present.)" [The remainder of the section provided for the selection of the free pupils by competitive examination.]

accordingly asked the Court to sanction amendments on the scheme to the effect of transferring the site of the school buildings and the management of the school to the School Board of the Burgh of Forres, and of transferring to them annually that portion of the revenues of the trust available for teachers' salaries, with a special view to the establishment and maintenance of an efficient Secondary Department in connection with the Forres Public School.

The Court remitted to Mr James A. Fleming, advocate, to inquire into the facts set forth in the petition, and to consider the proposed alteration of the scheme, and to report.

Extracts from Mr Fleming's report are given below.*

To obviate the objection taken by the reporter, the petitioners altered the concluding part of article 4 of their proposed amendments so as to read "and the said School Board shall administer the same solely for the establishment and maintenance of an efficient secondary department," and by substituting the word "secondary" for the word "elementary" in article 5, and moved the Court to grant the prayer of the petition as thus amended.

* "The primary object of the petitioners' scheme is to provide free elementary education for poor children in the parishes of Forres, Kinloss, and Rafford. With this object the petitioners are directed to carry on a school on the same lines and teaching the same subjects as a School Board, at which fees should be charged, except in the case of poor children. Now that elementary education is practically free, the petitioners find that their school provides no exceptional benefit for the favoured class, and results in overlapping and waste of teaching power and money. They, therefore, ask your Lordships to alter their scheme so as to enable them to apply the trust funds, so far as not required for providing elementary education for poor children, in providing secondary education in Forres. I venture to think that this alteration, due provision being made for giving a preference to poor children, would result in a much more beneficial employment of the trust funds than is possible at present, and is desirable.

"But I think that the method in which the petitioners propose to make this change is open to criticism. They propose that they should hand over to the Forres School Board their school with the use of their school buildings, and pay annually to them as much of the revenue of their endowments as has hitherto been expended in maintaining the school. In return for this the School Board is to give free education to poor children selected by the petitioners, and is to relieve the petitioners of all their powers, duties, and responsibilities as managers of the said school. This obligation on the School Board to give free education to poor children is merely nominal, as education is given free to all children in Forres, and it is difficult to see how it could be enforced, for the annual transfer of income to the School Board is not made conditional upon their obligation being duly fulfilled. A further consideration arises from the doubt whether such an application of these funds would not be truly in relief of rates. The School Board have already in operation a secondary department, and to allow charitable funds to be applied as proposed, to render this department more effective, seems to be a violation of the principle laid down in the Prestonpans case (Kirk Session v. School Board of Prestonpans, 19 R. 193). I would submit that it is inadvisable to divest the petitioners of their duties to such an extent and under such an arrangement. The petitioners state that they do not desire powers to carry on their own school as a secondary school, as, exclusive of Government grants, their income is quite insufficient, and such a change would simply continue the evil of overlapping in a worse form. . . ."

No. 113.

Mar. 12, 1896. Governors of Jonathan Anderson Trust.

Argued for the petitioners;—The Prestonpans[1] case was different. There the Court rejected a scheme, under which aid was to be given to elementary education, on the ground that the proposed application of the funds would virtually be in the relief of the rates. Here the funds were to be applied for the establishment and maintenance of secondary education, for which the ratepayers were not liable.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have a careful and useful report from Mr Fleming, and he has very properly called our attention to what at first sight seems a formidable objection to the proposed scheme. The petitioners, however, have now made an important amendment of the proposed scheme, in view of which I think that we may safely grant the prayer. By that amendment it is now made clear that the trust funds are to be administered "solely for the establishment and maintenance of an efficient secondary department in connection with the Forres Public School."

This being so, the moneys of this trust will, under the proposed scheme, in no way go in relief of the ratepayer. It is true that this "school board have already in operation a secondary department." But the school board, while it may quite well have such a department in operation, are not, in a fair exercise of their statutory powers, entitled to impose rates for its establishment or its maintenance, nor could they legitimately so administer the establishment, of which the secondary department forms part, as to make a deficit caused by the secondary department fall upon the ratepayers. Accordingly, I think that the amendment of the scheme enables it to escape the just criticism of the reporter.

I may add that the principle to which the reporter refers was only incidently illustrated in the Prestonpans case,[1] but it is of unquestionable soundness. If some educational or charitable purpose be one for which it is lawful to impose rates, or to the accomplishment of which public moneys are already dedicated, then it is plain that to give the money of a charitable trust to that purpose is not to further the purpose, which is already provided for, but to relieve the ratepayer or the taxpayer, as the case may be, who is by statute made the debtor in an obligation. The Court, if it were to make such application of trust money, would, under the guise of promoting a purpose which once depended on charity, be ignoring the facts that by legislation that purpose had passed out of the region of charity into that of obligation on the ratepayers, and that a charity devoted to the recipients of education is misapplied, if devoted to the givers of education, whether voluntary or compulsory.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT granted the petition as amended.

Marquis v. Prentice.

Lease—Long Lease—Destination—Vesting—Succession—Conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit.—Certain subjects were leased for 950 years to A. P., "and his heirs as after mentioned," and failing him "then the whole subjects to and in liferent only to the present wife of the said A. P. . . . and after the death of the said spouses . . . then to the children of their marriage equally between them, share and share alike, in fee."

A. P. was survived by his wife. Three children of their marriage were alive at the date of the lease, of whom two survived their father.

Held in a competition as to the right to the lease on the death of the widow, that the right to the lease, subject to the widow's liferent, had vested on the death of the father in the two children then alive to the extent of one half each, and that a daughter of the third child who had predeceased that date had no right, as the conditio si sine liberis did not apply, the lease having been granted by a stranger to the family, and not as a parental provision.

BY lease dated 12th July and 17th September 1845, entered into between Lord Belhaven and Stenton and Alexander Prentice, residing at Beltonfoot of Wishaw, Lord Belhaven and Stenton "let and in tack and assedation set to the said Alexander Prentice and his heirs as after mentioned, but always with and under the burden of the liferent of Cecilia Haddow or Prentice his mother, to the extent of one third of the subjects after described, during all the days of her natural life, and failing both the said Cecilia Haddow and the said Alexander Prentice, then the whole subjects to and in liferent only to the present wife of the said Alexander Prentice during the days and years she may continue his widow allenarly, and after the death of the said spouses, or re-marriage of the present wife of said Alexander Prentice, then to the children of their marriage, equally between them, share and share alike, in fee," certain subjects in Wishaw. The endurance of the lease was "for the whole time and space of 950 years from and after the term of Martinmas 1844," which was declared to have been the term of entry; and Prentice bound and obliged himself, "and his heirs and successors herein," to pay £1, 1s. of yearly rent or tack duty.

Prentice entered into possession of the subjects let and possessed them under the lease until his death. The lease was not registered under the Registration of Long Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 26). At the date of the lease Prentice had three children alive, Cecilia, William, and Margaret.

Prentice died on 5th November 1877, intestate. He was predeceased by his mother, and by his daughter Margaret, and he was survived by his wife and by two children, Cecilia and William.

Mrs Prentice, the widow, died on 17th July 1895, without having married again. After her death questions arose as to the persons entitled to the lease under the clause in favour of the children of the marriage, and a special case was presented. The questions raised depended on the following state of the family.

Of the two children who survived their father, one, Mrs Cecilia Prentice or Marquis, survived her mother and was the first party to the case; the other, William Prentice, predeceased his mother and was survived by a son Alexander Prentice, who was the second party to the case. The child who predeceased her father, Mrs Margaret Prentice or Macdonald, was survived by a daughter, Mrs Jessie Macdonald or Halbert, who was the third party to the case.

The first party maintained that as the only child of the marriage who was alive at the date of the death of the widow, she alone was entitled to succeed to the lease, in virtue of the destination therein. Alternatively, she claimed that she and the second party were entitled to succeed to the lease jointly between them, in respect that the right of succession to the lease fell to be determined as at the date of the death of their father, the original lessee, and that at that date the only children of the marriage alive were the first party and the father of the second party.

The second party as heir-at-law of his father, claimed to be entitled to succeed to the lease jointly with the first party, or to the extent of one half.

The third party maintained, that under the destination in the lease she was entitled to succeed to the extent of one third, along with the first and second parties.

The questions of law were:—"1. (a) Is the first party, the said Mrs Cecilia Prentice or Marquis, entitled to succeed to the said lease to the exclusion of the second and third parties? or (b) Are the first and second parties entitled to succeed to the said lease jointly, or to the extent of a half each? 2. Is the third party, the said Mrs Jessie Macdonald or Halbert, entitled to succeed to the said lease to the extent of one-third, or jointly with the first and second parties?"

Argued for the first party;—The deed here was a contract of lease, and was to be construed as other ordinary contracts were construed. It was not a testamentary or a quasi-testamentary deed, and it conferred no rights on third parties. The landlord and the tenant might have agreed to terminate it if and when they pleased. It made no difference that the lease was one of extraordinary duration; what the effect of registration under the Registration of Long Leases Act, 1857, might have been it was unnecessary to inquire; this lease had not been so registered. The question was—who were entitled to take up the lease under the clause in favour of the children of the marriage, on the death of the widow, the prior tenant? The natural answer was, the child or children, if any, who were then alive. But it was said by the second party that as the widow was liferenter only, the right of fee must have vested on the death of the father, because otherwise the fee would be in pendente from the death of the father till the death of the widow. The importation of this principle of the law of fee and liferent into a contract of lease, was wholly illegitimate. A tenant who was described as liferenter did not differ in any essential particular from a tenant who was described as fiar. A fiar might have larger powers of assignation than the liferenter, but in so far as the actual tenancy was concerned the liferenter occupied the subjects and paid the rent, and the fiar could do no more. There was thus no fee to be filled during the tenancy of the widow, for the landlord got all that he contracted for—a tenant who paid the rent.[1] No right therefore vested in the children until her death.[2] Just as foreign to the construction of ordinary contracts was the principle of the conditio si sine liberis, to which the third party appealed. That principle, primarily a rule of implied or presumed intention in the construction of testamentary deeds, no doubt appeared to have been extended to deeds of a quasi-testamentary, although contractual, character; but to import it into the construction of ordinary contracts between strangers was inconsistent with the settled rules for the construction of contracts. In any case the principle had no application here, for this lease was not a family provision,[1] and the children were substitutes.[2] The word "children" in the lease ought to receive its natural meaning of immediate issue. Even in testamentary deeds that was the general rule; the case of Rankin[3] appeared to be the only reported example to the contrary.

Argued for the second party;—On a sound construction of the lease the right of fee vested in the children of the marriage who were alive at the death of their father. Nothing vested in the children prior to that date, because the father was in possession of the subjects as fiar, but vesting took place then, and not at the death of the widow, because the fee had to be filled. The widow's liferent was a mere burden on the children's right of fee; just as their grandmother's liferent had been on their father's right.

Argued for the third party;—The children of Alexander Prentice, the lessee, who were in existence at the date when the lease was granted took a vested right under the lease, which their father could not have defeated. It was as if their names had been inserted in the lease. Had they been mentioned by name in the lease, their right would have been clear.[4] The lease had not been registered, but possession under it was equivalent to registration. The third party's claim therefore to a one-third share of the lease was well founded. At all events her claim ought to be sustained on the ground that the conditio si sine liberis applied. It was not an answer to her that this was not a general family settlement; the conditio had been held applicable to legacies.[5] Nor was it an answer that the lease was not a testamentary deed; the conditio had been held to apply to marriage-contracts and to bonds of provision.[6] Looking to the terms of the destination and the whole character of the lease, it was ejusdem generis with such deeds.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—In arriving at a determination upon the questions here submitted to us, I think there are two things to be kept especially in view: first the character of the deed in which the destination to be construed occurs, and second, the person by whom that deed is granted.

The deed is a lease whereby certain lands are let for a period of 950 years to the late Mr Prentice. The language of the deed in some respects is inappropriate, and would more suitably have been used in a disposition or conveyance of land rather than in a lease. The language of the deed however, such as it is, is sufficient to make quite clear what the granter of it meant and did. He leased to Mr Prentice "and his heirs as after mentioned" the subjects there described; provided that on Mr Prentice's death his widow (during viduity) should enjoy the subjects in liferent only, and on her death "then to the children of their marriage equally between them, share and share alike, in fee." Under such a destination the real right conferred by the lease vested at once in Mr Prentice, and on his death vested in the children of the marriage then alive, subject to the burden of the widow's liferent. The children of the marriage surviving at Mr Prentice's death were two in number—the first party to the case (Mrs Marquis) and William Prentice, the father of the second party. The right which vested in William Prentice descended to the second party, who was William Prentice's eldest son and heir-at-law. The third party is the daughter of a child of Alexander Prentice who predeceased her father, and in whom no right had vested at her death. The third party therefore cannot claim as representing her mother under the destination in question, for nothing vested in her mother; and the destination to "children of the marriage" as matter of destination does not include grandchildren. The third party, however, maintains that, notwithstanding this, she is entitled to a share of the subjects on the implied conditio si sine liberis, and I think this view is excluded by the fact (1) that the deed is granted by a stranger to the family, and (2) that the deed was not granted, and is not said to have been granted, as a parental provision.

Accordingly I think the second branch of the first question should be answered in the affirmative, to the effect that the first and second parties are entitled to the lease to the extent of one-half each. The second question I would answer in the negative.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT answered the second alternative of the first question by declaring that the first and second parties were entitled to succeed to the lease to the extent of a half each, and answered the second question in the negative, and found and declared accordingly, and decerned.

issue, I hereby direct my trustees to divide amongst the issue of each of my said daughters," one-third of the foresaid sum of £36,000. A, one of the daughters, who survived the testator, died leaving two children, and predeceased by two other children, who had survived the testator, but had died childless. Held that the gift to the issue of the daughters did not vest until the death of the daughters respectively, and consequently that the representatives of the predeceasing issue of A took nothing.

2D DIVISION.

THOMAS FAIR, residing at Woodlands, near Edinburgh, died in 1865, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 5th September 1862, by the fifth purpose of which he directed that his trustees should "within five years from the period of my decease invest on good heritable or other eligible security the sum of £30,000 sterling, and pay the interest or annual profits thereof from the date of such investment equally to each of my daughters Margaret Fair or Spence, Harriot Fair or Macaulay, and Mary Jane Fair or Thomas, during all the days of their lives, respectively and allenarly . . . and on the death of my said daughters respectively leaving lawful issue, I hereby direct my trustees to divide equally amongst the issue of each of my said daughters the sum of £10,000 sterling, being one-third of the sum directed to be invested as aforesaid, and should any of my said daughters die before the succession to the foresaid provisions opens up to them, without leaving lawful issue, the share of the interest or annual profits of the said sum of £30,000 sterling directed to be invested as aforesaid, to which my daughter so dying would have been entitled had she survived, shall be divided equally, share and share alike, between my surviving daughters, or paid to the last surviving daughter during all the days of their lives or of her life allenarly, and the share of the said capital sum of £30,000 sterling, which would have fallen to be divided equally amongst the issue (if any) of my daughter so dying shall be divided equally between the issue of my surviving daughters, or should there only be one surviving daughter having issue, to be paid equally to such issue." The testator left the residue of his estate to his sons.

By codicil dated 1st March 1865 the sum to be liferented in terms of the fifth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement was increased from £30,000 to £36,000, and "the sum to be divided equally amongst the issue of each of my said daughters shall be £12,000 sterling instead of £10,000 sterling."

The testator was survived by his three daughters named in the settlement.

Mrs Macaulay, one of the daughters, died on 16th February 1895. She was survived by two daughters, Mrs Garland and Mrs Kinmont, and was predeceased by a son Thomas Fair Macaulay, and by a daughter Mrs Hickling. Both Thomas Fair Macaulay and Mrs Hickling survived the testator, and neither of them left issue.

In these circumstances a special case was presented for determination, inter alia, of the question whether a share in the fee of the £12,000 liferented by Mrs Macaulay had vested in Thomas Fair Macaulay and Mrs Hickling.

Mr Fair's trustees were the first parties to the special case.

The second, third, seventh, and eighth parties were the representatives of Mrs Macaulay's surviving daughters, Mrs Garland and Mrs Kinmont. These parties maintained that no share of the £12,000 had vested in Thomas Fair Macaulay and Mrs Hickling, and consequently that that sum fell to Mrs Garland and Mrs Kinmont equally.

No. 115.

Mar. 12, 1896. Garland's Trustees v. Macaulay's Executors.

The fourth parties were the executors of the Rev. George Macaulay, Thomas Fair Macaulay's father (who had died on 22d March 1895), and as such among the representatives of Thomas Fair Macaulay, who had died intestate; and the fifth and sixth parties were respectively the marriage-contract trustees and the testamentary trustees of Mrs Hickling. These parties maintained that a right to a one-fourth share in the £12,000 liferented by Mrs Macaulay had vested in each of Thomas Fair Macaulay and Mrs Hickling.

Argued for the second, third, seventh, and eighth parties;—The period of vesting in the children and the period of division were intended to be coincident, and consequently nothing vested in the children until the death of their mother, when the division was appointed to take place. The gift to the children was conditional on Mrs Macaulay, their mother, "leaving" children; if she left no children there was no effectual gift of the fee. The only gift was a direction to divide among the issue of Mrs Macaulay if she died "leaving" issue. It was thus a gift which was conditional on the occurrence of an event which might never occur, and that postponed vesting. Children who did not survive Mrs Macaulay were consequently excluded. The construction on the other side treated the words "leaving issue" as equivalent to "having issue," and that was the same thing as treating the words "leaving issue" pro non scriptis, for the gift to Mrs Macaulay's children was necessarily conditional on her having children.

Argued for the fifth and sixth parties;—On a sound construction of the fifth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement the fee vested in the issue of the daughters respectively a morte testatoris, or as soon thereafter as issue were born to the particular daughter. Where there was a direction to divide among the children of a liferenter as a class at the death of the liferenter, there was a strong presumption that the whole children of the liferenter took (if they survived the testator) whether they survived the liferenter or not. The language of the will must be very clear before the Court would infer that it was a condition of the gift to the children that they should survive the liferenter, the general presumption being for vesting a morte testatoris, and there being nothing in reason to warrant the supposition that the testator intended the children to take or not to take according to the accident of their survivance or predecease of the liferenter. Here the natural construction of the deed did not lead to the inference that survivance of their mother was a condition of the gift to Mrs Macaulay's children. No doubt the gift began "on the death of my said daughters leaving lawful issue," but the condition of survivance was not imported into the actual words of gift; the direction was to divide among "the issue" without qualification—it was not a direction to divide among "such" issue, for example. This construction of similar clauses had frequently been adopted by the Courts in England, where also the words "leaving issue" had been construed as equivalent to "having issue," if that reasonably appeared to be the intention of the testator.[1]

If then the gift was to "the issue" of Mrs Macaulay, it was immaterial that the only words of gift were contained in the direction to divide at her death. Such a form of gift was material if there was uncertainty as to the persons in whose favour the division was to take place—if there was a destination over, for example;[1] but where there was no uncertainty as to the persons or class of persons to be benefited, the direction to divide was a direction as to the date of payment only, and had no effect on vesting.[2] The construction contended for by the present parties logically led, it might be, to the result that even if all Mrs Macaulay's children had predeceased her, their representatives would nevertheless have taken, but there was nothing unreasonable in such a result.

The fourth parties adopted the argument for the fifth and sixth parties.

LORD YOUNG.—The question before us is one of vesting under the fifth provision of the will of the late Mr Thomas Fair. That provision is—"On the death of my said daughters respectively, leaving lawful issue, I hereby direct my trustees to divide equally amongst the issue of each of my said daughters the sum of £10,000 sterling." There were three daughters, and to each of these he gave a liferent of £10,000, or £30,000 in all. This was afterwards increased to £36,000, giving £12,000 to each daughter and her issue. One of the daughters, Mrs Macaulay, died in February 1895, leaving two daughters. She had had another daughter, Mrs Hickling, who was married and had died without issue sometime before her mother, and the question is whether this daughter is one of the issue entitled to a share of the £12,000 appointed to be divided by the clause of the settlement to which I have just referred. That question depends, as I have stated, entirely and exclusively upon the construction of that clause.

I may say at once that I attach no importance to the view which was suggested that the meaning of this clause is affected by the fact that the word "issue," when it occurs for the second time in the clause, is not preceded by the word "such."

It was suggested to us by Mr Mackay that the benefit of the provision is not limited to the issue "left," in the ordinary sense of that expression, by the deceasing daughter, but extended to her whole issue whether surviving her or not. I think that the meaning of the clause as employed by a Scotch conveyancer is to create a provision in favour of issue surviving the deceasing daughter, and not a provision in favour of issue predeceasing the deceasing daughter. If it did apply to issue predeceasing it would apply in the case which I put to Mr Mackay. Suppose a daughter should have died who was not survived by two children, but was survived by none, but who had a son or a daughter who had predeceased her by any number of years, is this a provision in favour of the creditors or of the legatees or disponees of such predeceasing child? I put that case to Mr Mackay and he accepted it as a fair test of the argument, and maintained that if the argument was good for anything it was good for this, that the trustees or the creditors of the sole predeceasing child of the daughter would take the fee of the whole provision liferented by the daughter. I am of opinion that that is not so, that that is contrary to the import of the words, and contrary to the construction which we must put upon them.

I should desire to guard myself against expressing any opinion now as to the case of a child predeceasing her mother and leaving lawful issue of her own. I say nothing as to whether, in such a case, upon the conditio si sine liberis, or upon some analogous principle of law, such grandchildren of the testator would take in the same way as children. It is a provision by a father in favour of his daughters and the issue of his daughters, and it may be a question whether that would take the fee not merely to the issue of a daughter but to the issue of the issue of a daughter. There is, however, nothing of that kind here. There is no question of issue having right according to the presumed will of the testator as coming in place of a deceased parent.

My opinion is that under this provision no one is entitled to share in the division of the fund which Mrs Macaulay liferented except the issue which she left. I do not attach any importance to the word "divide," because if she had left only one child that child would have taken the whole. In my opinion there was no vesting a morte testatoris in the children of Mrs Macaulay, and the right to participate in the division of the money liferented by her was exclusively in the children who survived her—the date of her death being the date of vesting. I am of opinion, therefore, that your Lordships should answer the questions accordingly.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT answered the questions now reported to the effect that no right in the £12,000 liferented by Mrs Macaulay had vested in Thomas Fair Macaulay or Mrs Hickling.

Held that dues levied under the charter of a royal burgh on cattle, horses, &c., passing through the ancient royalty to and from markets within portions of the burgh added under the powers of the General Police Act, 1862, were within the definition of causeway-mail in section 3 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, and were therefore illegal under section 33 of that Act.

2D DIVISION.
LdStormonth-Darling.

IN January 1894 James Graham, farmer, Scone's Lethendy, by Perth, raised an action against the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Perth, and against James Dunbar, Thomas Mackenzie, and John Malcolm, all of Perth, tacksmen of the customs of the burgh, concluding for declarator that the defenders "have no legal right or title to ask, crave, demand, exact, or levy from the pursuer any duty, custom, or impost whatever upon any animals, commodities, or goods in respect of their being sold, or exposed for sale, or purchased by him at the auction markets kept by Messrs Macdonald, Fraser, & Company, Limited, live stock salesmen, Perth, situated at Caledonian Road and Glasgow Road, Perth, and the auction market kept by Messrs John Swan & Sons, live stock salesmen, Perth, and situated at Newtown, Perth, or upon any animals, commodities, or goods in respect of their being imported by the pursuer into or exported by him from any of the said auction markets." There was also a conclusion for interdict.

Two minutes of admission by the parties disclosed the following facts:—

From time immemorial and in virtue of a charter granted by King James VI., dated 15th November 1600,* the Magistrates and Town-

The authorised ancient translation of this clause was as follows—"All and Whole our said royal burgh of Perth . . . together with the yearly rents of the roods of land and burgage farms, tolls, and small customs of the ports of our said burgh of Perth, and all things transported thereat, commodities, privileges, and casualties of the samen and of the said port, and transported to fairs and markets, ways, and streets thereof, with the pynorie and gait dichting, with the timber and timber market used and wont, and all customs and exactions collected and

Council of Perth had been in use to levy dues and customs, in respect of the sale of animals, commodities, and goods within the royalty of the burgh as described in the charter, in terms of the "Customs Tables of the Ports of Perth," which tables were altered and explained by successive Acts of Council, the last of such Acts being dated 4th November 1816; and also to levy the dues and customs set forth in the tables in respect of goods, articles, animals, matters, and things brought into or carried out of the royalty.

The boundaries of the burgh were extended in 1839 by and for the purposes of an Act (2 Vict. cap. xliii.) for more effectually paving the streets of the city of Perth, for the better lighting, watching, and cleansing the said city and suburbs thereof, for maintaining and regulating the police of the same, and for other purposes relating thereto.

The boundaries were again extended in 1866, and again in 1889, under the powers contained in the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,* and the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Supplemental Act, 1865 (28 Vict. cap. 7).

One of the auction markets of Messrs Macdonald, Fraser, & Company mentioned in the summons, which was opened in 1875, was wholly without the boundaries of the ancient royalty, but was within the boundaries as extended in 1839. The other auction market of Messrs Macdonald, Fraser, & Company, and the auction market of Messrs Swan & Sons, both of which were opened in 1885, were wholly without the boundaries of the ancient royalty, and also without the boundaries as extended in 1839, but were within the boundaries as extended in 1866.

In the action the defenders averred that the markets in question were within the burgh of Perth in the meaning of the charter, and claimed "right to exact customs on the horses, cattle, &c., purchased and sold by the pursuer at the said auction markets, in respect of such purchase or sale, and that notwithstanding the fact that the said auction markets are beyond the limits of the said ancient burgh"; and they further claimed to exact the customs or dues exigible in respect of animals, &c. brought into or taken out of the ancient royalty, averring "that all animals, &c., passing to or from the said markets come within the ancient royalty," and that "the pursuer, in common with other persons liable, has paid these customs dues over a long period of years."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The auction markets before specified being beyond the limits within which the defenders have right to accustomed to be collected by whatsoever person or persons for whatsoever kind of things or goods carried to the streets of our said burgh of Perth that the same may be sold there."

* The Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101), secs. 11 to 14, contains provisions under which, where a royal burgh is within the boundaries of a Parliamentary burgh, the boundaries of such royal burgh may be extended to the Parliamentary boundaries, section 13 being as follows:—"If the Sheriff shall grant the prayer of the petition, he shall issue a deliverance to that effect on the petition, and such deliverance shall be final, and when recorded along with the petition in the Sheriff Court books of the county, the Parliamentary boundaries aforesaid shall thereafter be the boundaries of the royal burgh for all municipal purposes and all matters connected with police, including the right of voting for town-councillors."

exact the said customs, decree of declarator and interdict ought to be granted as concluded for, with expenses in the event of opposition. (2) The defenders are not entitled to levy customs upon the pursuer's goods passing through the burgh of Perth, on their way to or from any of the said auction markets, such charges being causeway-mail, and being abolished by the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878."*

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The defenders being, in virtue of their charter and immemorial usage, entitled to levy dues on all goods and others brought into, or carried out of, or passing through the burgh of Perth or any portion thereof, in terms of their customs' table, they are entitled to levy such dues from the pursuer, and ought to be assoilzied from the conclusions of this action. (3) The premises of the said Messrs Macdonald, Fraser, & Co., Ltd., and Messrs John Swan & Sons, being situated within the burgh of Perth referred to in said charter, or at least being so situated that goods, &c., cannot be taken to or brought from the same without passing over said burgh or a part thereof, goods, &c., brought into the burgh thereto, or carried out of the burgh therefrom, are liable in the customs exigible under said charter and customs' table. (4) The premises of the said Messrs Macdonald, Fraser, & Co., Ltd., and Messrs John Swan & Sons, being situated within the extended area of the burgh of Perth, goods and others brought into the burgh thereto or carried out of the burgh therefrom, are liable in the customs exigible under said charter and customs' table, and the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

The minutes of admission disclosed the following further facts:—"The pursuer was in the habit of buying and selling horses, cattle, &c., at the auction markets in question. All goods and animals purchased or sold by him at these auction markets, and coming from, or going to, his farm of Scone's Lethendy, by way of Perth Bridge, passed through or across some portion of the ancient royalty before entering or after leaving the auction markets. One of the auction markets belonging to Messrs Macdonald, Fraser, & Co., was so situated that animals could not be brought in, or taken out, without passing through some part of the ancient royalty.

"The tacksmen of customs have not always confined themselves to collecting customs on goods as they enter or pass out of the ancient burgh; on the contrary, they have even before the establishment of

* The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 51), enacts, section 33, that "from and after, at latest, 1st June 1883, all tolls within such county and within any burgh wholly or partly situated therein, shall be abolished," and further, that "all causeway-mail shall be abolished within any burgh from and after the fifteenth day of May first occurring not less than four years after the commencement of this Act in the county within which such burgh is situated or partly situated," and in any case "from and after the fifteenth day of May 1887."

Sec. 3 then defines causeway-mail,—"Causeway-mail shall include through customs and all exactions of whatever kind, and also any sum or duty payable or leviable in lieu or satisfaction thereof, or in respect of any exemption therefrom, other than tolls or assessments made or which may be made in respect of the use of or passage over the streets or roads within any burgh, but shall not include petty customs or any sum or duty as aforesaid, except in so far as they are exacted, payable, or leviable in respect of goods, articles, things, or animals passing or carried through such burgh."

said auction markets, collected custom at places outside the ancient royalty on goods and live stock entering the burgh. The town of Perth, or at all events the tacksmen, . . . with the sanction of the town of Perth, . . . immediately after the marts of Messrs Macdonald, Fraser, & Co., were erected in the years 1875 and 1885, and John Swan & Sons, in the year 1885 respectively, set up collecting boxes far beyond the ancient burgh limits, and there without challenge collected customs on stock, &c., which entered the extended area and passed to the marts, or came from the marts and passed out of the extended area by traversing roads and streets within the extended area, but wholly outside the ancient burgh. Said boxes were erected with the view of preventing parties escaping the payment of customs by using the side roads, or by passing over fields, or in any other way." Custom was with some exceptions regularly paid on stock, &c., brought into or taken out of the markets in question, down to the year 1892. "The defenders do not levy any custom which is specially appropriated to goods or animals purchased, sold, or exposed for sale in said auction markets. . . . The defenders have never attempted to collect customs from the pursuer except upon such animals, goods, &c., as pass one or other of the said collecting boxes."

"All goods or animals purchased within, and taken out of the ancient royalty, as also goods and animals brought within the ancient royalty and sold there, have always without objection been treated as liable in customs"; but the parties were agreed "that custom was not charged on goods, animals, &c., entering the Burgh Muir (or roads leading from the burgh thereto) and not passing through the burgh. The tenants of the customs of Perth have been in the practice for at least forty years of collecting custom from residents in the Burgh Muir, which is part of the royalty of the burgh of Perth and the said roads leading thereto, as if they were strangers."

On 22d January 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, decerns, and declares, and interdicts, prohibits, discharges, and decerns in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—The purpose of this action is to establish that the persons making use of three auction markets in the city of Perth, which were opened in the years 1875 and 1885, are exempt from every kind of custom or impost leviable by the magistrates upon animals or goods in respect either of their being exposed for sale at, or their being carried to or from, any of these auction markets.

"The material facts are ascertained by admission of parties, and the questions of law arising thereon are two in number—(1) Whether the right to levy petty customs under the charter of King James VI., dated 15th November 1600, has been extended beyond the ancient royalty of the burgh; and (2) whether the right to levy anything of the nature of a transit due even within the ancient royalty falls under the definition of causeway-mail, and, as such, is abolished by the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878.

"The boundaries of Perth have been extended more than once under the powers contained in the Police and Improvement Act of 1862, and the auction markets in question are situated outside the ancient royalty, but within the extended area. If the right to levy customs outside the ancient royalty has been conferred on the defenders, it can only be by virtue of the Act of 1862. Now the Act from beginning to end says nothing about petty customs. But the defenders profess to discover this important addition to their taxing powers in the section which provides that the new boundaries shall, after the Sheriff has issued his deliverance, 'be the boundaries of the

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—Petty customs were admittedly leviable within the ancient royalty, and it was inequitable that they should not also be leviable within the added portions of the burgh, for petty customs were part of the common good of a burgh, given to enable the burgh to perform its public functions,[1] and the added portions, which enjoyed the benefit, ought also to contribute to the cost. The power of assessment did not cover all expenses which a burgh had to incur. Under the 13th clause of the General Police Act, 1862, the area added under the powers of that Act was included in the burgh for "all municipal purposes." That expression was sufficient to extend the right to levy petty customs in the added portions of the burgh. The right did not require to be conferred per expressum. Royal burghs in general possessed the right to levy petty customs, and the Legislature must be presumed to have known this, and, in extending the burgh, to have extended the rights of the corporation. The charter was a habile title upon which to acquire right to levy petty customs over a new area. The measure of such rights royal burgh for all municipal purposes, and all matters connected with police, including the right of voting for town-councillors.'

"An interesting constitutional argument was addressed to me on the incompetence of Parliament to deal with the prerogatives or patrimony of the Crown without the Crown's antecedent consent. This argument assumes that, when the Crown gave out the right to levy customs within the burgh of Perth, it retained the right to levy customs outside the burgh, and that this right was part of its prerogative or patrimony which Parliament could not touch. I hardly think that so high a view of the Crown's right is consistent with the historical fact that, by the Act 1424, cap. 8, and again by the Act 1455, cap. 41, 'all the great and small customs and burrow mails of the realm' were conferred on the Crown by Parliament, and that Parliament was constantly in the habit of ratifying the charters which the Crown granted to royal burghs.

"But it seems to me unnecessary to consider this constitutional question, because even if it be assumed that it was within the competence of Parliament to confer the right of levying customs within the extended area, I do not think that the Act of 1862 has done so. The truth is that petty customs are part and parcel of an obsolete system of burgh administration. On the one side was the duty of watching and warding, of erecting courthouses and jails, of providing and regulating markets, and of maintaining streets. On the other side were the privileges of exclusive trading, the enjoyment of burgh property, and the right of imposing dues on those who frequented the markets and used the streets. But with the abolition of exclusive trading, and the institution of assessments on property for all municipal purposes, a new state of things was introduced. And it is not to be assumed that Parliament in 1862 intended by any but the most express words to apply to new areas a kind of impost so little in harmony with the modern scheme of municipal government. I answer the first question, then, in favour of the pursuer.

"On the second question I think he is also entitled to prevail. I do not doubt that, under the charter of King James, and the usage instructed by the 'Customs Table of the Ports of Perth,' the defenders, for more than two centuries and a half, lawfully imposed certain dues in respect of animals driven through the ancient royalty, altogether irrespective of their being offered for sale. But the right to do so was brought to an end by section 33 of the Roads and Bridges Act, the purpose of which was to abolish all exacwas the usage which had followed the grant of the right.[1] Here from 1839 down to 1892 there had been the unquestioned practice of levying petty customs in the new areas as they were successively added. In any view the defenders were entitled to levy dues on the pursuer's animals—as these animals passed into the ancient royalty on their way to the markets. Such dues were petty customs, not causeway-mail, which was a tax on vehicles, not on goods.[2] The definition in section 3 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, was said to be more extensive. Assuming that it was, it abolished only dues levied in respect of goods or animals "passing or carried through such burgh." Here the animals did not pass "through" the burgh, for they went to a market which was within the burgh, and there were sold. Burgh in the Act meant burgh as then existing,—that was, the extended burgh when a burgh had been extended.

Argued for the pursuer;—The General Police Act of 1862 in authorising the extension of the area of royal burghs "for all municipal purposes" did not thereby authorise the magistrates of such extended burghs to levy petty customs in the added portions. The right to levy petty customs was a patrimonial right, not a municipal purpose. Petty customs were part of the Crown patrimony, and the Crown might confer a grant of petty customs on a burgh, but there was no necessary connection between the area of the burgh and the right to levy the customs; they might or might not be coextensive.[3] The burgh of Perth itself illustrated that, for the Burgh Muir, though within the ancient royalty, was extra-burghal in the matter of petty customs. There was therefore no ground for inferring an extension of the right to levy petty customs from an extension of the area of a burgh, and the presumption was against the extension of such methods of taxation, which were out of harmony with modern ideas. Petty customs were the patrimony of the Crown, which could not be diminished by Act of Parliament to which the antecedent consent of the Crown had not been given, as it had not to the 13th section of the Act of 1862. In any view prescription was out of the case, for the earliest of the markets in question was opened only in 1875. The defenders' argument on the Roads and Bridges Act was barely stateable; if the dues were not causeway-mail in the sense of that Act, they were tolls, and as such were abolished.

tions of the nature of tolls. I do not know whether, apart from the statute, the transit dues exacted by the defenders would have fallen under the description of 'causeway-mail,' but clearly the interpretation clause is sufficient to cover them. Nothing can be more searching than the provision that 'causeway-mail shall include through customs and all exactions of whatever kind . . . made or which may be made in respect of the use of or passage over the streets or roads within any burgh, but shall not include petty customs . . . except in so far as they are exacted, payable, or leviable in respect of goods, articles, things, or animals passing or carried through such burgh.' I confess I think that this part of the case is too clear for argument."

Mar. 12, 1896. Graham v. Magistrates of Perth.

LORD YOUNG.—The auction markets referred to in the summons are situated outside the boundaries of the ancient burgh of Perth, but within the boundaries of that burgh as extended under the powers contained in the Police and Improvement Act of 1862. The Magistrates and Council had, and I assume have, right to exact customs and imposts of the character referred to in the summons and record within the boundaries of the ancient burgh. The question decided by the Lord Ordinary and argued to us is, whether the right was extended by the extension of the boundaries under the powers of the Act of 1862. There is no case averred of extension by ancient and established use and wont.

The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the Act of 1862 does not authorise an extension of the right of burgh magistrates to exact customs or imposts of the kind here in question, and that an enlargement of burgh boundaries does not import such extension. He thinks the words "for all municipal purposes and all matters connected with police, including the right of voting for town-councillors," do not include an ancient royal grant of right to levy customs such as probably could not and certainly would not be granted now. He assumes that burgh authorities have by modern legislation sufficient taxing powers to meet any increase of expenditure which may be rendered necessary or proper by an enlargement of boundaries under the Act, and that there is no reasonable ground for implying the intention of Parliament to give any others. I concur in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

I also concur with his Lordship in his opinion and decision to the effect that the fact that animals or goods pass through a part of the ancient burgh on their way to or from the auction markets outside (assuming the fact to be so) does not subject them to the customs or imposts in question.

The result is that in my opinion the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator substantially as concluded for. I think, however, that the conclusion for interdict is not only superfluous but quite out of place.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find and declare that the defenders the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-council of Perth, and the defenders their tacksmen have no right to exact from the pursuer any duty, custom, or impost upon animals, commodities, or goods in respect of their being sold or exposed for sale, or purchased by him at the auction markets, 'mentioned in the summons,' or upon animals, commodities, or goods in respect of their being imported by the pursuer into, or exported by him from, any of the said auction markets: Further, dismiss the conclusion for interdict: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

Game—Construction of interlocutor declaring a right of fowling over lands belonging to another person—Extent of privilege—Right to let shooting—Res Judicata—Heritable Right—Servitude.—In 1808 Innes, proprietor of Ballogie, was infeft in that estate cum privilegio et libertate aucupandi in the Forest of Birse, which belonged to the Earl of Aboyne. By a judgment of the Court of Session in 1812, affirmed by the House of Lords in 1819, in an action by the Earl against Innes, it was found that the liberty and privilege of fowling was "a franchise conferred as a heritable right rendered an appendage to the property of Ballogie," and further, "that the said privilege may lawfully be exercised by the defender personally, or by his gamekeeper duly authorised for that purpose, or by any qualified friends whom he may permit, whether his tenants on Ballogie or not, or whether the defender be personally present or not, but always in such way and manner as not to be abusively exercised or encroach unreasonably on or absorb the general right of fowling as well as hunting belonging to the pursuer over the said forest."

In 1896, in an action at the instance of the Marquis of Huntly, a successor of the Earl of Aboyne, to have the right of Ballogie defined, held that under the interlocutor of 1812 Ballogie was entitled, inter alia, (1) to let his right of shooting in the forest to any persons whether they were or were not tenants on Ballogie; and (2) to sell the game killed by him for sport.

This action was raised in May 1895 by the Marquis of Huntly and others against William Edward Nicol, proprietor of the estate of Ballogie (formerly called Tilliesnaught), for the purpose of having defined a certain sporting right which Ballogie enjoyed over the Forest of Birse, belonging to the Marquis of Huntly.†

About the beginning of the present century Mr Lewis Innes, the then proprietor of Ballogie, having asserted a right of hunting and fowling in the forests of Birse and Glencat, the Earl of Aboyne (the Marquis of Huntly's author) in 1808 raised an action of suspension in the Court of Session against Mr Innes, and subsequently an action of declarator, which actions were conjoined.[1] In these actions the Earl of Aboyne sought to have it found and declared that he had the exclusive right to the forest, subject only to certain servitudes of grazing specified in a decree-arbitral, "and subject also to the farther personal privilege in favour of Lewis Innes . . . as proprietor of the lands of Tilliesnaught or Ballogie, of shooting wild fowl in the said forests of Birse and Glencat." Defences were lodged for Mr Innes, and the case thereafter came before Lord Meadowbank, Ordinary, who on 12th

Marquis of Huntly v. Nicol.

May 1809 pronounced an interlocutor to the following effect:—"Finds that franchise, easement, or whatever be its proper class, is a right incident to feudal property in land at common law, but not to rights of the nature of servitudes; and though the right is restricted by statute, quoad the autocratic exercise thereof, to proprietors of a certain extent it cannot be lawfully exercised by them on any ground contrary to the will of the proprietor thereof, on the pretext that they have rights of servitude affecting the surface of the same; and with regard to Lewis Innes, in respect of the admission by the Earl in his summons that Mr Innes has a right of hunting and fowling over the forests of Birse and Glencat, and in respect that this privilege implies, from the very nature of it, a right to communicate the same to friends, gamekeepers, and assistants when conferred without an express restriction in that respect, finds the letters orderly proceeded in the suspension, and sustains the defences in the declarator, and decerns." To this interlocutor the Lord Ordinary added a note, in which he stated,—"I have only to add that I should have construed Mr Innes' grant of hunting very differently had it not been for a judicial admission, against which I don't think the Earl can be reponed."

The Earl of Aboyne reclaimed against this interlocutor, and on 19th December 1809 the Court pronounced an interlocutor in which they adhered to the interlocutor reclaimed against in so far as it found that Lewis Innes had a right of fowling, or privilegium et libertas aucupandi, over the forests of Birse and Glencat, but recalled the interlocutor in so far as it found he had a right of hunting; and they remitted to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties as to the extent of his privilege, and particularly whether it was communicable as the ordinary right or franchise of hunting or fowling.

Thereafter the Lord Ordinary, having again considered the case, but without any evidence having been adduced, on 13th November 1812 issued an interlocutor in the following terms:—"Observing that the usage alleged by Mr Innes prior and subsequent to the decree-arbitral 1755 is not controverted by the Earl, Finds that the liberty and privilege of fowling conferred by the defender's titles is præsumptione juris et de jure a grant by a verus dominus effectually burdening the right of property in the forest of Birse belonging to the pursuer, with the office and privilege of forester connected therewith: Finds that the liberty and privilege so conferred on the defender is a franchise conferred as an heritable right rendered an appendage to the property of Tilliesnaught or Ballogie, and as it affects a district created a royal forest, under the guardianship of a forester, and appears to be co-ordinate and co-effective with the rights of the grantee thereof, must be considered as a franchise, entitled, so far as it goes, to the benefit of such an establishment, and to a fair and liberal construction as to the exercise thereof, according to use and wont: Finds that the said privilege may lawfully be exercised by the defender personally, or by his gamekeeper duly authorised for that purpose, or by any qualified friends whom he may permit, whether his tenants on Ballogie or not, or whether the defender be personally present or not, but always in such way and manner as not to be abusively exercised or encroach unreasonably on or absorb the general right of fowling as well as hunting belonging to the pursuer over the said forest, and decerns and declares accordingly." Against this interlocutor the Earl of Aboyne again reclaimed to the Court, but

No. 117. the Court adhered, and their judgment was affirmed on appeal to the House of Lords on 10th July 1819.[1]

Mar. 12, 1896. Marquis of Huntly v. Nicol.

In an action raised in December 1855 by the Marquis of Huntly against James Dyce Nicol, of Ballogie, Mr Innes' successor, concluding, inter alia, for declarator that the pursuer had the sole right of hunting and fowling in the Forest of Birse, the Lord Ordinary, inter alia, sustained the plea of res judicata in bar of this part of his declaratory conclusion. To this interlocutor the Inner-House adhered on 9th January 1858.[2]

The conclusions of the present action were for declarator "that the pursuers, under and by virtue of their titles to the forests of Birse and Glencat, have, subject only to such franchise or privilege of fowling as the defender may establish within the same, the sole and undoubted right of hunting and fowling within the said forests: And further," for declarator, "that the privilegium et libertas aucupandi, or privilege and franchise of fowling, which the defender possesses under his titles to the estate of Tilliesnaught or Ballogie, is a privilege or franchise personal to the defender as proprietor of the said estate, and to his successors therein, and that it can only be exercised—(1) by himself, as proprietor foresaid, and his successors foresaid, personally; (2) by his or their gamekeepers and assistant gamekeepers shooting under his or their orders for the supply of his or their house of Ballogie; and (3) by his or their friends to whom he or they may have given permission, whether such friends are tenants in the house and lands of Ballogie or are unconnected with the said estate; and further, that it can only be exercised by the defender and his foresaids in such a way and manner as not to encroach unreasonably upon the pursuers' said rights: And it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the defender and his successors in the said estate are not entitled in the exercise of said privilege or franchise—(1) to kill by himself or themselves, or by his or their gamekeepers or assistant gamekeepers, or by his or their friends foresaid, game for sale either privately or in open market; or (2) to exercise the said privilege or franchise personally, and at the same time communicate the same to his or their friends foresaid not accompanied by himself or themselves; or (3) to communicate the same to more than one friend foresaid at one and the same time; or (4) to lease or otherwise transfer for hire or for valuable consideration in money or money's worth the said privilege or franchise either to his or their friends foresaid, or to strangers not being tenants of the house and lands of Ballogie; or (5) to lease or otherwise transfer for hire or for valuable consideration in money or money's worth the said privilege or franchise either to his or their friends foresaid or to strangers being tenants of the house and lands of Ballogie, or otherwise to include the said privilege or franchise in any lease of the house and lands of Ballogie as a pertinent thereof, or as a part and pertinent of the subject let; or at least (6) that he and they are not entitled to lease or otherwise transfer for hire the said privilege or franchise, and at the same time to exercise the same personally; or (7) to lease or otherwise transfer for hire the said privilege or franchise to more than one tenant at one and the same time: Or otherwise, it ought and should be found and declared that the defender is only entitled to exercise said privilege or franchise of shooting in such way and manner and subject to such conditions and under such limitations and regulations as our said Lords may, on consideration hereof and of the process to follow hereon, fix and determine."

The defender referred to and founded on the proceedings in the former actions.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) In terms of said judgments, the defender's right of shooting can only be exercised by himself, his servants, gamekeepers, and friends. (3) The defender is only entitled to exercise the said right by way of sporting, and is not entitled to exercise it for profit, and, separatim, cannot communicate or let it to others for profit.

The defender pleaded;—(2) Res judicata in respect of the said proceedings. (3) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant. (4) The defender ought to be assoilzied, in respect that under his titles, and in accordance with the judgments referred to on record, he has sporting rights and privileges in said forests co-ordinate and co-effective with those of the pursuer. (5) The defender being entitled to exercise his said rights, either by himself personally or by his keepers, or by any friends whom he may permit, whether tenants on Ballogie or not, or whether he is personally present or not, but always in such way and manner as not to be abusively exercised, or encroach unreasonably on or absorb the pursuer's said rights, the present action must fail.

On 20th December 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) found "(1) that by final judgment of this Court, pronounced on 9th January 1858, in an action at the instance of the Marquis of Huntly, predecessor of the pursuers, against James Dyce Nicol, predecessor of the defender, it is res judicata that the findings in the interlocutors pronounced by this Court and affirmed by the House of Lords in an action between the Earl of Aboyne, as proprietor of the Forest of Birse, and Mr Lewis Innes, as proprietor of the estate of Ballogie, which action depended in this Court in the year 1808 and following years, and was appealed to and determined by the House of Lords in 1819, are and form, as to all matters therein dealt with, res judicata between the proprietor of the Forest of Birse and the proprietor of the estate of Ballogie; (2) that, in so far as the conclusions of the present action refer to matters not expressly dealt with by the foresaid interlocutors and judgments, the defender's privilegium et libertas aucupandi in the Forest of Birse is not subject to the conditions and limitations contended for by the pursuers"; and therefore sustained the second, fourth, and fifth pleas in law for the defender, and assoilzied him from the whole conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—This summons contains conclusions which are expressly covered by the judgments of this Court and the House of Lords, in the action instituted in 1808 by the then Earl of Aboyne against the then Laird of Ballogie. As regards these conclusions there is a double res judicata, because the judgments in the action of 1808 were found to be res judicata in the case of Marquis of Huntly v. Nicol, 9th January 1858, 20 D. 374, and that judgment is itself res judicata against the present pursuers. As a matter of form therefore it is necessary to sustain the plea of res judicata with regard to all matters expressly decided in the earlier of these cases. There remain, however, certain conclusions which were not dealt with in express terms by the judgments of this Court and the House of Lords, though I think they are all, or nearly all, covered by the ratio decidendi. A few of these seek to lay down some exceedingly minute and rather fanciful restric-

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The plea of res judicata was not relevant. The pursuers admitted that they were bound by the interlocutor of 1812, so far as it went, but the question was, How far did it go? Did it give Ballogie a right to let the shooting or sell the game? Clearly not, otherwise Ballogie would have just the same right as the owner of the forest, and the terms of the interlocutor were consistent only with his having a limited right. A co-owner even was not entitled to let for profit without the consent of the other owners.[1] There was nothing in the nature of the privilege itself to suggest that the person enjoying it was entitled to make money out of it. That was inconsistent with the opinions of the Judges. The Lord Justice-Clerk had said in terms that Lord Aboyne would be entitled to interfere if Ballogie farmed out the shooting as a means of profit or advantage. The interlocutor must be construed in the light of what was said by the Judges who pronounced it. Letting was really an abuse of the privilege. So was selling the game. The pursuers were entitled to prevent such an abuse. The present action was quite appropriate for regulating the exercise of the right.

Argued for the respondent;—The present action was incompetent, tions on the defender's right of shooting, but the main question raised by this action (and that to which I suppose it really owes its origin) is whether the defender is entitled to let his right of shooting in the Forest of Birse either with or without the house of Ballogie.

"The ruling document with regard to the defender's right is Lord Meadowbank's detailed interlocutor of 13th November 1812, which was affirmed by the Inner-House and the House of Lords. The main propositions established by that interlocutor are (1) that the defender's liberty and privilege of fowling is a heritable right attached to the property of Ballogie; (2) that it is co-ordinate and co-effective with the rights of Lord Huntly; (3) that it is entitled to a fair and liberal construction as to its exercise, according to use and wont; (4) that it may lawfully be exercised not only by the defender personally, but by his gamekeeper and by any friends to whom he may give permission, whether his tenants on Ballogie or not, and whether he is personally present or not; and (5) that it must not be abusively exercised so as to encroach unreasonably on or absorb the general right of fowling belonging to the pursuers.

"It is true that these propositions do not expressly affirm Ballogie's right to let the shootings, and the pursuers point to some expressions in the opinion of the Judges to the effect that it would be an abuse if he were 'to dispose of the game for profit,' or 'to farm out the right as a means of profit or advantage.' But these are only expressions of one or two individual Judges, and I think they are to be ascribed to the prevailing sentiment of the time, which was undoubtedly against the notion of making money out of a sporting right. It is consistent with this that Ballogie seems in his pleadings to have disclaimed the idea of letting the shootings for hire, although Ballogie house had been occupied as shooting quarters by a succession of tenants, who had claimed the right to shoot in the forest. That being a fact, in the full view of the Court and the House of Lords, it is significant that they did not insert in their interlocutors any exclusion of Ballogie's right to let, but on the contrary, declared that he might give permission to shoot to any of his friends, whether tenants on Ballogie or not. I observe that Lord Glenlee says, 'As to the tenants in the house of Ballogie, it is very extravagant to say that they must not shoot.' Now these were tenants paying a rent for the house, a rent no doubt enhanced so far as it sought a judgment that was repugnant to the former interlocutor.[1] The pursuers' contention no doubt was that they only sought to construe the interlocutor of 1812, but then their construction amounted to a plain contradiction, for it proceeded on the assumption that the right in question was a personal privilege. It was res judicata, however, that it was a heritable right. The judgment of 1812, as well as that of 1858, very clearly rested, not on the judicial admission of the Earl of Aboyne in the action of 1808, but on the defender's titles. The privilege was none the less a heritable right because it did not fall under any of the known classes of servitudes.[2] The right being heritable was communicable. That would have been decided in terms had the parties proceeded with the second branch of the case in 1858. There was nothing in the interlocutor of Lord Meadowbank to preclude the idea of letting. The dicta of some of the Judges might tend in that direction, but these could not be allowed to control the terms of the decree itself. The dicta, however, and especially those of Lord Meadowbank, referred rather to the remedy in case of abuse, than to the right itself, and meant that Ballogie could not transfer any higher right to his grantee than he had himself. The fact that Lord Meadowbank contemplated a tack shewed that he recognised the assignability of the right. If assignable at all, why not for value? The word "friends," in the interlocutor of 1809, was explained subsequently by Lord Meadowbank to mean "persons."[3] There was no reason why the defender should not sell the game killed by him, if he shot for sport, and there was no suggestion that he was doing anything that was not reasonable. The action as laid was not one in which regulations could be imposed. There was no warrant in the old interlocutor for the specific restrictions set out in the other conclusions of his summons.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN was absent, but his Lordship's opinion was read by LORD ADAM as follows:—

LORD M'LAREN.—By a judgment of the Court of Session, affirmed by the House of Lords in 1819, it was found that the then proprietor of Ballogie had a heritable right of fowling in the forest of Birse, the property of Lord Huntly's predecessor. By a second judgment of this Court, pronounced on by the sporting rights attached to it, and it is to my mind too fine a distinction to say that the right may be exercised by a tenant of that description, and not by one to whom the shootings are let eo nomine.

"In short, it seems to me that once you reject the idea, as this Court and the House of Lords did, that this was a personal privilege in favour of the Laird of Ballogie (like the privilege of rod fishing in the case of Duke of Richmond v. Duff, 5 Macph. 310), and affirm that it is a heritable right, coordinate and co-effective with that of Lord Huntly, it follows that there is no limitation in the right except that which arises from the fact that it is a joint one, and therefore to be exercised civiliter. The finding to that effect in Lord Meadowbank's interlocutor remains, and there is no averment in the present action that the defender's mode of exercising his privilege has unfairly encroached on the right of the pursuers in its character as a joint right."

Mar. 12, 1896. Marquis of Huntly v. Nicol.

9th January 1858, the first judgment was held to be res judicata in a question between the successors in title of the original parties, and it is no longer open to question that the privilegium aucupandi, whatever may be its value or extent, is a pertinent of the estate of Ballogie. The present action is instituted for the purpose of defining or limiting the right, the point of chief interest being the conclusion that the defender is not entitled to let the shooting.

When it is proposed to define a right or, which is the same thing, to determine its quality and incidents, it is best to begin by referring it if possible to some known category. But in this case I am at a loss to understand what species of right the Court and the House of Lords intended to award to Mr Nicol's predecessor. As the right is of the nature of a qualified use of another man's property, the nearest analogue would be a right of servitude; yet I should not call it a servitude, because the servitudes which the law has recognised are motived by some consideration of convenience or utility to the dominant estate as an estate, and I cannot see how it can be represented as an advantage to the estate of Ballogie that its proprietor should have the right of shooting in the Forest of Birse. Again, I can understand that the proprietor of Birse should come under a perpetual obligation to permit Ballogie to shoot in the forest. But such an obligation would only be binding on the obligant and his heirs, and not as in this case on purchasers or singular successors. Lastly, if there had been a relation of tenure between the estates of the pursuer and the defender, the privilege might be referred to the principle of conditional grant, but there is no evidence that the one estate ever held of the other, or that the two had ever formed parts of a larger estate.

It is, however, satisfactory to find that the original judgment stands in little need of explanation. I agree in the ground of judgment suggested by the Lord Ordinary, that we are merely interpreters of the original decree. Now, by that decree it is found that the privilege may be exercised by the defender personally, by his gamekeeper, and by any friends to whom he may give permission, whether his tenants on Ballogie or not. This is a very wide power of delegation, going far beyond predial servitude. Even if the decree had said no more than that the privilege should be communicable to tenants, I should have held that the defender was entitled to let the shooting along with a residence on Ballogie estate, because in such a case it is an impossible position to say that you may let the house and give the shooting but shall not let the house and let the shooting. Whatever rent is given by a tenant who has the house and shooting is necessarily a consideration for the shooting as well as the use of the residence. But I am prepared to go further and to hold that, consistently with the original decree, the defender may let the shooting to one who does not hold a lease of any part of the lands of Ballogie. I also agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that some of the expressions used by individual Judges are not consistent with the decree. In a question of res judicata I doubt whether it is permissible to refer even to the collective opinion of the Court for the purpose of controlling or limiting the effect of its decree, and it is quite certain that the opinions of individual Judges not concurred in by a majority of the Court cannot be used for such a purpose.

The only other point which was specially argued at the debate before us was the conclusion that the defender and his tenants were not entitled to shoot the game for sale. Now, this is not an action of regulation; but I understand it to be admitted that the defender's privilege is a sporting privilege, and that the shooting must be conducted in a fair and sportsmanlike manner, and consistently with the existence of an equal right in the pursuer.

But if the defender uses his right of shooting fairly, and does not encroach, it can be of no consequence to Lord Huntly what becomes of the birds which may be killed in the exercise of the defender's privilege. The absence of interest on the part of the pursuer seems to me to be a sufficient reason for negativing this conclusion.

The considerations which I have stated suffice, in my opinion, for the disposal of the whole case, and I think that the reclaiming note should be refused.

LORD ADAM.—I concur in Lord M'Laren's opinion.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord M'Laren that if we had been called upon by this action to determine the validity of the right in question or to found its character upon the general principles of law, it would have been necessary for us to consider how far it answered to the legal definition either of servitude or of estate in land, or of some other recognised legal right; because although the owners of land may confer what rights of use and enjoyment over an estate they please by personal contracts, which may be binding on themselves, they cannot create new heritable rights or new incidents of property which will affect successors or successive owners of land beyond such as are already recognised by the law of the country. But then it is decided in terms, in the first place, that this is a valid right, and in the second place, that it has certain legal consequences and incidents, and that being finally determined by a judgment of the House of Lords, it appears to me that the question whether it is more or less analogous to servitude on the one hand or some other legal right on the other, becomes a mere question of classification which it is not necessary for us to determine in order to dispose of this action. We have the very high authority of Lord Corehouse for saying that it is a predial servitude in as much as the law does not recognise a right of shooting as a separate estate which can be created by tack or infeftment apart from property in land, and on the other hand, as his Lordship points out, the law has recognised the possibility of annexing to a dominant estate a right of this kind to be exercised over a servient estate. However that may be, it appears to me, as Lord M'Laren has said, that all we have to do now is to apply the conclusions of this summons to the terms of the interlocutors affirmed by the House of Lords in order to see whether we can sustain any of the conclusions of the summons or not. Now, I think that the determining consideration is that it has been decided that this right is not a mere personal privilege, but a heritable right, and I should have been disposed to think that, if that were all that had been decided, it would follow as a consequence from that determination that it might be exercised, not only by the person in whom it was originally vested, but also by any person to whom he communicates it; because the moment it has been established that it is a heritable right, constituted by the infeftment of the owner of the dominant tenement, all the considerations that can be suggested for its limitation on the ground of its being a personal privilege necessarily fly off. It must be one or the other. It is either personal privilege or a real right, and the House of Lords have determined that it is the latter. But then the interlocutor goes on to describe the method by which it may be exercised. That appears to me to place all the questions raised in the summons beyond dispute, because it comes to this, that being a heritable right it may be exercised either by the proprietor of Ballogie personally or by his servants whom he authorises to exercise his own right, or by anybody to whom he chooses to transfer it, subject to only one qualification,—that he is to transfer to his friends, whether they are his tenants or not, provided only they be qualified, and he may also so transfer it to them that they may exercise it whether he is personally present on the ground or not. Now, that appears to me to express an unqualified power to transfer the right subject to this condition only, that the transferee shall be qualified according to law to exercise the right of fowling upon the land; and that refers, I think there can be no doubt, to the property qualification by which the privilege of hunting and hawking was confined to persons holding a plough of land in heritage. We are not to consider how far that qualification or limitation of the right is now operative, if it be operative at all, for no question is raised by the summons upon that special point, but subject to that qualification, which appears to me to explain the peculiarity by which the extent of the rights of parties is previously defined in the interlocutor, the judgment finds that the proprietor, vested in the right, may transfer it as he pleases. Then it goes on to express another limitation, which Lord M'Laren has put into the appropriate language which we should use now in such a case—that the right is to be exercised in a sportsmanlike manner—by saying that it is not to be unreasonable or absorbing the general right of fowling belonging to the granter of the right. I have therefore come to the same conclusion as Lord M'Laren, that there are no grounds for introducing into this right any of the specific limitations for which the summons concludes. In the first place, it would be directly contrary to the terms of the interlocutor if we were to find that the defender is entitled only to exercise his right as proprietor either personally or by his friends when he is personally present. Then I can find no grounds in the interlocutor for holding that it is to be exercised only for the supply of the house of Ballogie, which is in the second conclusion of the summons. The final terms of the third conclusion of the summons may be perfectly correct, that the right can only be exercised by the defender and his foresaids in such way or manner as not to encroach unreasonably on the pursuer's rights, but that is a conclusion leading up to specific regulations for the exercise of the right; and, as Lord M'Laren has pointed out, this is not an action for regulation, or one in which we could proceed to make regulations. Therefore that, as a mere general declarator, is unnecessary, and does not give the pursuer any sufficient title or interest to have that qualification declared in his favour, if the more specific conclusions are unsound. Then when the summons goes on to have it found and declared that the privilege is not to be exercised except in a certain specific manner, I agree with Lord M'Laren, for the reason given, that all these limitations are unsupported by the terms of the judgment and finding. If the proprietor of Ballogie, as having a right in connection with that estate to shoot over the pursuer's lands, is entitled to transfer that right, and to exercise it by his servants as well as by himself, I am unable to find any ground for the limitations suggested—viz., that he is not to make such conditions as he pleases with his assignee as to the terms on which, between them, the right is to be exercised. And again, if he has the right to kill game unlimited by any condition except a concurrent right in the pursuer to shoot over the lands, I am unable to see any ground for limiting the uses that he may make of the game that has been killed so as to exclude its being used for any other purpose than the consumption of his own house of Ballogie. I entirely concur with the opinion of Lord M'Laren, and with the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

No. 117.

Fraser v. Malloch.

JAMES MACGREGOR MALLOCH, Defender.—Shaw—A. S. D. Thomson.

Process—Expenses—Dominus litis.—Held (per Lord Kyllachy, Ordinary), that in order to make a person liable as dominus litis for expenses decerned for in an action to which he was no party, it must be established that he was truly the principal in the action, and that the actual litigant was merely his agent.

OUTER-HOUSE Ld. Kyllachy.

IN December 1892 an action was raised at the instance of Donald & M'Culloch, power-loom cloth manufacturers in Govan, and James Donald, sole partner of said firm, and John S. M'Culloch, as trustees for said firm, against John M. Fraser, merchant in Glasgow, for reduction of a minute of agreement of sale and a disposition of a factory in Govan by Fraser to said firm, and for payment of £3622. In June 1894 the Court assoilzied the defender, and he was found entitled to £451 of expenses.

In July 1894 the estates of the firm of Donald & M'Culloch and of Donald, the sole partner, were sequestrated.

In May 1895 Fraser raised an action against James MacGregor Malloch, writer in Glasgow, for payment of these expenses.

The pursuer averred that the defender had made large advances to the firm, and that the former action at the instance of Donald & M'Culloch was really brought by him for his own interest, and that he had no instructions or authority of any kind given to him either by Donald or M'Culloch, that the proceedings were throughout entirely under his control, and that he provided at his own charges for the whole expenses of the litigation.

The pursuer pleaded that the defender being the true dominus litis in the former action, the pursuer was entitled to decree.

The defender denied the pursuer's averments.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) allowed a proof.

The import of the proof is given in the following extract from the Lord Ordinary's opinion:—"I do not think that the real facts of the case are seriously disputed. In 1891 Messrs Donald & M'Culloch

(the pursuers of the action referred to) bought from Fraser (the present pursuer) a factory in Govan, with plant and machinery and certain business assets. The price as ultimately paid was about £3500. Messrs Donald & M'Culloch, who had been employed in the factory, had little capital—only about £250—but they obtained a loan on the property of £2000, and the balance was lent them by the present defender, Malloch, who was their banker and law-agent in the transaction. The factory was not successful, and in 1892 Messrs Donald & M'Culloch raised an action of reduction against Mr Fraser on the ground of fraudulent misrepresentation. By that time they were indebted to the defender, Mr Malloch, to the extent of about £1300, and there was another creditor for £400 more. Mr Malloch's firm, who were writers in Glasgow, conducted, through their Edinburgh correspondent, the litigation, and during its progress he continued to finance the factory business. The action was in the end unsuccessful, with the result that the factory was closed, and Donald & M'Culloch were sequestrated."

The Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defender.*

* "OPINION.—The defender in this case is sued for payment of the expenses awarded to the pursuer in a recent action in which he (the pursuer) was defender, and was successful in his defence. The ground of the demand is, that the defender was, as is alleged, the true dominus litis in the action, and is, as such, responsible for the expenses. It is not said that he was a party to the action. So far as appears he was simply the Glasgow agent of the pursuers. But it is said that he had such an interest in the result of the suit, and had such control over its course, as to be the true dominus litis.—(His Lordship here stated the facts as narrated above).

"The question which must first be determined is, what in law are the elements which attach to a person not a party to a suit the character of dominus litis, and that in the sense and to the effect for which the pursuer contends.

"The term dominus litis is of course borrowed from the civil law, but with respect to the particular facts with which we have here to deal, it cannot be said that much assistance is to be derived from the definitions and doctrines of that law. The expression was used in the civil law in two senses. It was used to denote the formal pursuer as distinguished from the advocate who appeared for him. It was also used to denote the pursuer or defender proper as distinguished from the procurator or mandatory in whose name it might happen that the contract of litiscontestation was entered into. As between and among those parties there were various points which were ascertained—(Code ii. tit. x. 1; Digest iii. tit. iii. 10-17 and 30-31; Digest xlix. tit. i. 4; Digest xliv. tit. iv. 11; Code ii. tit. xiii. 22-23, and vii. tit. xlv. 1; Cujacius ix. 1065). It was held for example (1) that no judgment could issue in an action except for or against the formal parties to the action,—that is to say, the parties to the contract of litiscontestation; (2) that the procurator who had as such become a party to the contract of litiscontestation had right to be relieved by his mandant or principal of all costs and liabilities thereby incurred, and had a preference for such relief against anything which he recovered; and (3) that judgment being obtained against the procurator, an action lay upon that judgment against the mandant or principal as the true dominus litis. But, so far as I can discover, the civil law did not at all deal with the case of a latent third party lying behind not only the advocate and the procurator but also the pursuer or defender, for whom the advocate or procurator appeared. As to the liabilities of such a party the civil law was silent. Still less did it attempt to define what interest in or connection with the suit should be held to bring those liabilities into play.

In support of her claim A referred to a minute of agreement entered into between the truster's widow, since deceased, who was at the time his execu-

"Neither is much help to be had from the law of England. Putting aside its doctrine of Maintenance and Champerty (Blackstone's Com. 4, 10, 12 and 13) with which we are not concerned, the English doctrine of dominus litis (or what may loosely be so called) relates exclusively to the question—in what circumstances shall a party to an action who has another party behind him be bound for that reason to find caution for expenses? And all that can be said on that matter is that the English rule—so far as any settled rule exists—goes a good deal further than our Scots rule on the same subject. It certainly goes a good deal beyond any rule which could be applied to the question with which we have here to deal. It appears to be the result of the English cases that it is enough to justify a demand for caution, e.g. from a pursuer, that some third person has instigated the suit—has some interest in its result—and has contributed to its cost. At least that appears to be so where the third person refuses to sist himself as a party to the suit. That, however, is, as I have said, merely a rule of process which by no means settles the outsider's liability for the expenses of the suit. As to that matter all that has been held in England seems to be this, that in no case can such liability be enforced in the suit itself or incidentally to the suit. Whether it can be enforced as here by a separate action, and if so on what principle, does not appear to have been considered. In the English law, as also probably in the civil law, that question is I imagine left to depend on the ordinary law of principal and agent—(Ball v. Ross, 1840, 1 Scott (new edit.) C. P. 217; Osborne v. Petchell, 1839, 7 Scott C. P. 481; Hayward v. Giffard & Grove, 1858, 4 M. and W. 194).

"Coming next to the Scots authorities, there is no doubt that these recognise the proposition that a party outside an action may in certain circumstances become liable for the expenses awarded to the successful party, and may be sued for those expenses as here by separate action. There is also no doubt that this liability has been said to depend on the interest which the outside party has in the subject-matter of the suit, and on the control which he possesses and exercises over the course of the suit. But the practical question always is, as to the kind and degree of interest and of control which shall be sufficient for the purpose. And I am afraid that trix and sole trustee, and his eldest son, under which the son took over at a valuation the crop and stocking on certain farms of which the truster had been tenant. There was appended to the minute, which was tested, a state of the trust funds, and among the "outstanding debts" was entered "sum on debt due to" A "£390." The state was signed by the widow and eldest son, and appended to it was a docquet signed by the truster's other children who, with the widow and eldest son, were the beneficiaries under his will, approving of the minute of agreement, and also "approving of and holding as correct, and duly vouched" the state of trust funds. A, to whom the document had not been delivered or exhibited at any time, maintained that the debt of £390 was proved by it, or alternatively that it raised a prima facie case of loan which she was entitled to supplement by parole proof. Held (1) that the docquet was not a writ binding on the beneficiaries as in a question with A, but was merely an admission or discharge by them in favour of the truster's widow; (2) that the entry of the sum of £390 was ineffectual to prove a debt due by the trust-estate, in respect (a) that the writ in which it occurred was not delivered to A as an acknowledgment by the trustee that the debt was due, and (b) that such an acknowledgment, if delivered to A, would not have been binding on the trust-estate; and (3) that none of the decided cases formulate or ascertain the principle on which that question must be decided.

"There are some classes of cases which are not uncommonly classed under the head of dominus litis of which the principle is perhaps clear enough. For example, when the pursuer of an action alienates, or is otherwise divested of the subject of the action so that he is no longer interested in it, the transferee of the subject may be required to sist himself, and failing his doing so, the action may be dismissed—(Fraser v. Dunbar, June 6, 1839, 1 D. 882, 11 Scot. Jur. 500; Fraser v. Duguid, June 9, 1838, 16 Sh. 1130, 10 Scot. Jur. 485; Waddel v. Hope, Dec. 2, 1843, 6 D. 160, 16 Scot. Jur. 121). The principle here is that the defender is not bound to litigate with a person who has no longer an interest or title to sue, and against whom therefore no effectual judgment could be obtained.

"Again, where the pursuer becomes bankrupt, and is divested subject only to a contingent reversion, he has still no doubt an interest and a title to sue, but the immediate interest is in his creditors, and if the trustee declines to sist himself, the bankrupt must as a rule find caution for expenses. This again is simply an equitable rule of process which settles nothing, e.g., as to the trustee's liability for expenses, if the suit proceeds and the cautioner fails.

"Similarly in popular actions, such as rights of way, where a pursuer is put forward who has a sufficiently good title and interest, but whose title and interest is shared by others who supply the funds, the Court will appoint those other persons to sist themselves, and failing their doing so, will require the pursuer to find caution—(Jenkins, &c., v. Robertson, &c., March 20, 1869, 7 Macph. 739). At least they will do so if it appears that the pursuer is a man of straw, and has been put forward for that reason—(Potter v. Hamilton, July 19, 1870, 8 Macph. 1064). Here also nothing is involved touching the liability of the outside parties for expenses. They may or may not be liable (if the cautioner fails) according to circumstances—that is to say, according to what may ultimately be found to be their true relation towards the suit, the parties to the suit, and its subject-matter.

"These cases therefore settle nothing really relevant to the present question. It may be right in particular cases that, if certain outside parties decline to sist themselves, the action shall be dismissed, or allowed to proceed only on caution for expenses, and yet it may by no means follow that those outside parties incur any liability for expenses if the action proceeds. That depends, as I have said, on their attitude to the action, and what that attitude must be to make them liable is the question which has to be solved.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Moncreiff.

THOMAS DUNN died on 2d March 1865 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement whereby he conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to trustees for certain purposes, including, inter alia, the payment to his widow of the free income of his whole estates during her life, and on her death the division of the estate among his children in equal shares.

"Neither, again, does the case of Stevens v. Burden, Nov. 21, 1823, 2 Sh. 447, cited by the pursuer, advance the argument. In that case, a father, as part of an agreement by which his son's means were reduced to an alimentary annuity of small amount, undertook to defend, and did defend, an action of declarator of marriage which had been raised against the son, and in which decree ultimately went out against him, with expenses. The father was found liable, at the suit of the pursuer's agent, for the expenses decerned for, and was so, as the report bears, on the ground that 'the defender undertook to defend his son in the declarator of marriage, and that he did not allow him sufficient aliment.' In other words, the father was held liable in virtue of the special contract between him and his son, which contract, in the particular circumstances, the agent for the successful party being the son's creditor for the expenses, was allowed to enforce by direct action.

"The only decision really in point is that of Corsan v. M'Lauchlan, Feb. 8, 1828, 6 Sh. 505, which is very shortly reported. In that case (M'Lauchlan) a heritable creditor had a dispute with another heritable creditor (Corsan) as to the latter's right to remove the common debtor (Rankine) from the subject of the security. Rankine was bankrupt, but he and M'Lauchlan granted a joint mandate to M'Lauchlan's agent to oppose the removing. The result was a suspension which was brought by M'Lauchlan's agent as it happened in the name of Rankine alone. The suspension was unsuccessful, and Corsan having obtained decree for expenses against Rankine sued M'Lauchlan therefor. The Lord Ordinary (Meadowbank) assoilzied M'Lauchlan, but 'the Court being satisfied that he was the true dominus litis, and that Rankine was merely a man of straw, altered, and decerned in terms of the libel.'

"There is no other case in the books in which decree for expenses has gone out against an alleged dominus litis. There are cases where such decree has been refused, but the only one of importance is that of Mathieson v. Thomson, Nov. 5, 1853, 16 D. 19, 26 Scot. Jur. 24, where there are dicta by Lord Rutherfurd to which both parties in this case appeal. That distinguished Judge there said,—'There may be some difficulty in defining exactly what is a dominus litis; but I confess that I very much agree with what has been laid down by your lordship, and with the definition quoted from the civil law by Lord Ivory, that he is a party who has an interest in was the sole surviving trustee, and Mr John L. Mounsey, W.S., was then appointed trustee by the Court.

Certain questions having arisen with regard to the division of the estate Mr Mounsey raised an action of multiplepoinding, the fund in medio being the trust-estate, the value of which was £1193, 4s.

Inter alia, a claim was lodged by Mrs Marion Brodie or Tait, formerly Mrs Smith, a sister of the truster's wife.

Mrs Tait averred;—(Cond. 2) "The claimant was on friendly terms with the truster, Thomas Dunn, during his life. She from time to time made loans of money from her separate estate to the truster, several of which were of small amount; but, in particular, on or about 1st February 1865, she advanced him on loan a sum of £200, as is instructed by her cheque of that date in his

the subject-matter of the suit; and through that interest a proper control over the proceedings in the action. Now, it will not make a person liable in the expenses of the action that he instigated the suit or told a man that he had a good cause of action, and that he would be a fool if he did not prosecute it, or though he promoted it by more substantial assistance. It will not make him liable in the expenses of the suit that while he does both of these things he shall have some ultimate consequent benefit in the issue of the suit. But when you go a step further, and find a party with a direct interest in the subject-matter of the litigation, and through that interest master of the litigation itself, having the control and direction of the suit, with power to retard it or push it on, or put an end to it altogether, then you have a proper character of dominus litis, and though another name may be substituted the party behind is answerable for the expenses.'

"To complete the summary, it must be added that there are certain cases—familiar enough in practice—in which the liability in question has been always recognised. Some examples at once suggest themselves, and there may be others.

"The first is the case mentioned by Lord Rutherfurd of the assignee suing in name of his cedent. There is here probably a double remedy open to the opposite party. If the assignation is absolute, the assignee may require to sist himself, or the cedent to find caution. But it has never been doubted that in such a case the assignee is also liable, not only to keep his cedent indemnis, but at the suit of the opposite party to implement the judgment including any award of expenses against his cedent.

"Another case even more familiar is that of a beneficiary or creditor under a trust—voluntary or judicial—who desires to try some question which the trustee or trustees decline to try themselves, but which they agree to allow the creditor or beneficiary to try in their name and at his own expense. In that case it is always understood that the creditor or beneficiary, although not appearing in the suit, and having only an indirect interest in its subject-matter, is yet liable in case of failure for the expenses to the opposite party.

"Again, a third case is also common. A parochial board litigates in a pauper's name in order to recover for the benefit of the rates some debt or asset belonging to the pauper. It has never been doubted that in such a case the parochial board if unsuccessful must pay the expenses of both sides.

"Now, all this being so, what is the legal doctrine which underlies and explains these particular instances? In my opinion it is simply the elementary doctrine that a principal—disclosed or undisclosed—must make good the engagements and answer for the acts of his agent acting within the scope of the latter's authority. That it seems to me is the true basis of the rule which I have been considering, and supplies the test by which the pursuer's demand in this case must ultimately be judged. For after all what is the substance of the matter? A person becomes a party to a suit, favour, which is herewith produced.* The total amount of the advances made by the claimant to the truster due at the date of his death, including said sum of £200, but exclusive of interest, was £390." (Cond. 3) "No part of said debt of £390, and no interest thereon, has been paid to the claimant. During the lifetime of the said Mrs Agnes Brodie or Dunn and her enjoyment of the liferent of the deceased's estate, the claimant, out of regard for her sister Mrs and by doing so comes under an implied obligation to his adversary to perform the judgment, and, inter alia, to pay such expenses as may be awarded against him. That is an obligation in which his adversary is a creditor, and it is of no importance whether it arises by contract or quasi contract or by force of law. But an obligation so incurred may—like other obligations—be incurred on one's own behalf or on behalf of another. And if the latter be the case the position simply is that the party to the suit and the party behind him stand to each other in the relation of principal and agent, with all the liabilities towards third parties which that relation involves.

"That being so, the question in each case of the kind and in the present case is not whether the alleged dominus litis is interested in the action, or has advised it, or has financed it, or has exercised greater or less control over its progress. The question is whether in initiating and conducting the action the nominal pursuer (or defender as the case may be) was acting not as a principal but as an agent. And that question must, I apprehend, be determined on the same principles as are applied to other transactions, the ruling consideration always being what was the true agreement between the parties. In the proof of that agreement, their respective interests and the extent of the control possessed by each, and other like facts, may be important elements, but they are at best only elements in the proof.

"Now, applying these principles to the solution of the present case, the facts which have to be noted are shortly these.

"In the first place, there is no evidence—certainly no direct evidence—of any agreement between Malloch and Donald & M'Culloch that the action in question should be raised and prosecuted by Donald & M'Culloch on Mr Malloch's behalf, they giving their names, and being bound to act, so far as they did act, under and subject to his directions. There is, in other words, no direct evidence of a contract of agency. On the contrary, the direct evidence is the other way. Both Mr Malloch and Mr Donald deny that any such agreement existed, and there is nothing in the documents or books produced to instruct anything of the kind. A point was made that in the business account of Mr Malloch's firm, as recorded in their ledger, there is no charge against Donald & M'Culloch for taking their instructions to raise the action. But it is not disputed that meetings took place when the raising of the action was discussed and resolved upon, and I must say that it appeared to me that too much was made of an omission which would probably have been corrected when the ledger entries came in ordinary course to be revised.

"In the next place it is impossible to say that Mr Malloch had or alleged any right of property in the fund or claim which was the subject-matter of the action. He was a creditor of Donald & M'Culloch, and, as such, he had of course an indirect interest, but it was the interest of a creditor, and it is Dunn, abstained from enforcing her claims to principal and interest. These claims were, however, all along well known to and acknowledged by Mrs Dunn and the family of the deceased. not, I think, material that that interest was large or even predominant. He was not the only creditor. Donald & M'Culloch were not in any view divested. Nor is it disputed that, whatever their financial position, they had a sufficient and substantial interest in the success of the suit. Had it succeeded they would at least have been able to pay their creditors in full, or nearly in full. They would have escaped sequestration, and would probably have been able to make a new start under different circumstances.

"Lastly, it is not, I think, proved that Mr Malloch had, by agreement or otherwise, the command of the litigation. His firm conducted it as Glasgow agents, and provided the necessary outlays. And he no doubt had such oversight and control as belonged to him as agent in the cause, and as a creditor largely interested. But the pursuers Donald & M'Culloch took themselves an active interest in the action, and, so far as I see, never parted with their right to abandon or compromise, or take such other course as they might think their interest dictated. In short, according to the evidence, the litigation was in all respects conducted in the ordinary way, with this difference—not I am afraid without precedent—that the pursuers' agents trusted for recovery of their charges to the success of the action.

"I cannot, in these circumstances, affirm that the defender Mr Malloch was in the position of an undisclosed principal, conducting the suit through nominal pursuers, who were truly his agents. He was no more the true litigant in respect of his interest in and oversight of the suit than he had been all along the trader or manufacturer in respect of his interest in and oversight of the business of the factory. Everything which can be said of his position towards the action may equally be said of his position towards the business, and yet it is now well settled by a well-known class of cases that a creditor financing a business, and supervising it, and exercising over it large powers and authorities, will yet not be held to be the principal or a partner in such business when in truth and in substance he was only a creditor working out payment of his debt—(Eaglesham v. Grant, July 15, 1875, 2 R. 960; Mollwo, March, & Co., 1872, 4 P. C. App. 419, and cases cited)."

* At the date of the agreement Mrs Dunn was the sole acting executrix and trustee of the truster. The minute was to the effect that Robert Dunn, the second party, having obtained a lease of certain farms which had been tenanted by the truster at the date of his death, Mrs Dunn, the sole acting trustee, had made over to the second party the crop, stock, and implements thereon at a valuation, amounting to £1491, 18s., which the second party bound himself to pay to Mrs Dunn, under deduction of certain sums payable from the trust-estate, which he undertook to pay directly. Robert Dunn. There was annexed to the said minute of agreement, and signed as relative thereto by Mrs Dunn, as trustee foresaid, and by Robert Dunn, a state of the trust funds falling under the trust of the said Thomas Dunn, and among the outstanding debts due by the trust there is entered in said state the said capital sum of £390 as a debt due to the present claimant. Further, the said state of trust funds has appended thereto a docquet signed by five of the truster's children, namely, the defenders John Dunn, Thomas Dunn, Marion Dunn, now Mrs Hardy, Rachel Dunn, now Mrs Shaw, and Agnes Dunn, now Mrs Renton, whereby the said five children approved of the said minute of agreement, and also approved of and held as correct and duly vouched the said state of trust funds, including the debt due to the claimant. The said debt was also known to and acknowledged by the other two children of the truster, viz., William Dunn and Jean Dunn, now Mrs Glover, who did not subscribe said docquet in consequence of their being under age at the date thereof. The claimant's claim is thus instructed and proved by the writ of the deceased's trustee and legal representative, and also by the writ of six out of the eight parties beneficially interested in the estate of the deceased Thomas Dunn. No sum, either of principal or interest, has been paid to the claimant to account of the said debt by any of the said parties, and the claimant has never had any intromissions with any part of the trust-estate."

Mrs Tait also founded in argument on an affidavit in a claim for return of inventory-duty made by Mrs Dunn, but this writing was not referred to on record.*

Mar. 12, 1896. Dunn's Trustee v. Hardy.

Mrs Tait pleaded;—(2) The claimant is entitled to be ranked and preferred as aforesaid, in terms of her claim, in respect that the same is proved by the writ of the trustee and legal representative of the truster, and also by the writ of the parties beneficially interested in the trust-estate. (3) Alternatively, in respect of the written adminicles founded on, the claimant is entitled to a parole proof of the validity of her claim.

Claims were also lodged by Mrs Marion Dunn or Hardy and others, the children of the truster, and their assignees. They concurred in opposing the claim for Mrs Tait, and pleaded, inter alia, that the claim (1) was unfounded in fact; and (2) could only be proved scripto.

On 19th December 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff) allowed the claimant Mrs Tait a proof of her averments.*

* "OPINION.— . . . As a general rule loan must be proved by the writ or oath of the debtor. Writ there must be, but if writ under the hand of the debtor is produced which, prima facie, bears to be an acknowledgment of the debt, but which is not in itself conclusive, or which depends for its effect upon circumstances which require to be ascertained, the rule requiring writ is held to be satisfied and parole evidence is let in to set up the writing and complete the proof.

"Mrs Tait produces a cheque for £200, dated 1st February 1865, granted by herself to the truster and indorsed by him, which she alleges instructs a loan of £200 made by her to him on that date. The cheque, taken by itself, simply instructs the fact that money passed. Haldane v. Speirs, 10 Macph. 537, has decided that it cannot be regarded as the writ of the payee to the effect of proving loan; and that parole evidence is incompetent to prove quo animo it was granted. I do not say that if a general proof is allowed the granting of the cheque is of absolutely no importance, but certainly by itself, apart from other writing, it does not instruct loan.

"The writing, however, which is relied on is No. 24 of process, which contains, it is maintained, an acknowledgment of an outstanding debt of £390 due to the claimant. It is dated in 1869, and is under the hand of Mrs Dunn, who was then the sole trustee and executrix of the alleged debtor. The entry is not a casual jotting; it was made in connection with a formal family transaction, and bears to have been signed before witnesses by Mrs Dunn. It appears from the minute of agreement, No. 24 of process, that in 1869 Robert Dunn, one of the truster's sons, having obtained for himself a lease of a farm of which his father was tenant at the date of his death, purchased from Mrs Dunn, as sole acting trustee, the stock, cropping, and implements upon the farm at a valuation of £1491, 18s. Of this sum it was arranged that he should pay the trustee £773, 9s. 11½d., and become responsible for and pay accounts payable from the trust-estate amounting to £718, 8s. 0½d. Appended to the agreement is a state of the trust funds as at Martinmas 1868 signed by the widow, in which, among the 'outstanding debts' is entered '2. Sum of debt due to Mrs Margaret Smith, £390.' (I understand that there is no dispute that by 'Mrs Smith' the claimant is meant.) Then follows a schedule of the accounts paid or to be paid by Mr Robert Dunn, and the whole concludes with a docquet signed by five of the truster's children in the following terms:—'We, the undersigned children of Mr Thomas Dunn, approve of the arrangement for conveyance of crop, stocking, and implements mentioned in the foregoing minute of agreement, being satisfied that the same was more to advantage than a sale of these by public roup, and we also approve of and hold as correct and duly vouched, state of the trust funds of our father as at Martinmas 1868 hereto prefixed.'

"Now, this is not an acknowledgment made direct to the alleged creditor,

Mrs Marion Dunn or Hardy and the other children of the truster reclaimed, and argued;—If the writs founded on by Mrs Tait were not sufficient per se to prove the alleged loan, parole evidence of the constitution of the debt was incompetent. Parole proof was only admissible to establish facts extrinsic to the writings establishing the debt, e.g., that the writ was de facto the writ of the borrower, or that there had been delivery of it. But these were not the facts that Mrs Tait asked a proof of. The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary was therefore wrong. The writs were not proof scripto of a debt. The cheque was clearly not.[1] The affidavit, if it proved anything, proved part extinction of the alleged debt, but it was not really evidence at all in a question like the present. The minute of agreement with the state of funds was no more than an admission by the parties signing it that they were satisfied with the intromissions of the trustee, but that could have no effect as in a question with creditors. Mrs Tait was not a party to it, and it had never been delivered to her.[2] It was at most an undelivered acknowledgment made by a trustee or executor who had no authority to make it. The executor's oath or admission but that is not essential. An entry in the debtor's books, if sufficiently specific, is enough even if the creditor was ignorant of the existence of the entry until he recovered it under a diligence. In the case of Briggs v. Swan's Executor, in 16 D. 385, an illustration will be found of the effect attributed to a document of this kind. The question there was not one of loan, but whether a debt had been cut off by the long negative prescription. It was held that certain states prepared for and docqueted by the executors and an inventory given up to the Stamp Office, in which the debts in question were entered as due, were sufficient to preserve them from the negative prescription. In that case a proof was allowed of the circumstances connected with the preparation and signing of the states. On consideration of the proof it was held, as I have stated, that the debts were saved from prescription.

"Again, in the case of Williamson v. Allan, 9 R. 859 (for the purpose of establishing loan) a proof was allowed to set up an I O U, which was open to the objection that, although it bore the date of 22d May 1876 it was really granted in April 1880, by which time the granter was insolvent, although the document was signed more than sixty days before his bankruptcy. The sum also in the I O U was incorrect. Therefore, taken by itself, the I O U, although ex facie a document of debt in the creditor's possession, was utterly insufficient to instruct loan. But parole proof was allowed of the circumstances in which the I O U was granted, and the alleged lender and the granter of the I O U were both examined on oath. On a consideration of the evidence the creditor was held to have established loan to the extent of £1554, 17s. 2d. Lord Kinnear remitted to the trustee to rank him accordingly; and the First Division of the Court adhered to that interlocutor, with a slight variation.

"In the present case, I think that the writing founded on is prima facie a sufficient acknowledgment of debt to let in parole proof. The other claimants have given no explanation as to how the entry which I have quoted came to be made. I therefore allow the claimant Mrs Tait a proof of her averments. The main object of that proof is to ascertain the circumstances in which the entry founded on was made; and the effect to be given to the writing may depend on the evidence adduced on the one side or the other; but I may add, to prevent misunderstanding, that I do not intend to exclude the evidence of the claimant herself."

did not bind beneficiaries or make their estate liable.[1] The question in the case of Briggs[2] was not the constitution of a debt, but merely whether the admission of a debt was sufficient to interrupt the negative prescription, and so overcome the presumption of payment of an admitted debt. An entry like that relied on by Mrs Tait, even if found in the books of the alleged debtor himself, would not support the claim.[3] The docquet was not holograph, and was not tested, and could not therefore be founded on as the writ of the parties signing it.[4]

Argued for Mrs Tait;—It was admitted that it was not competent by parole evidence alone to prove the constitution of a debt. But here, in allowing a proof of this claimant's averments, the Lord Ordinary, having in view the strong written adminicles, had applied the principle of the case of Williamson.[5] It was quite competent where, as here, the documents, to say the least, raised a strong prima facie case to allow proof in supplement. A document, if it was the sole foundation of a claim, required to be holograph or tested, but that was not so if it were used only as an adminicle,[6] and therefore the docquet was not to be disregarded. But then, in addition to the docquet, there was the more important document, the state of trust funds, signed by the trustee and executrix. She was the proper person to investigate claims against the deceased's estate, and her admission of a debt was binding.[7] It was not necessary that a document of debt should pass from debtor to creditor. Entries in the books of the debtor were sufficient writ.[8] As regarded the beneficiaries, the state of trust funds was in the position of a fitted account, and did not require to be probative.[9]

At advising,—

Lord Kinnear.—The question we have to consider is whether a proof at large should be allowed for the purpose of establishing the case alleged by the claimant Mrs Tait. The claim is for repayment of money lent to the testator, who died in March 1865, and the averment in support of it is that the claimant "from time to time made loans of money to him, several of which were of small amount," and that on or about the 1st of February 1865 she advanced him on loan a sum of £200, as is instructed by her cheque of that date in his favour; and finally that the total amount of her loans at the date of his death was £390. Except as regards the sum contained in the cheque of 1st February, there is no statement of the specific amount of any particular loan, or of the dates when any of the loans were made. The claimant gives no detail in support or in explanation of her case except what I have quoted; and it is this bare averment, that she lent moneys to the deceased, that the Lord Ordinary has remitted to proof. The claimant's counsel did not dispute the general rule of law—which, indeed, is too well established to admit of discussion—that a loan of money can only be proved by the writ or by the oath on reference of the alleged borrower. But he maintains that he has produced certain writings which are sufficient to satisfy the rule, either as being in themselves evidence of the loan, or as raising a prima facie case which may be completed by parole testimony.

The first of these documents is the cheque of 1st February 1863, and I agree with the Lord Ordinary that this is not a writ of the testator which is sufficient either to prove a debt or to displace the general rule of law so as to let in parole proof. If the cheque had been indorsed by the alleged borrower, and so had afforded evidence under his hand that he had drawn the lender's money from the bank by her authority, the case of Haldane v. Spiers[1] would have been directly in point. But it is payable to bearer, and it is not indorsed by any payee. It bears no signature except that of the drawer; and therefore it affords no evidence whatever that the claimant's money was drawn by the testator, or that the cheque ever came into his hands. It is in no sense the borrower's writ, and it does not even raise the question on which the Court was divided in Haldane v. Spiers.[1]

The other documents are of a different description. They are not the writs of the borrower himself, but they are writings under the hand of his testamentary trustees, which are said to bind the trust-estate. The first is an affidavit in support of a claim for return of inventory-duty, in which it is deponed that the executor had actually paid debts amounting to £1128 due and owing by the deceased at the time of his death, and payable out of his personal estate; and one of the debts so paid is said to be a sum of £200 due to the claimant. If the loan had been otherwise established this would not have been evidence to prove payment, but just as little is it evidence of the debt. So far as it goes it is against the claim.

The second document on which the claimant's counsel mainly relied is a note of the debts of the trust-estate outstanding at Martinmas 1868, which includes a "sum on debt due to Mrs Margaret Smith, £390." This list of debts is appended to a minute of agreement between Robert Dunn, one of the sons of the testator, and his widow, who was one of his trustees, whereby the son, who had obtained a lease of certain farms of which his father had been tenant until his death, agrees to take over the crop, stock, and implements upon the farms, and to pay to the trustee the sum of £1491, 18s., as fixed by certain referees, under deduction of certain "sums payable from the trust-estate, out of proceeds from the farms for crop 1868 paid or to be paid by him, and amounting in all to £718" odds. This agreement is a probative writ, being executed by the parties before witnesses and duly attested; and there is appended to it a state of the trust funds, shewing the assets and outstanding debts, and a schedule of accounts, shewing the sums paid or to be paid by Robert Dunn in terms of the agreement. The alleged debt to Mrs Smith is not one of these sums, and therefore it forms no part of the subject-matter of the agreement. But it is entered in the list of outstanding debts, and that as well as the other lists I have mentioned is signed by the two parties and by the witnesses to the agreement. There follows a docquet signed by five of the testator's children, who are said to have been of age at the time, by which they "approve of the arrangement for the conveyance to Robert of the stock, crop, and implements mentioned in the agreement, being satisfied that the same was more to advantage than a sale by public roup," and also "approve of and hold as correct and duly vouched" the prefixed state of the trust funds of their father as at Martinmas 1868."

[1] 10 Macph. 537.

Dunn's Trustee v. Hardy.

It is obvious on the face of it that the main purpose of this document was to embody the agreement for the sale of the crops and farm stock and implements to the testator's son, and to preserve evidence that it had been made with the assent of such of the beneficiaries as had attained majority But incidentally it contains a state of trust funds signed by the widow and certain of the children in which the existence of a debt of £390 to the claimant is said to be acknowledged. The claimant, however, was no party to the transaction. It is not alleged that the document was delivered or exhibited to her, or that she knew anything about it. So far as the children are concerned it is not a probative writ, because their signatures to the docquet are not attested. But assuming it to be sufficiently proved, it is nothing more than a discharge to the mother, by which as in a question with her they agree to treat certain claims as duly vouched. The signature of such a docquet may be effectual to preclude the beneficiaries who have signed it from challenging payments which may have been made by the executrix. But it did not oblige her to admit claims which were not vouched, nor did it relieve her or her co-trustees of their duty to see that debts were well constituted before paying them out of the trust-funds. Accordingly, the claimant's counsel said that the strength of his case did not depend upon the docquet signed by the beneficiaries, but upon the admission of the acting trustee and executrix. But the supposed admission of the executrix is just as ineffectual to prove a debt against the estate as that of the beneficiaries, and for the same reasons. The list of debts is not a writ in which the claimant had any right or interest. Even if it had purported to be an admission of debt by the widow, addressed to the claimant, and put into her hands as an acknowledgment to be held by her as her document, it does not follow that it would have been binding on the present trustee. The cases which were cited to shew that an executor's acknowledgment is sufficient to bind the trust-estate are really authorities to the contrary. In Briggs v. Swan's Executors[1] it was held that, although executors are entitled, as an ordinary act of administration, to grant acknowledgments which will prevent prescription running against a debt that is truly due, they can go no farther, and therefore that, as the writ of the executor is not the writ of the debtor, it will not prove the debt, so that, if they go on to pay without sufficient evidence, the payment may be disallowed on an accounting with the parties really interested in the executry estate. In M'Calman v. M'Arthur[1] an improbative writing by the deceased was found to have been homologated by his executor, but the executor was the principal beneficiary and trustee for his own behoof; and the Lord President pointed out that he might be liable to other beneficiaries if the debt was not truly due. But it is unnecessary to consider what might have been the effect of an acknowledgment delivered to the claimant, for the list of debts in question is not an obligatory document, nor was it delivered, so as to enable the claimant to found upon it against the trust-estate. For whatever purpose it was drawn up, it remained the private document of the trustee and beneficiaries. The observations of Lord Neaves in Duncan v. Shand[2] seem to me to be in point when he says that a written acknowledgment of the receipt of money will not infer a loan or a debt unless the writing has been delivered to the creditor. His Lordship says—"The doctrine as repeatedly laid down is that he who gives another a document acknowledging the receipt of money, without qualification or explanation, as a chirographum to be preserved against him, infers an obligation to repay, and this obligation arises not so much from the document itself as from its possession by the other party. That is the case of Ross v. Fidler,[3] and a whole series of decisions."

[1] 16 D. 385.

No. 119.

Dunn's Trustee v. Hardy.

If the documents are insufficient to prove the alleged loan, I am unable to see upon what grounds they should be held sufficient to let in parole evidence. The rule is that loans cannot be proved except by the writ of the borrower. It is quite consistent with the rule to admit parole evidence of facts extrinsic to the writing, in order to prove that it is in truth and in law the borrower's writ. It may be necessary, and it is perfectly competent, to prove handwriting, or to prove delivery, or, it may be, to prove the authority of an agent. There may be other purposes which might be figured similar to these. But parole evidence is not admissible except for the purpose of enabling the creditor to prove the loan, not by the parole evidence itself, but by his debtor's writ. It cannot be admitted to prove the essential facts which go to constitute loan without violating the rule of law.

Now, what are the facts which it is proposed to prove by parole? There is no averment whatever except that the claimant from time to time made loans to the deceased. If that is to be remitted to proof, the case must turn not upon the purport and effect of writings, but entirely upon the parole evidence. It would be contrary to the rule of law to allow a loan to be proved partly by the writing and partly by the acts and words of the alleged borrower. But in the present case there is no writing of the testator which could be treated as an item of evidence if a parole proof were allowable.

I do not think it necessary to examine in detail the cases which were cited to justify a departure from the rule. In some of these cases it may have been doubtful whether the writing founded on was sufficient or whether it was the writ of the borrower. But in all the result depended upon its being held that the loan was proved scripto. The case of Laidlaw v. Shaw[1] is an apparent exception. But that was a case of intromission to which the rule is inapplicable, and not of the direct loan of money. The money contained in a deposit-receipt belonging to one sister was uplifted by her agent and applied in payment of debts due by another. It was not thought doubtful that this could be proved by the testimony of the agent. The case of Williamson v. Allan,[2] on the other hand, is no exception to the rule. A loan was proved by an I O U. But that is an obligatory document which requires no evidence to support it. Parole evidence was led not to set up the document or to supplement its deficiencies, but because it was alleged to have been granted by a bankrupt in fraud of creditors. It was found to be an honest document, and that being established, the debt was held to be proved by the writ of the borrower and not by the parole evidence.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the claimant's case can only be proved by the writ of the deceased, and that as no such writ has been produced the claim must be repelled.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD ADAM concurred.

The LORD PRESIDENT intimated that LORD M'LAREN, who was not present at the advising, concurred.

Right in Security—Poinding of the ground—Lease—Registered bond and assignation in security of long lease—Registration of Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 26), sec. 4.—The Registration of Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857, authorises the recording of leases of thirty-one years or upwards in the Register of Sasines, and empowers the person in right of such recorded lease to assign the same in security of money borrowed, it being enacted by section 4 of the Act that the recording of such assignation in the Register of Sasines shall complete the right under it, "and such assignation in security so recorded shall constitute a real security over such lease to the extent assigned."

Held that the creditor under a bond and assignation of a ninety-nine years' lease duly recorded in terms of the Act was not entitled to warrant for poinding of the ground.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clackmannan.

IN January 1896 John Luke, Headswood House, Denny, brought an action of poinding of the ground in the Sheriff Court at Stirling against John Bryson Wallace and Archibald Cruickshanks, as sole partners of the firm of Wallace, Cruickshanks, & Company, iron-founders, Denny, and as individuals. The action proceeded upon a bond and assignation in security of a lease of certain subjects in the parish of Denny for ninety-nine years, and craved warrant to poind the subjects on the ground let in payment of the principal interest, and penalties due under the bond. The bond and assignation in security was in the form of schedule (B) annexed to the Registration of Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857, and both the lease and the bond and assignation in security had been duly recorded in the Register of Sasines in terms of that Act.*

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(5) In any event, the pursuer's loan is not a debitum fundi, and poinding of the ground is therefore incompetent and illegal.

On 30th January 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Buntine) sustained the 5th plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed, and argued ;—This was a debt secured upon land, and therefore the action was competent.[1] By the Registration of Leases Act, 1857, such assignations in security were competent, and under section 4 of the Act constituted a real security over the lease to the extent assigned. A personal contract which gave a real right to the lands was equivalent to a debitum fundi.[2] The effect of the Registration of Leases Act, 1857, sec. 20, and the Heritable Securities Act, 1894,[3] was to give to bonds and assignations of leases all the statutory qualities of bonds and dispositions in security.

Argued for the respondents ;—This was a personal debt, and the fact of its being secured by an assignation of a lease gave the creditor no real right.[4] The Registration of Leases Act, 1857, sec. 16, made registration equivalent to possession, but not to infeftment, and gave no real right in the lands assigned.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not see any reason to disturb the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute. I think Mr Wilson's clients had no interest to raise the question. It is a question which has never been raised before. I suspect the reason why it has never been raised is because no one has ever been advised to raise it before. Looking at the Act of Parliament, I think the words of the fourth clause are quite ineffectual to give to the creditor under an assignation in security of a registered long lease a right to poind the ground. All the clause says is that "such an assignation in

JOHN ANDREW HAMILTON, Defender.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Lease by bona fide possessor without title—Assignation.—The title of a bona fide possessor of land, who had granted a lease of minerals for twelve years, was reduced when 3½ years of the lease had still to run. He then granted an assignation of the lease in favour of the true owner, who undertook to implement the granter's obligations. In an action by the lessee against the granter and the assignee for declarator that the pursuer was not bound by the lease, held (aff. the judgment of Lord Kyllachy, Ordinary) that the lease was not binding on the true owner when he established his right to the lands, and therefore that it was not binding on the tenant, and that the assignation had no effect, as the granter had nothing to assign, dies. Lord Young, who was of opinion (1) that as the lease had been granted by a bona fide possessor in the course of ordinary administration, it was binding upon the true owner, and (2) that if the lease was not binding upon him originally he was entitled to validate it by homologation, and had done so.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

(SEE Watson's Trustees v. Hamilton, 21 R. 451 and H. L. 35.)

The late Walter Whyte, of Bankhead, died in 1880, leaving a will, which contained the following clause:—"I also leave to my nephew James Francis Watson, . . . my estate of Bankhead, . . . but I wish it expressly understood that in the event of my said nephew James Francis Watson dying without leaving any lawful male heir of his body, then, and in that event, my said lands of Bankhead are to revert back to my nephew John Hamilton." James Francis Watson never made up any title under this disposition. On 6th November 1882, John Andrew Hamilton made up a title by notarial instrument, which proceeded upon—(1) the infeftment of Walter Whyte, and (2) his settlement.

The notarial instrument was registered on 3d November 1882. The warrant of registration bore,—"Register on behalf of Mrs Margaret Pollock or Whyte . . . in liferent and J. A. Hamilton . . . in eventual fee as within mentioned."

James Francis Watson died on 3d April 1883, leaving a settlement, and on 6th September 1883 J. A. Hamilton expede before the Sheriff of Chancery a general service as nearest and lawful heir of provision in general to James Francis Watson under Mr Whyte's settlement.

In January 1884 Hamilton entered into an agreement with Francis

Robertson Reid, by which the former agreed to lease to the latter certain minerals in Bankhead for twelve years from Whitsunday 1884. Reid worked the minerals until 1888, during which period he paid lordships. From Martinmas 1888 till Martinmas 1892 he did not work the minerals, but he paid the fixed rent of £75 under the agreement.

In July 1893 David Ritchie and William Lochore Brown, the trustees of the late James Francis Watson obtained decree declaring that Bankhead had vested in Watson, and that his conveyance to them had evacuated the destination to Hamilton in Whyte's settlement. This judgment was adhered to by the Second Division on 31st January 1894, and affirmed by the House of Lords on 4th June 1894 —21 R. 451 and H. L. 35. Decree of reduction of Hamilton's title was granted on 21st June 1894.

Watson's trustees made up an independent title to Bankhead, and on 24th October 1894 obtained from J. A. Hamilton an assignation of his right and interest in the lease which contained this clause:— "Provided always, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that the said David Ritchie and William Lochore Brown, as trustees foresaid, shall by acceptance hereof be bound and obliged to perform, implement, and fulfil the whole obligations and prestations incumbent upon me by the said lease, agreement, and letter of lease, so far as still subsisting and not already performed."

On 18th November 1890 Reid, the mineral tenant, granted a trust-deed for behoof of creditors, and on the death of the trustee the Court of Session, on 2d June 1893, appointed David Simpson Carson to the office.

Following upon the decree of declarator and reduction, Watson's trustees intimated to Reid and his trustee that they were in right of J. A. Hamilton in the lease of Bankhead, and demanded payment of the fixed rent from Martinmas 1892. Carson and Reid declined to do so on the ground that the lease was ineffectual on Hamilton's part, as he never had any right to the minerals.

In February 1895 Carson, as Reid's trustee, and Reid raised this action against Watson's trustees and J. A. Hamilton for declarator that the agreement to lease of January 1884 was ultra vires of Hamilton, and was then and is now ineffectual, "and that the same is not binding on the pursuers, or either of them, and that they from and since the date thereof, or otherwise from and since Martinmas 1892," were freed and relieved of all obligations purporting to be imposed on Reid, thereby, and for declarator that the agreement could not be assigned, and had not been assigned, to Watson's trustees, and for reduction of the agreement and assignation.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defender John Andrew Hamilton never having had any right to the said lands of Bankhead or the minerals therein, the alleged agreement between him and the said Francis Robertson Reid for a lease of the coal and other minerals mentioned therein was on his part ultra vires and wholly ineffectual. (2) The title, or alleged title, of the defender the said John Andrew Hamilton to the said lands and estate of Bankhead having been reduced, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for. (3) The defender the said John Andrew Hamilton had no power to assign to the defenders the trustees of the said James Francis Watson the said agreement, or any right or title to demand from the pursuers implement of the obligations undertaken by the said Francis Robertson Reid under the said agreement, and the said last mentioned defenders are accordingly not entitled to enforce implement thereof. (4) There never having been any valid or binding contract between the pursuers, or either of them, and the defenders the trustees of the said James Francis Watson, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for. (6) The agreement of lease is not enforceable against the pursuers, in respect that the said John Andrew Hamilton had no right to the subjects let, and that his pretended title to the same ex facie of the Register of Sasines, being without warrant and inherently null, did not enable him to bind the defenders, the true owners, to implement its provisions.

The defenders Watson's trustees pleaded;—(2) It being jus tertii to the pursuers to found any plea upon the said decree of declarator and reduction and the said assignation, or upon the settlement of Mr Whyte, and title made up by John Andrew Hamilton thereon, and the defenders the trustees of the late James Francis Watson being able and willing to implement the conditions of the said agreement of lease, the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons. (3) The pursuer Francis Robertson Reid having been personally bound and obliged by the agreement of lease, and the same having been validly assigned, the pursuers are bound to implement the obligations thereof.

Hamilton did not lodge defences.

On 7th November 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, decerns, and declares, in terms of the declaratory conclusion of the summons, declaring the term of Martinmas 1892 to be the date at which the pursuers were, and are now, and in all time coming, freed and relieved of and from all the obligations purporting to be imposed on the pursuer Francis Robertson Reid by the agreement mentioned in second conclusion, and reduces, decerns, and declares in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons," &c.*

* "OPINION.—This is an action of declarator and reduction brought by the tenants under a mineral lease, and it is directed against the lessor and certain other parties, who are (as it now appears) the true proprietors of the mineral field, and are also assignees to the lease under an assignation of the lessor's part of the lease granted by the lessor. The object of the action is to have it declared as against both defenders that the lease is no longer binding, and it seeks, as against both defenders, to reduce both the lease and the assignation. I do not know that I need refer to the exact terms of the summons. The proposition which it involves shortly is, that neither together nor separately can the defenders to any effect enforce the obligations of the lease as against the pursuers. [His Lordship stated the facts.]

"The pursuers maintain that John Andrew Hamilton's title having been reduced, the lease in question entered into between them and him is at an end; and in reply to the argument that the personal contract under the lease still subsists, and that the lessor, through his assignees, is still able and willing to perform the lessor's part of the contract, they contend (1) that they cannot be called upon to perform at the instance of John Andrew Hamilton, because being no longer proprietor of the subject he can no longer maintain them in possession; (2) that the other defenders, although proprietors of the subject, have no title to enforce a lease to which they were not parties; and (3) that they (the other defenders) acquired no such title by the assignation under reduction, because (a) the contract of lease had, as they say, fallen before the assignation was granted, and (b) because the lessor's interest in a lease is not, as they say, assignable, except as incident to a conveyance of the subjects let.

"Considered in point of principle, the questions thus raised appear to Reid's Trustee v. Watson's Trustees.

Watson's trustees reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary's judgment was founded on Weir v. Dunlop,[1] but that case was special, and was distinct, as the lessor was not infeft. Here the lessor was infeft on an ex facie regular title, on the assumption that the destination to Watson was evacuated by his death without a lawful male heir. Therefore a real right granted by the lessor was valid even although his title was afterwards reduced.[2] To maintain the reverse [3] was to misunderstand the case of Macniven,[4] which turned on a reservation that the lessees' right should stand or fall with the lessor's. A lease was in a stronger position than a disposition, because a lessee was entitled to rely on apparent ownership, and need not be judaical in criticising his granter's right. Besides, the lease was valid as a bona fide act of administration of Watson's property.[5] In leases there was no delectus personæ on the part of the lessee. Even assuming defect in the title, the contract between the lessor and lessee was confirmed by the assignation. The lease was assignable if the assignee me to be difficult. I am not, I confess, prepared to accept the proposition that the reduction of a lessor's title per se puts an end to the contract of lease, so that although the lessor were still able by arrangement with the new owner to secure the tenant in continued possession, the tenant would nevertheless be at liberty to refuse implement of his part of the contract. On the contrary, I should think, prima facie, that both parties would in that case still be bound—bound, that is to say, by their personal contract. If either was liberated, it could only be by the other party being disabled from performance. And, at least in other contracts than that of lease of land, such disablement would not necessarily follow from loss or absence of title. There may, I apprehend, be a quite valid sale or hire of what is or turns out to be a res aliena; nor is there, so far as I know, any legal impossibility in the seller or hirer duly performing such a contract. He may be able to do so, and may do so quite duly, by arrangement with the true owner. The peculiarity, however, of the contract of lease of land is this—that it is part of the lessor's obligation to give the lessee a title which shall be good against singular successors. And if, under the lease, the rent is or becomes payable to a person other than the proprietor of the lands, the lease cannot, I apprehend, be good against singular successors. That is to say, it cannot comply with the conditions of the Act 1449, c. 18. To secure therefore the lessee, and so perform his (the lessor's) part of the contract, it is necessary for a lessor whose title has been set aside either to reacquire the subjects under a valid title, or effectually to transfer his contract rights to the true proprietor. And that being so, the question in the present case seems really to come to this, whether the pursuers are right in their contention that the assignation which the lessor has here made in favour of the other defenders is incompetent and inept. If such an assignation is incompetent—that is to say, legally impossible—there is of course an end of the matter. If, again, it is competent and effectual, there seems no reason why the lessee should be liberated.

"Now, can it be affirmed that the assignation by Hamilton to the other defenders of his contract rights under the various leases which he had granted during his possession was incompetent and inept? Ex hypothesi at the date of the assignation the contracts of lease as personal contracts could implement the conditions of the lease. Further, a lease by one without title was confirmed by subsequent acquisition of title. Thus, if Watson's trustees, after reducing Hamilton's title, had conveyed the land to him and obtained a reconveyance from him, his lease to Reid would have been set up, and the assignation would have transferred to them an undoubted contract. The law should favour the direct course rather than the circuitous route.

Argued for the respondents;—The Lord Ordinary was right in following the case of Weir.[1] Hamilton's title was not ex facie valid. Ex facie it was null, for the notarial instrument proceeded on Whyte's settlement, which shewed that Watson was fiar. By the Act 1449, c. 17, a lease was not good against singular successors unless the granter was infeft, and had an ex facie regular title.[2] Here the title of the granter was not ex facie regular, and neither tenant nor owner could enforce it. It was erroneous to view the lease as an act of administration. The case of Mackenzie[3] was explained by Lord Young held good. There had, as yet, been no default—no failure on the lessor's part to perform his obligations. Why, the defenders ask, should there in these circumstances be any legal impediment to an assignation by the lessor to an assignee who is willing and able to give performance? There is of course no delectus personæ with respect to the lessor under a lease; and, as regards the suggestion that the lessor's interest cannot be assigned except as incident to a disposition of the subjects—that, the defenders urge, is a proposition unsupported by principle, unless in the sense (which is conceded) that such an assignation can only be effectual if made to the proprietor of the subjects—so as to vest in the same person the right both to the rents and property of the subject.

"The defenders also urge, and I think with force, that the object of the defenders could have been obtained circuitously by a conveyance of the estate to Hamilton by the other defenders (which would have validated the lease by accretion), and a reconveyance by Hamilton to them, which would have carried the lease as an accessory of the estate. That they say would have been clearly competent, and being so they deny the right of the pursuer to compel such circuity of procedure. They also point out (although this is perhaps a different matter) that upon the theory of the pursuers Hamilton remains liable to them, the pursuers, in damages for breach of contract, and is yet disabled from relieving himself by securing them in all their rights.

"I am bound to say that I feel the force of these considerations, and if the point at issue had been still open I should have had great difficulty. But the pursuers found on a judgment of the Court in the case of Weir v. Dunlop & Company, 23 D. 1293, which they say is conclusive, to the effect that such an assignation as was here granted is incompetent. And the defenders do not profess, or at least have not been able to my satisfaction, to distinguish that case from the present. That being so, I consider that I am bound by that decision, and do not feel at liberty to canvass its grounds. The only distinction which I can find—apart from the very unfavourable circumstances in which the question was there raised—is this, that in that case there was perhaps ground for holding that before the assignation there in question was made the lessor had failed to keep the lessees in possession—they having, before the date of the assignation, been, as I gather, practically evicted by the true owner. I do not, however, find sufficient evidence that the judgment proceeded on that ground; and, on the whole, I think my proper course is to follow the decision, which I need hardly say, looking to the Judges who took part in it, is one of high authority.

"I propose, therefore, following that judgment, to give the pursuers decree in terms of the summons."

in a recent case.[1] The assignation did not effect a cure, because a personal contract cannot be assigned. A person could not validly assign a lease unless along therewith he granted a conveyance of the land. Hamilton's assignation carried nothing, because he himself had no right. The Act 1449, c. 17, raised a lease from the position of a mere personal contract into a real right in a question with singular successors. But Watson's trustees were not singular successors, and did not represent Hamilton.

At advising—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—(After narrating the facts)—Upon these facts, the following considerations seem to me to arise. At the time the defender John Andrew Hamilton granted this lease, he was not in a position to do so effectively. He was not infeft, he had no title, and no right to the use and enjoyment of the estate, and therefore he could not as proprietor grant any effectual right of lease. The case was not one in which the personal obligation under a lease and the right to the subject of the lease were in one person, and there could be no effectual lease. By the decree of reduction in the former action, John Andrew Hamilton was found to have no title to the estate, and therefore in a question between him and the pursuers of this action there was and could be no effectual lease. But if he was in no position to fulfil his part of the obligation of lease, can he enforce the other part against the other party, or transfer to anyone else the right to do so? At the time when it was found that he had no right, and for months afterwards, the other party to the contract could have no answer to a demand by the proprietor infeft that they should cede possession, on the ground that the person who had professed to give them rights had himself none. And if they were in this position, then, as they had no one bound by their contract who could effectually keep them in possession, the question is, could they themselves be held bound? And if not bound, then a subsequent assignation by John Andrew Hamilton could not make binding on the pursuers obligations the correlative obligations to which the pursuers could not have enforced as binding on the true proprietor. But if the latter was not bound, no one was bound. And if the pursuers were not bound at the time immediately following the reduction of John Andrew Hamilton's title, they have done nothing since which can bind them in obligation to the new proprietors, with whom they had no contract.

These considerations have appeared to me to be of great weight. I have given attention again and again to the views suggested by the Lord Ordinary tending in an opposite direction, but without being able to see that they are sufficiently weighty to overcome them.

The case of Weir,[2] quoted by the pursuers, seems to me to be in point upon the general principle, and I observe that the Lord Ordinary states that the defenders were unable to distinguish the present case from it, and he states that he has also been unable to do so. I must say that when I first read that case that was my very distinct impression, and I endeavoured when listening to senior counsel for the defender to discover in the argument any sound ground for holding that the case did not apply, but I, like the Lord Ordinary, have been unable to do so. I think therefore that there is precedent for the judgment which the Lord Ordinary has pronounced. I confess I should have had diffidence rather than confidence in expressing my own view in such a case as this had the question been an entirely new one, not already considered and dealt with in this Court, knowing that there is a difference of opinion on the bench in regard to it. And I have not come to the opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to without much and repeated consideration of the arguments pro and con, both on the general principle and on the case of Weir.[1] But having done so, the conclusion at which I have arrived is that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right, and ought to be adhered to.

Lord Young.—The Lord Ordinary, if I rightly understand his note, is of opinion that the agreement of 24th January 1884 was at its date valid, and therefore binding on both parties to it, and further, that it remained so down to the term of Martinmas 1892, that is, for eight years and a-half of the twelve years of endurance specified in it. As to the residue (3½ years) I gather from his Lordship's observations that but for the decision in the case of Weir v. Dunlop & Co.,[1] he would have been disposed to hold that as between the parties to the agreement it was as binding after as it was before Martinmas 1892; that the agreement of August 1894 between the competitors for the property of Bankhead, made on the determination of the litigation between them, including the assignation by the defeated to the successful competitor of the outstanding leases on the lands of which his success had made him owner, was in all respects proper, and is not impeachable by the present pursuers, and that the pursuers, the lessees under the agreement of 1884, having got full and undisturbed possession of the subject thereby let, and complete implement of the obligations in their favour, not only during the eight and a half years till March 1892, but thereafter during the subsistence of the litigation between the competitors for the property, and the continuance of their possession till the expiry of the term of twelve years at Whitsunday next being guaranteed to them by the owner of the land in an onerous contract with the party (John Andrew Hamilton) who was bound to give it or procure it, they must fulfil their part of the agreement, which has hitherto been, and must, under the obligation validly imposed on the owners of Bankhead, continue to be, fulfilled to them.

The Lord Ordinary, although he indicates pretty distinctly that he has been influenced by the case of Weir v. Dunlop[1] to go against what would otherwise have been at least the strong inclination of his own judgment, does not seem to me, if I may presume to say so, to be quite satisfied that it is in point. I think it is not in point, and that we must consider the case before us irrespective of it. I think it is a peculiar and special case, and that it determines no general principle.

1. And first with respect to the agreement of 1884, the only ground for the declarator and reduction concluded for respecting it is that Mr Hamilton not being proprietor of Bankhead, it was for him ultra vires to enter into

[1] 23 D. 1293.

No. 121.

Mar. 13, 1896.
Reid's Trustee v. Watson's Trustees.

it. There is no other. Now, it is true, no doubt, that as in a question with an objecting owner it is ultra vires of a stranger to grant a lease of the owner's property. Here Mr Hamilton thought himself owner, and acted accordingly for fourteen years, during twelve of which his title was not questioned by those—viz., Watson's trustees—who turned out to be the true owners. Of course no one other than the true owner could challenge Mr Hamilton's possession, or the possession of tenants under him during these years. His tenants who took leases from him and entered on possession could not challenge his title to the property. I may say that I think it a universally true proposition that a tenant accepting a lease from anyone cannot challenge the title of his landlord. The trustees of James Francis Watson, who instituted proceedings in 1892, were the only parties who could disturb his possession, or that of any tenant of his.

It is certainly unusual for the claimant to an estate during his litigation with the party in possession to do anything whatever to disturb tenants in bona fide possession, and indeed such disturbance would, speaking generally, be impossible. But it is sufficient here to say that the successful claimants (Watson's trustees) did nothing whatever to disturb the possession or the rights under agreement with Hamilton of the pursuer or any other tenants, during the dependence of the title litigation,—that is, between 1892 and 1894,—and it does not occur to me that they could have done anything. After success, it was for their consideration whether it was possible, or, if possible, desirable, to interfere with possession on current leases from Mr Hamilton. I doubt if it was possible, and strongly incline to think it was not. As to the prudence and good feeling of simply homologating, as they did, the leases he had granted during the period of his possession, and relieving him of the obligations he had thereby undertaken by taking these obligations on themselves, I am unable to entertain a doubt.

The tenant the pursuer (I use the singular for clearness) says that he did not work the coal after 1888. I assume this to be the fact, although there is no admission, but think it clearly immaterial. He entered into possession in 1884, paid rent down to Martinmas 1892, and his possession, as the defender truly avers, "was not and never has been disturbed." Why did he not pay after Martinmas 1892? His only answer is (cond. 2) "in consequence of the litigation after mentioned,"—that is, the litigation as to the property title which commenced on 1st March 1893 (cond. 3). I cannot accept this as a good reason, not being prepared to affirm it as a sound general proposition that a litigation challenging the title of the party in possession of an estate entitles the tenants thereon on leases from him to throw up their leases. I should even go the length of saying that the proposition is extravagant on the statement of it. If the litigants cannot agree to leave matters undisturbed till the issue of the suit, they may apply to the Court to protect the interests of the party who may succeed, which may be done by appointing a factor to receive the rents and pay expenses meanwhile. But, as I have already observed, the familiar and usual course is to leave things alone and undisturbed, exactly as was done here. As to disturbing pending such litigation the possession of a tenant, I repeat that, in my opinion, the law would not, unless on some very special and exceptional ground, permit it, and would, on the contrary, protect such possession.

No. 121.

Mar. 13, 1896. Reid's Trustee v. Watson's Trustees.

It follows that the tenants being thus secured in their rights must fulfil their obligations.

This brings me down to the termination of the litigation on 4th June 1894, when the defenders Watson's trustees were ascertained and declared to be the owners of Bankhead. Was the tenant the pursuer (I still use the singular) then and thereby "freed and relieved" of the obligations imposed on him by the lease, and theretofore, I assume, incumbent on him as the counterpart of his rights? The pursuer's case here, if I understand it, is this, that his obligations by the lease, being to John Andrew Hamilton as proprietor of Bankhead, ceased when it was judicially ascertained that he was not proprietor. I cannot assent to this proposition. The pursuer's obligations could not cease while his rights subsisted, and it is too clear to require argument that his rights were not terminated by the judgment of 1894. John Andrew Hamilton could not after June 1894 satisfy these rights specifically without the aid of Watson's trustees, and it may be a question whether or not they were bound to give it. If they were bound, or, whether bound or not, did give it, I am of opinion that Hamilton was bound to satisfy the pursuer's rights specifically. The pursuer's argument here was that Watson's trustees did not enable Hamilton to satisfy the tenant's right to be continued in the possession and enjoyment of the subject let, but only undertook themselves to satisfy it on Hamilton's behalf. There is, of course, no doubt of their ability to satisfy it or of the validity and obligatory character of their undertaking to do so. What, then, is the distinction, or what can it signify to the pursuer whether his right is satisfied by Hamilton directly, or by Watson's trustees, upon an onerous obligation which Hamilton procured from them? Suppose that on the judgment being pronounced Hamilton had bought the property from Watson's trustees, is it doubtful that the lease in question would have been good and enforceable hinc inde till its expiry? But the case supposed is really not distinguishable from the present as regards the satisfaction of the pursuer's rights, the only subject which I am now considering, and the point which I desire to make clear being that if his rights exist, and he is sufficiently assured that they will be satisfied in the future as they have been in the past, his obligations also exist and must be fulfilled.

It was not till 24th October 1894 that Watson's trustees executed the deed, whereby they bound and obliged themselves "to perform, implement, and fulfil the whole obligations and prestations incumbent on me (J. A. Hamilton) by the leases," &c. referred to, including that to the pursuer. This was four months after the judgment in their favour, and in the view that they were during these four months free of any obligation by the lease or otherwise to the pursuer, it is urged that he on his part was also free, and was not put under obligation to them by their subsequent adoption and ratification of the lease.

Now, in the first place, I cannot assent to the assumption on which this argument rests, viz., that by the judgment in their favour they took the property free of the leases upon it granted by Mr Hamilton during his possession, and were at liberty, if they pleased, to eject tenants possessing under such leases. On the contrary, I am of opinion that when the title of a party in the bona fide possession of an estate is successfully assailed, as Mr

v. Watson's Trustees.

Hamilton's title was here, the owner is on the one hand entitled to have it, and on the other must be content to take it as it exists, that is to say, in so far as its existing state and condition has been produced by ordinarily prudent management. There must, of course, be management during the period, long or short, that the possessor and the owner are both ignorant of their respective positions, and if it was ordinarily prudent I am of opinion that the owner cannot assail it or the rights acquired by third parties in the course of it, and by reason of it. Innumerable cases might be put illustrative of this view, but it is sufficient to take the illustration of leases such as ordinarily prudent management required, or even warranted. I should hold, I must say without doubt, that the owner will, as the result of his success, take the estate with the advantage of these leases upon it, and that as regards the tenants he must take the place of the possessor who granted them, and whose title he defeated. This is the manifest justice of the matter as regards both the possessor who bona fide granted the leases, and the tenants who bona fide took them and possessed upon them.

But, in the second place, on the assumption, contrary to my opinion, that Watson's trustees were not bound to recognise the pursuer's lease, and take him as their tenant under it, I am unable to appreciate the only reason which has been suggested, why, in October 1894, they were not at liberty to homologate that lease, or why their homologation then should be inoperative. The only reason suggested is that there was a delay of four months. This delay obviously enough does not render the homologation inoperative in favour of the pursuer and against Watson's trustees, and it cannot be suggested that it (the delay) was, or conceivably could be, prejudicial to the pursuer. Watson's trustees were owners of Bankhead when the lease was granted, and had Hamilton possessed their mandate his act would have been intra vires, and needed no homologation. But subsequent assent by the party whose prior mandate would have validated the act from the beginning is homologation and equivalent to prior mandate. It was intended that the lease should be by the proprietor of Bankhead, or one having authority—his authority, express or implied—for none other could grant it, and error on the subject seems to present a typical case for homologation. Who was the proprietor, there being no delectus, was immaterial, provided he (whoever he was) authorised the lease, and equally so whether the error consisted in the granter thinking that he was himself the proprietor when he was not, or that he had the proprietor's authority when he had not. I am unable to perceive any distinction in this matter between a mineral lease, or indeed any other lease, and a sale, or hire, or loan, of a specific subject. The seller, hirer, or lender is absolutely bound by his contract, and may undoubtedly fulfil it by procuring homologation. I do not mean to say that a purchaser or lessee might not declare off if, when matters were entire, he discovered that the contract required homologation, which had not been granted. But the pursuer's case is as far removed from one of that kind as would be that of a buyer who had got delivery of the goods he bought and resold, or consumed four-fifths of them. The pursuer has under the lease in question been in exclusive possession of the property of Watson's trustees since 1884, and removed, and, I suppose, sold some considerable portion of its mineral substance.

Mar. 13, 1896. Reid's Trustee v. Watson's Trustees.

I have already said that I assume (though we have neither admission nor evidence on the subject) that the lease, after four and a half years' working under it, proved unprofitable to the tenant, but that I think is a circumstance immaterial to the question we have to decide. It may, however, be useful to point out more distinctly, that had the lease proved profitable to the tenant the legal rights and obligations of the parties before us would have been the same, and the decision upon them dependent on the same considerations. The purpose of doing so is to test the reason and justice of the pursuer's pleas by the consequences to which they lead.

Suppose that the lease had proved profitable to the tenant and disadvantageous to the proprietor, and that the defenders (Watson's trustees), prompted by a consideration of interest similar to that which actuates the present pursuer, had repudiated the lease as a nullity, or at any rate invalid to affect them, and therefore desired the pursuer to remove from their ground and make reparation to them for having, without authority, sunk and worked pits upon it, and removed a quantity of coal, their property. Such contention and demand by Watson's trustees would, indisputably, be in accord with the pursuer's pleas on record and his argument to us, and could not, consistently with them, be resisted. The continuous working and extraction of coal having endured for only a few years (4½) and the fixed rent being only £75 (we do not know what the lordship amounted to) the case is not so gross as may (legitimately for illustration) be figured. Suppose the working and extraction had continued for—say—ten or twenty years, and that the rent (fixed rent or lordship) regularly paid to the honestly supposed owner during that period had amounted to £20,000, and further suppose that the tenants' prospects for the residue of the lease had been undoubtedly good,—the legal rights of the parties would, I repeat, have stood exactly as they do here, and depended on the same legal considerations, for I know of no rule of law to enable me to distinguish between possession for five years and possession for ten or twenty years during which there was honest error as to the ownership of the ground, or between £100 and £1000 a year of value.

I can see no answer consistent with the pursuer's argument to the claim of the true owner for reparation. There might be a right of relief or to damages from the party who granted the lease, and thereby put the tenant in a false position, but this might be worthless, and probably would be in most cases where a large property is taken from the possessor, and all the tenantry thereon evicted with such claims upon him. I do not believe that it has hitherto occurred to any lawyer that our law was such as to admit of such results.

I venture in conclusion, and in the interest of both parties, to point out that on the assumption that the pursuer's case is well founded, viz., that this lease must be regarded as of no avail between him and Watson's trustees, and reduced accordingly, it follows clearly, in my opinion, that Watson's trustees have an unanswerable claim of damages against him for sinking pits in their land, and extracting and removing coal therefrom, nor do I think that he, on his part, could have any corresponding claim of relief against J. A. Hamilton, who offers him full implement, in spirit and to the letter, of his contract, and is admittedly in a position to give it.

Mar. 13, 1896. Reid's Trustee v. Watson's Trustees.

LORD TRAYNER.—The Lord Ordinary has pronounced the interlocutor now under review chiefly, if not altogether, out of deference to the decision in Weir v. Dunlop,[1] a case which, in his Lordship's opinion, cannot be distinguished in any material respect from the present. There is obviously a similarity between the two cases; and although each presents certain specialties in fact and circumstance, I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that in all essential respects they are the same, to be decided on the same grounds, and therefore with the same result. I shall not examine the case of Weir[1] further than to say that in it, as in the present case, there was a lease (or missives of lease) granted by one who had no title to the subjects let, that possession followed in respect thereof on the part of the lessee, that there was an assignation subsequently granted by the lessor of all his rights under the lease (or missive of lease) in favour of the person vested with the property of the subject let, and that the person so vested with the property (and assignee of the lessor) was willing to continue the rights to the lessees which the lease conferred. The cases differ in respect that the possession had by the lessee in the former case was shorter and of a different character from that enjoyed by the lessee in the present case. This difference does not strike me as having any material bearing on the question before us; while, as I have said, the points of agreement seem to me to make the decision in the one case a precedent for the decision of the other.

Apart from precedent I should have arrived at the same conclusion. In the first place, I think there never was a valid lease at all—that is, a lease which the lessee could not have challenged during any period of its currency. The granter of a lease of heritable subjects "must be either the proprietor of the subject let, or one entitled to the full use and possession of the subject, or one in the administration of it. The proper title, therefore, of the granter of a lease as heritable proprietor is an infeftment."—Bell's Prin. sec. 1181. Now, Mr Hamilton does not pretend that he was in the administration of this estate on behalf of some other; nor was he entitled to the full use and enjoyment of it as liferenter or otherwise. The lease, or more correctly the agreement to lease, entered into between Mr Hamilton and the pursuer bears to be "of coal and other minerals as after mentioned in part of his (that is, Mr Hamilton's) lands of Bankhead." It was therefore as proprietor, and in no other character, that Mr Hamilton agreed to lease the minerals. But he had no infeftment. The title on which Mr Hamilton proceeded, and the only title he had, was not an infeftment in the lands. A reference to the case of Watson's Trustees v. Hamilton[2] decided in this Division of the Court will shew exactly how the matter of title stood. Shortly stated, it was this. The late Mr Whyte of Bankhead by his last settlement left his estate of Bankhead to his widow in liferent, and to his nephew James Francis Watson in fee, with this addition, "that in the event of my said nephew James Francis Watson dying without leaving any lawful heir-male of his body, then and in that event my said lands of Bankhead are to revert back to my said nephew, John Hamilton." It was decided that under that destination there was a direct conveyance of the estate to Mr Watson vesting him with the estate as at Mr Whyte's death, and a simple substitution of Mr Hamilton which could be evacuated by Watson; that Watson did evacuate it by his general disposition; and that no right of fee ever descended to Hamilton. Upon Mr Whyte's settlement, however, Mr Hamilton had expede a notarial instrument, which was recorded on behalf of Mrs Whyte in liferent and himself in "eventual fee." It goes without saying that there was no warrant for recording any notarial instrument in favour of Mr Hamilton as fiar of Bankhead. He was not the fiar; the deed upon which the notarial instrument proceeds gave him no fee. The phrase "eventual fee" is novel, and expresses rather Mr Hamilton's expectation than his right. But certainly the recording of that notarial instrument did not give Mr Hamilton any infeftment as fiar or proprietor of Bankhead. That being so, Mr Hamilton lacked the qualification necessary to enable him to grant a valid and binding lease of Bankhead or the minerals therein. Now, I think the pursuer could at any time during the currency of the pretended lease have thrown it up on the ground that the lessor had no title to the minerals let, and could not consequently protect him, the tenant, in his possession under it. He was not bound to wait until the real owner came forward to eject him.

If it is said that I am here disregarding the principle that a lessee cannot challenge his lessor's title, my answer is that that principle has no application to the case I am considering. That principle only applies where the lessee in a question with the lessor, or one in right of the lessor, is maintaining some right or claiming some benefit under or in respect of the lease, not where he is renouncing or repudiating the lease.

In the second place, if the lease was not valid and binding on the pursuer, then the subsequent assignation of it to the defender was of no avail. Mr Hamilton by his assignation could give no higher or better right to his assignee than he had himself. If he had no enforceable right under the lease his assignee could have none by virtue of the assignation. But further, when the assignation was granted, the lease as a contract had come to an end. The lessor's title, such as it was, had been reduced, and the reduction of a lessor's title extinguishes the lease. It was therefore an assignation to a lease which the supposed lessor had no title whatever to enforce; it was a lease which he was never in a position effectually to grant. But what he had never power to grant, and could certainly not now enforce, he could not with any effect assign. Without a valid assignation in their favour the defenders cannot enforce the lease. It is a contract to which they are not parties.

It is said, however, on behalf of the defenders, that the pursuer should be held bound by the lease, because he was not, in point of fact, disturbed in his possession while he held under Mr Hamilton, and that they do not wish or propose to disturb him now; that he has got all he bargained for either from Mr Hamilton or them. This argument was thought to be illustrated or enforced by reference to the case of a sale of a res aliena. I confess I do not see how the illustration aids the argument. Suppose a case. Suppose that A sells to B a subject belonging to C, and that whether B knows or does not know that the thing belongs to C. When the time for delivery of the thing sold arrives, if A can deliver it, it is of no consequence to whom it had previously belonged. It is in the lawful possession of A at the time for delivery, he can fulfil his contract by delivery, and it is not in B's mouth to say, "When you sold this to me it was not yours." But if A said to B "I cannot deliver the subject sold because it belongs to C, but he is willing to sell it to you on the very same terms as those on which I sold," would that be fulfilment of his contract, or would B be bound to transact with C? Certainly not. Yet here, according to the defenders' argument, B is bound to contract with C, and must take from C what he had bought from A. But it may perhaps be said that the case I have used in illustration is different from the case here, inasmuch as in the case supposed there was no delivery at all under the contract, while here there was at least partial delivery. Well, I will suppose another case. A contracts with B to supply him with 500 tons of a special brand of pig-iron in each month for a year. He fulfils his contract for the first nine months and then informs B that he is not in a condition to fulfil the contract farther, and that C, a third party, will take up the contract and fulfil it on the same terms as had originally been bargained for. That case is very like the present. Three-fourths of the contract time had passed; three-fourths of the contracted quantity had been delivered and disposed of; would B be bound to contract with C for the remaining fourth? I answer again in the negative. B may contract with C if he pleases, but he cannot be compelled to contract with him. No more can the pursuer be compelled to take the defender as his lessor—as his co-contractor—in the partial fulfilment of a contract made with Mr Hamilton and him only. In the case just supposed I spoke of C as a third party, and did so of set purpose, in order to note that I am not touching upon the question of how far one who is really a principal may insist on a contract partially fulfilled originally entered into by his agent in his own (that is, the agent's) name, or how far a contract partially fulfilled may be insisted in by one who is the successor or representative of the person who originally contracted. This question does not arise here, for Mr Hamilton never was the agent for Watson's trustees, and Watson's trustees are in no sense the successors or representatives of Mr Hamilton in the lands of Bankhead. Further, let me observe that the willingness of the defenders to continue the pursuer in possession under the lease cannot make such continuance an obligation on the pursuer. Their willingness rather points to there being no such obligation. If the pursuer is bound to remain as tenant, the defenders are bound—willing or unwilling—to keep him. If the pursuer remained tenant only because of the defenders' willingness or consent that he should do so, then he remains tenant not by obligation but by consent on his part. And this leads me to notice, in the third place, another ground on which I think the pursuer entitled to our judgment. At the date when Mr Hamilton's pretended title was reduced, and the estate of Bankhead declared to be vested in Mr Watson's trustees by virtue of Mr Watson's settlement, Watson's trustees were not bound by the lease either under the provisions of the Act 1449 or otherwise. They were absolutely entitled to say to the pursuer,—You are occupying our subjects without title, and you must leave. To that there was no answer. There was not even the answer that Mr Hamilton at the time of granting the lease had a title on record which was ex facie valid. In my opinion, the record, if examined, would have shewn that he had no title whatever to Bankhead. "Eventual fee" (which was all that the record shewed in Mr Hamilton), if it means anything, does not mean present fee, but a fee which may eventually descend—but equally may not. It was not an infeftment as of fee. Accordingly, I repeat that Mr Watson's trustees were not bound by the lease in question when they vindicated their right to Bankhead. But if they were not bound, neither was the pursuer—it was a bilateral contract by which both parties must be bound or neither. And if the pursuer was not then bound by the lease, he has done nothing since which could have the effect of making the lease binding upon him.

The Lord Ordinary says that the parties could by means of a conveyancing device have made the lease binding. Perhaps they could (I offer no opinion as to that), although as the Lord Justice-Clerk said in Weir's[1] case in reference to the same suggestion,—"It would not have been fair and honest." But the device was not resorted to, and we have to deal now with things as they are, and not as they might have been.

It was also suggested in the course of the argument that if the pursuer succeeded in this action he would lay himself open to a claim at the instance of Watson's trustees for the value of their minerals which he had worked without a title. If that is the consequence of success in the present action the pursuer of course must face it. It is not in the least the question now before us, and cannot affect that question. With regard to that matter I would only say that the suggestion does not seem to me to be one calculated to cause the pursuer any serious alarm.

I am of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

the benefit of this proviso, the annual payments under the contract being truly the interest on a debt of which the principal is the capitalised value of the annual payments.

ON 27th June 1895 the estates of J. Copeland & Company, engineers, Glasgow, and the individual partners of that firm were sequestrated.

In October 1895 the trustees of the late James Bell, letterpress printer, Dublin, raised an action of poinding of the ground in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, against Copeland & Company, and the individual partners of the firm, and also against John Gourlay, C.A., Glasgow, the trustee on their sequestrated estates.

The pursuers set forth two contracts of ground-annual, dated respectively March 1865 and May 1873, each consisting of a disposition of the lands therein described, granted by the original creditors in the ground-annual to the original debtors, under the real burdens, declarations, and conditions specified, and, inter alia, under the real lien and burden of payment of a yearly ground-annual in the one case of £248, 16s. 2d., and in the other of £68, 7s., payable half-yearly, and under the declaration that the debtors should have power, at any time within a period specified, to redeem the ground-annual on payment of a capital sum equal to twenty-one years' purchase thereof; and the debtors further bound themselves personally to pay the ground-annuals stipulated, and in security disponed the ground-annuals and the lands themselves.

The summons concluded for warrant to poind the moveables on the lands disponed under the contracts of ground-annual, and to pay the pursuers out of the proceeds in satisfaction of, or to account of, the sums of £124, 8s. 1d., and £34, 3s. 6d., being the half-yearly payments due under the contracts of ground-annual at the term of Whitsunday 1895 for the half year preceding, with interest from the term of payment till paid; and of the like sums of £124, 8s. 1d., and £34, 3s. 6d. payable half-yearly and termly at each term of Martinmas and Whitsunday thereafter, with interest, the terms of payment being first come and bye-gone.

The pursuers pleaded that the ground-annuals and interest being unpaid and due to the pursuers by the defenders, and being debita fundi on the subjects described, the pursuers were entitled to warrant as craved.

The defenders admitted that the ground-annuals in question were due and had not been paid, and explained "that the defender John Gourlay, as trustee foresaid, is and has been ready, and offers to pay any interest on the pursuers' debt (i.e. upon his ground-annuals) up to Martinmas 1895, in terms of section 3 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, Amendment Act, 1879, and section 2 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Acts (1874 and 1879) Amendment Act, 1887."*

The defenders pleaded;—(1) Decree of absolvitor ought to be pronounced, in respect the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, section 102, confers a preferable right to the moveables upon the defender John Gourlay, as trustee upon the sequestrated estates, subject only to the payment of the interest which has been tendered, and for which alone the pursuers could poind the ground.

On 9th December 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, under reference to annexed note, repels the defences, and decerns in the poinding of the ground as craved," &c.*

and for the arrears of interest for one year immediately before the commencement of such term."

This enactment was repealed by the Conveyancing and Land Transfer (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 55, but it was re-enacted by the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, Amendment Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. 69), sec. 3; and an addition was made to it by the Conveyancing (Scotland) Acts (1874 and 1879) Amendment Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 69), which provided by sec. 2,—"Notwithstanding anything contained in the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, the provisions of sec. 3 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act (1874) Amendment Act, 1879, shall be applicable to all poindings of the ground by which moveables forming part of or belonging to a bankrupt estate, whether administered in Scotland or furth thereof, are sought to be attached or affected, and that whether the debts or securities in respect of which such poindings of the ground shall be brought shall have been constituted or granted by the bankrupt, or by any ancestor or predecessor of the bankrupt, or by any other person."

* "NOTE.— . . . The present poinding is alleged to be for the interest on a debt for the current half-yearly term, but the defenders say that a ground-annual is not interest on a debt at all, but that it is a perpetual annuity having no reference to any principal sum or debt. This, however, seems to me to be a very narrow reading of the clause of the statute. The result of this reading would be that a superior would have a preference over the trustee for his feu-duties, because the superior's rights are reserved by the Bankruptcy Acts, and a bondholder could have the statutory preference over the trustee for his interest, but the holder of a ground-annual (who is preferable to a bondholder) would have no preference at all. It is contended that a ground-annual is not interest on a debt in the same way as interest on the principal sum contained in an heritable bond. But I hold that it is an annual payment which has been fixed by taking a certain rate of interest on a principal sum, viz., the price of the lands, and there is no principle whatever in holding that the statutory preference applies to a bond and not to a ground-annual. The argument appears to me to be founded upon a constrained reading of the expression 'interest on debt.' All the other elements which go to confer the preference exist in the person of the pursuers, inasmuch as (1) they hold a security over the bankrupt's heritable estate; (2) this security is preferable to the right of the trustee; and (3) they are entitled to execute a poinding of the ground after the sequestration.

"This is not a case which, in my opinion, falls to be determined by nice inquiries as to what the meaning of ground-annual is, and as to whether it is not tantamount to interest and annual rent. It falls to be dealt with on a broader basis, viz., whether, in the sense of the statute, a ground-annual is not really an annuity determined by the price of the lands, and whether it may not from that point of view be fairly described as interest on debt. There is no reason whatever, that I can see, for a holder of a ground-annual being deprived of the preference under the statute, and for

Mar. 13, 1896.
Bell's Trustees v. Copeland & Co.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—The sum termly due under a contract of ground-annual was not interest on a debt. There was no capital sum of which such termly payments were the interest. A contract of ground-annual was a security for the termly payments, and for nothing more. The utmost preference, therefore, to which the pursuers were entitled under the statutes, was for interest on the unpaid half-yearly payments down to Martinmas 1895, and this the defenders had tendered.

Argued for the pursuers;—A contract of ground-annual was truly a contract for the payment of interest on a debt heritably secured in perpetuity, the capital of the debt being the capitalised value of the annual payments. Ground-annual was just annual rent, and annual rent was another name for interest.[1] It was not to be assumed that the Legislature intended creditors under a contract of ground-annual to be in a worse position than ordinary heritable creditors.

LORD YOUNG.—The creditor in a ground-annual is a creditor in perpetuity for payment of a certain sum annually. Now, that payment is secured on land. That is why it is called a ground-annual; it is an annual payment secured on land. I have already said that payment is due in perpetuity, and in order to ascertain the amount of the debt we must capitalise the annual payment in the ordinary way. The capitalised value is the amount of the debt. Now, the annual payment is just the return or rent to him on this debt. It appears to me such an annual payment is indistinguishable from interest. I think he is entitled to poind the ground for that to the extent allowed by the statute, that is, for the amount due for the current half-year and one year before. Now, the Sheriff-substitute has sustained that contention. I think, even on the literal meaning of the clause, that his view is correct. But according to the true meaning and intent of the statute it is impossible to doubt it. I cannot distinguish between the position of the respondent and the position of a creditor under a bond. I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor is right, and ought to be affirmed.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I think the argument for the appellants is ingenious, but it is based on a too strict construction of section 118 of the Bankruptcy Act, and if sustained would have the effect of placing a certain class of heritable creditors in a very anomalous position. The question comes to be whether the holder of a ground-annual is to be put in a worse position than a heritable creditor under a bond. I should be averse to so holding. The annual payment under the contract of ground-annual is not the amount of the debt; the debt is the annual payment capitalised. Accordingly the interest on that debt is just the amount which the creditor here is trying to recover.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

Sec. 368 provides that private improvement expenses may be imposed and levied at such periods as the Commissioners may think fit, and that at the meeting imposing the same the Commissioners shall appoint a day upon which they shall be payable, and other days before which appeals by parties complaining that they have been improperly charged shall be lodged and heard by the Commissioners, "and the decision of the Commissioners upon all such appeals shall be final." The owner of property abutting on a private street appealed to the Commissioners under sec. 368 against an assessment imposed upon him for private improvement expenses. The Commissioners dismissed the appeal. He then appealed to the Court of Session under sec. 339. Held that the appellant having submitted the question of his liability to pay the assessment to the Commissioners their decision was under sec. 368 final, and that the appeal was incompetent.

Elgin v. Thomas, July 4, 1856, 18 D. 1204, distinguished.

1ST DIVISION. THIS was an appeal under section 339 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892 * by Robert Ainslie Brown and Miss J. A. Brown, proprietors of certain subjects in Mayville Gardens, Leith, against an assessment imposed upon them for private improvement expenses.

The appeal was presented in the following circumstances:—

The appellants received a notice under the Burgh Police (Scotland)

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 339, enacts,—"Any person liable to pay or contribute towards the expense of any work ordered or required by the Commissioners under this Act, and any person whose property may be affected, or who thinks himself aggrieved by any order, or resolution, or deliverance, or act of the Commissioners, made or done under any of the provisions herein contained, may, unless otherwise in this Act specially provided, appeal either to the Sheriff or to the Court of Session."

Act, dated 28th February 1895, in the following terms:—"Although the statute does not require such notice, notice is hereby given to you, as an owner liable in costs therefor, that the Magistrates and Council, as in room of the Commissioners of Police, have resolved to cause" Mayville Gardens "(being a 'private street' as defined by the said Act, in which houses or permanent buildings have been erected on one-fourth of the ground fronting the same), and the footways, to be freed from obstructions, and to be properly levelled, paved, or causewayed, and flagged and channelled,—the carriageway to be of Macadam, and the footways of and the same to be otherwise completed in terms of said Act." The words "and the footways of" were deleted.

They subsequently received a second notice dated 24th July 1895, bearing to supersede the first, and being in precisely the same terms except that the words "cement concrete" were substituted for the word "Macadam." To both notices was appended a note in the following terms:—"The whole of the costs, charges, and expenses incurred by the Magistrates and Council (who are to execute the work) in respect of said works, are recoverable from the owners of premises liable therefor, in terms more especially of clauses 137, 138, and 139 of said Act; and, for any appeals as regards said works, reference is made to clauses 143 and 339 of said Act."

The appellants took no exception to the notices, and the work was thereafter taken in hand and completed by the Magistrates in October 1895.

On 24th October the Treasurer's Committee of the Town-Council by minute approved of the allocations of private expenses in connection with the work, and "agreed to recommend the Council to impose the sums therein set forth upon the parties therein named, respectively; and, further, to recommend them to appoint the 30th day of December next as the day upon which the said sums shall be payable; the 19th day of December next as the day upon which appeals, by any parties complaining that they have been improperly charged, may be lodged with the collector; and the 26th day of December next as the day on which appeals, in reference to such expenses, shall be heard by the committee, for which purpose the committee crave a remit, with powers to act for the whole Council in hearing and disposing of appeals."

At a meeting on the 8th November 1895 the Magistrates and Town-Council by minute "approved of the foregoing minute of the Treasurer's Committee, and resolved accordingly . . . approved of the allocation of private improvement expenses therein mentioned; and imposed, and hereby impose, the sums set forth in the said allocation upon the parties therein named respectively; and appointed, and hereby appoint, the days specified . . . for the payment of the said expenses and the lodging and the hearing of appeals, and further, remitted to the committee, with powers, as craved, to act for the Council in the hearing and disposing of appeals."

Thereafter the appellants received a notice, dated 20th November 1895, from the collector of the burgh bearing that "the Magistrates and Council, on 24th October 1895, imposed and charged you, in respect of premises of which you are owner . . . with 'private improvement expenses,' amounting as per allocation to £74 for levelling and paving of carriageway, relaying channel and kerb, and repairing footway, and that the council have appointed Monday, 30th December 1895 as the day upon which the same shall be payable;

the 19th day of December 1895 as the day upon which appeals by any parties complaining that they have been improperly charged may be lodged with me; and the 26th day of December 1895, at half-past two o'clock afternoon (within the Council Chamber, here), as the day on which appeals in reference to such expenses shall be heard."

Mr Brown and Miss Brown gave notice of appeal on 18th December 1895, and on 26th December Mr Brown was heard for both parties by the Treasurer's Committee, and the appeals dismissed.* This decision was confirmed at a full meeting of the Magistrates and Town-Council on 7th January 1896.

Mr Brown and Miss Brown then appealed to the Court of Session.

It was admitted at the bar that the Treasurer's Committee of the Council consisted of the whole Council sitting in private, with the treasurer instead of the provost in the chair. The undernoted sections of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, were, inter alia, referred to by the parties.†

Argued for the appellants;—(1) The appeal was competent under section 339, and should be sustained, the proceedings in connection

* It was stated by the respondents in this appeal that the grounds of Mr Brown's appeal to the Commissioners were (1) want of proper notice before the work was begun; (2) that concrete was used, not Macadam; and (3) that part of the charge was excessive.

† Sec. 54.—"The Commissioners shall have power to form committees of their number, either with directions to report to the Commissioners, or for carrying the various purposes of this Act into execution, and to delegate to such committees the powers competent to the Commissioners under this Act in whole or in part, with regard to the subject which may be remitted . . ."

Sec. 133.—"Where any private street in which houses or permanent buildings have been erected, or one-fourth of the ground fronting the same or part of such street has not, together with the footways thereof, been sufficiently levelled, paved, or causewayed and flagged to the satisfaction of the Commissioners, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners to cause any such street or part thereof, and the footways, to be freed from obstructions, and to be properly levelled. . . ."

Sec. 134.—"If any private street shall at any time be made, paved, . . . and put in good order and condition, to the satisfaction of the Commissioners, then it shall be lawful for the Commissioners to declare, and if such street has been paved and put in order on their requisition as hereinbefore provided they shall declare, the same to be vested in the Commissioners."

Sec. 137.—"The whole of the costs, charges, and expenses incurred by the Commissioners in respect of private streets . . . shall be recoverable as private improvement expenses."

Sec. 365 enacts that "private improvement expenses" may be recovered in the same manner as any assessment under the Act.

Sec. 368.—"The said . . . private improvement expenses may be imposed and levied yearly . . . or at such other periods as the Commissioners may think fit, and shall be payable at such times as they appoint, and at the meeting imposing the same the Commissioners shall appoint a day upon which such rates and expenses shall be payable, and another day upon which appeals by any parties complaining that they have been improperly rated or charged may be lodged with the clerk or collector, and another day or days on which appeals in reference to such rates or expenses shall be heard by the Commissioners . . . and the decision of the Commissioners upon all such appeals shall be final. . . ."

with the assessment having been wholly invalid. (2) The magistrates should have served a formal requisition on the appellants, calling upon them to do the required work. It was only on failure or default of an owner to do the work himself that the magistrates were entitled to do it at their own hand. That was clearly implied in the statute, and especially in sections 134, 141, 327, and 365. No such notice, however, had been given. The intimation of 24th July could not be held to be such a notice, for it did not sufficiently specify the nature of the work required to be done.[1] Besides, all reference to footpaths was deleted from it, whereas the notice of assessment expressly included them.[2] (3) Further, the assessment had been imposed, not by the Commissioners, as required by section 368, but by the Treasurer's Committee, and in the same way the appeal had been heard and decided by the committee, and not by the Commissioners. There was no warrant for that in the Act, for section 54 conferred no right on the Commissioners to delegate the power to impose or confirm assessments.[3] (4) Again, assuming that the assessment was validly imposed, it was imposed on the 8th November, but the intimation to the appellants bore that the assessment was imposed on the 24th October. Such an error was fatal.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The appeal was incompetent. Section 339 did not apply when an assessment had actually been laid on, but even if the appellants might have come to the Court of Session direct, they had elected to go before the Commissioners, and section 368 made the decision of the Commissioners final. (2) Section 133 regulated the matter in hand, and imposed no duty on the magistrates of first calling upon the owners to execute the necessary work themselves. If there was such a duty, then the intimation of 24th July was amply sufficient. (3) The assessment was not in fact imposed by the Treasurer's Committee. It was recommended by them, and approved by the Commissioners. But if it were held that the committee had imposed it, then still there was no objection to it, for the Commissioners were entitled to delegate any of their powers under the Act to a committee. The error in date was immaterial. It was not an essential of the notice, and no date need have been given at all. No hardship had resulted.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The provisions, upon the construction of which this appeal depends, occur in an Act of Parliament. Accordingly, I shall most decorously express my first remark upon them by saying that, doubtless for good reasons, their coherence and relation has not been made too plainly manifest.

The practical conclusion which I have come to is that this is an incompetent appeal. The present appellants, as I think, by their own act, submitted the question whether they had got to pay for this street to the Commissioners, and the Commissioners have decided that question against them. That decision, as I can best make out, is final. These propositions may seem simple; they are very far from simple on the statute.

In order to judge of the matter it is best to begin with the position in which the appellants stood when they appealed to the Commissioners. They had been formally notified that they had got to pay £74 for making a road, about which they had been previously informed that it was going to be made. Well, now, to take the first of the objections to this liability, which they now state, they were perfectly aware that they had not first been asked to do the work themselves. They say that the Commissioners had no right to make the road at their expense without first giving them the opportunity of doing the work themselves. Of the merits of this objection more need not be said than that, in this instance, the statute, not having done something, talks afterwards as if it had, and the suggestion is, that it is to be taken at its word. Such as it is, however, this objection is legal in its quality, and I think that it might have grounded an unsuccessful appeal to the Court of Session or the Sheriff, under the 339th section. The appellants, however, did not avail themselves of this remedy.

The other objection to the notice of 20th November, now stated by the appellants, is that a wrong date was named as that on which the assessment was laid on. By the time the notice was given the assessment had been imposed by the Commissioners, but the date mentioned in the notice was that of a committee recommending the rate, and not that on which the recommendation was acted on by the Commissioners. Now, I can quite understand that here, again, there was a question which might have been tried, although a somewhat technical one. But, instead of looking round and seeing whether there were any such points capable of being tried in a Court of law, the appellants appealed to the Commissioners themselves under section 368.

That section is a very curious one. It is now founded on, and I think rightly, as conferring a right of appeal against the rate or expense now in question. In most statutes a right of appeal would be conferred by substantive enactment. In this Act it is conferred by telling the Commissioners that, among other things which they are to notify, they shall notify the day on which appeals will be heard.

The way in which the case of the appellants comes within, or at least may be held to come within, the section at all, is also singular enough. The money which they are rated for is the cost of making up a private street. By way of simplifying matters, the statute says that this cost is to be recoverable as a private improvement expense. When the reader searches for this presumably special method of recovery he finds that the manner in which private improvement expense is to be recovered is defined (in section 365) as being the same manner as that in which any other rate is recoverable.

Now, the 368th section purports expressly to apply to private improvement expense, and I suppose that, at least in this Act, it may be held to treat of the process of recovery. Under this section, then, the appellants appealed to the Commissioners, and their appeal was refused. I shall, in the meantime, assume that the committee had power to dispose of the appeal, and I ask what was the statutory result? The section says that the decision of the Commissioners is final. I cannot get over this. The 339th section gives an appeal wherever it is not otherwise specially provided. I think that this 368th section is such a special provision. As already indicated, I consider that the appellants, being persons who were liable to pay or contribute towards the expense of work required by the Commissioners, had right to come to the Court by appeal under section 339, but if they chose to go to the Commissioners they submitted to a final decision.

The only remaining question is,—Did the Commissioners decide? Now, I take this question upon the footing that the body which heard and decided it was a committee, and certainly the attempts of the Commissioners to validate the proceedings by deciding a case which (ex hypothesi) the Commissioners themselves had not heard, cannot be regarded as successful. Nor do I feel sure that it would be safe to say that a committee of the whole Council would be equivalent to the whole Council in matters in which the Commissioners alone had jurisdiction, especially when we know that the committee had appointed to it a different chairman from the statutory chairman of the Commissioners, and that it sat with closed doors. But, then, section 54 satisfies me that it was competent to the Commissioners to delegate this matter to a committee. The terms of that section are quite general. I see and highly appreciate the reasons why the Act might well have distinguished between what are, constitutionally speaking, such comparatively high matters as assessment on the one hand and the execution of details on the other. This, however, is for legislators and not for Courts of law; and while I do not wish to say anything against the case of Thomas,[1] which was a decision on another statute, I cannot read into the statute now before us a distinction which the Legislature might have drawn and has not drawn, and which is not implied as far as I am aware, in any established principle of statutory construction.

Had this last objection been good, I should have held the appeal competent, as the import of the objection is that the Commissioners did not exercise their jurisdiction under section 368. As it is bad, I am for refusing the appeal as incompetent.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT refused the appeal as incompetent.

The trustee admitted his claim to an ordinary ranking only, and his deliverance was sustained by the Sheriff. The value of the poinded effects was £18. The creditor appealed to the Court of Session. The trustee objected to the competency of the appeal on the ground that the only question was the creditor's right to a preferable ranking, and that the actual sum in dispute was therefore below £25. Held that the appeal was competent, the value of the cause falling to be ascertained as in an ordinary Sheriff Court action, viz., by the amount of the claim made in the conclusions of the summons, or other initial writ, which here was the affidavit and claim.

Observations by Lord M'Laren on the right of appeal in cessios by reclaiming note under 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56.

Poinding—Delay in selling pointed effects—Supervening cessio of debtor—Right of poinding creditor to a preference.—A creditor executed a poinding of his debtor's effects on 25th July 1893, but took no further steps in the poinding, the debtor having from time to time made payments to account. Sixteen months thereafter the debtor took out cessio, and the poinding creditor lodged a claim to a preferable ranking in the cessio. Held that there had been undue delay on the creditor's part in following out his diligence by a sale of the pointed effects, and that the poinding was in consequence inept to found a preference.

Opinion on the question whether there is a complete transference to the creditor of the property in the pointed effects before their sale has been carried through reserved by Lord Kinnear.

1st Division. Sheriff of Perthshire.

THIS was an appeal at the instance of Mrs Margaret Stewart or Henderson against a judgment of the Sheriff of Perthshire, by which he sustained a deliverance of Daniel S. Grant, the trustee in the cessio of Robert Laing, refusing a preferable ranking to the appellant.

The claim by the appellant was made in the following circumstances:—On 11th March 1892 Mrs Henderson obtained a decree against Robert Laing for the inlying expenses attendant on the birth, and for the aliment of an illegitimate child, with expenses of process, and on 13th July 1893 Laing was duly charged to make payment.

Thereafter, on 25th July 1893, Mrs Henderson pointed certain goods belonging to Laing, the execution of poinding being reported by the sheriff-officer on the 29th July 1893.

The value of the pointed goods was stated in the report to be £18.

On 8th August 1893 Mrs Henderson obtained a warrant to sell the pointed goods, but the warrant, which bore to be in terms of the Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114,* did not specify the time at which the sale was to take place, and was therefore inept.

No further proceedings took place under the poinding, the warrant to sell not being put in force, as the appellant alleged, in consequence of Laing making payments to account. The last of these payments was made on 19th June 1894.

Section 26.—"That on the execution being reported, the Sheriff . . . if no lawful cause be shewn to the contrary . . . shall, if required, grant warrant to sell (the pointed effects) by public roup at such time and at such place, with such public notice of the sale as may appear to the Sheriff most expedient for all concerned . . . provided that the sale shall not take place sooner than eight days, nor at a longer period than twenty days after the date of the publication of the said notice of sale, and the Sheriff shall order a copy of the warrant of sale to be served on the debtor . . . at least six days before the date of the sale. . . ."

Mar. 17, 1896. Henderson v. Grant.

Laing having in December 1894 obtained the benefit of cessio, and the respondent in this appeal, Daniel S. Grant, having been appointed trustee, Mrs Henderson, on 15th December 1894, lodged an affidavit and claim setting out:—"That Robert Laing . . . is justly indebted and resting owing to the deponent the sum of £42, 11s. 4d., conform to state of debt annexed hereto, and extract decree therein referred to, as also execution of charge and report of poinding and warrant of sale following thereon, all herewith produced . . . Depones that a preference is claimed to the effect of receiving full payment of the debt out of the effects poinded by the deponent on 25th July 1893."

Thereafter the trustee issued a deliverance by which he rejected "this claim to a preferable ranking, but admits the same to an ordinary ranking."

The poinded goods were by agreement sold by the trustee under reservation of the rights and pleas of parties.

Mrs Henderson objected to the deliverance of the trustee, but on 17th May 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Grahame) sustained the trustee's deliverance, and found the claimant entitled only to an ordinary ranking.

The claimant having appealed, the Sheriff (Jameson), on 14th December 1895, adhered.*

The claimant then appealed to the Court of Session.

The respondent objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—An appeal in a process of cessio is subject to the same provisions and conditions as an appeal in an ordinary action in the Sheriff Court.[1] That being so, the present appeal was incompetent, for the subject-matter of the appeal was under £25 in value. The only question between the parties was the right of the appellant to a preferable ranking, or, in other words, to the poinded effects, and their value was £18. It was plain from the first that that was the de quo, although the forms of claims in a cessio necessitated the statement of the whole debt due to the appellant. What had come to be the actual money worth of the claim was the true test of the value of an action.[2]

Argued for the appellant;—The appellant did not dispute that an appeal in a cessio, when not taken by way of reclaiming note under 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, was subject to the same conditions as an appeal in an ordinary action. But applying these, the appeal was quite competent, for the value of the cause was £42, the amount of the claim of debt made by the appellant. The respondent's test was un-

* "NOTE.—Notwithstanding the very high authority of Professor Bell (Com. 7th ed. pp. 61 and 62; 5th ed. ii. 64), I feel bound by decided cases to hold that a poinding is not completed so as to operate as a transference of the property of the poinded effects, until a sale has taken place under the poinding, although, when such sale has taken place, the effect of the poinding goes back to the date of execution. In my opinion this doctrine is established by the cases of Tullis v. White, 18th June 1817, F. C.; Samson v. M'Cubbin, 1 S. 407; Lyle v. Greig, 5 S. 845; and Scoullar v. Campbell, 3 S. 77. I may also refer to Lord Ivory's note to Erskine on this subject. As no sale took place under the poinding founded on by the appellant, her objection to the trustee's deliverance must be disallowed."

precedented, viz., the value or reported value of the securities. The value of the cause was the invariable test, as that was set out in the conclusions of the summons or other initial writ. The case of Dobbie[1] was really an illustration of that rule.

LORD ADAM.—This is an appeal from a judgment in the Sheriff Court at Perth on the deliverance of a trustee in a process of cessio.

I have no doubt that appeals in a cessio presented under the 1876 Act are entirely similar to, and are treated precisely as if they were ordinary Sheriff Court actions. That is not the course which we might have expected to be followed in cessio appeals, because they are more analogous to appeals under the Bankruptcy Acts than to ordinary actions, but it is the case.

Now, the objection made to the competency of this appeal is that the cause is under the value of £25, and that accordingly it is not subject to appeal. The question, therefore, is whether or no the value of the action is £25. I have always understood that the value of a cause is to be determined from the conclusions of the summons or petition, and that we do not go outside of them to ascertain the value, and although the claim is not before us in the shape of a summons or petition, but in an affidavit, I think that this must be treated precisely as if it were a summons or petition, and that the value of the cause must be determined by the amount claimed therein. Now, as Mr Stewart has pointed out, the amount of the claim is £42. It may be that it may ultimately turn out that there is no discussion or dispute between the parties except as to whether or no the creditor has a preferential right over the poinded goods, but none the less the fact is that the claim is for £42, and is so treated by the parties, for the trustee in his deliverance "rejects this claim to a preferential ranking, but admits it to an ordinary ranking," i.e., admits the whole claim of £42. It may be, from all that appears, that there will be ample funds to meet the claim, but however that may be, the claim made was for £42, and therefore the appeal is competent.

LORD M'LAREN.—The question of appeal to the Court of Session from judgments in cessio proceedings is left by the Legislature in an unsatisfactory position. We must keep in view that the process of cessio bonorum was an extraordinary remedy for poor debtors, and was originally competent only in the Court of Session. There was a right of review at that time by way of reclaiming petition, the form being afterwards altered to reclaiming note. When the Act of King William (6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56) was passed it was thought proper, because of the smallness of the bankrupt's estate, to give jurisdiction to the Sheriff, but without depriving the parties of the right of proceeding in the first instance in the Court of Session. The mode of appealing from the Sheriff was by reclaiming note to the Inner-House. The reason of this is evident; if the appeal had been in the form of advocation, which at that time was the ordinary mode of bringing a case to the Court of Session from the inferior judicatory, the case would have had to go through the Bill-Chamber and then to a Lord Ordinary before coming to the Inner-House, and so the summary process of coming at once to the Inner-House by reclaiming note was established to facilitate the disposal of this class of small bankruptcies. I am by no means satisfied that this right of coming to the Inner-House by reclaiming note has ever been taken away. I do not find any reference to it in the later statutes, and it is not in accordance with principle to hold that a right of review is taken away by implication arising from the silence of subsequent legislation. I should have hesitated to hold that the Act of 1876 was meant to substitute a new appeal for the old reclaiming note to the Inner-House, because the words of the section can be read as meaning an appeal within the Sheriff Court. But then I think that the provision in the Act of 1880 (the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, 43 and 44 Vict. c. 34) means that cases of cessio originating in the Sheriff Court might be brought here by appeal according to the same rules as an ordinary Sheriff Court action.

I concur in the opinion which has been expressed, that the test of value is the sum claimed in the initial writ by which the creditor brings his case into Court. That has always been the test, and the initial writ here is the affidavit and claim. I agree that it would be more in accordance with bankruptcy practice to give an unqualified right of appeal as under the Bankruptcy Act of 1856, but there may be reasons for limiting it in the case of small estates, and at all events the statute is clear, and appeal is limited to cases in which the value is not less than £25.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have no doubt that this appeal is subject to the condition which applies to appeals from the Sheriff Court in ordinary Sheriff Court actions,—that is to say, that we cannot hold it to be competent if the value of the cause is below £25.

I agree that it is settled by a series of decisions, which cannot be questioned, that for this purpose the value of the cause must be measured by the amount of the claim contained in the conclusions of the summons or other initial writ, and not by the value determined as a result of the judgment brought under review. In applying this rule to the present appeal we must look for some writ which may be considered to take the place of a summons, since otherwise the provisions of the statute would be inoperative, and I have no doubt your Lordships are right in holding that the initial writ is to be found in the affidavit and claim in which the creditor sets out her alleged rights against the debtor. Now, the creditor makes a claim for £42, 11s. 4d. There can be no question that if the trustee had rejected it in toto the creditor would have been entitled to appeal. In point of fact he has not rejected it in toto, but only in part, by refusing to allow her a preference, but I agree that this in no way affects the value of the cause, as fixed by the creditor's demand, and that accordingly the appeal is competent.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT repelled the objection to the competency of the appeal.

The case was then heard on the merits.

Argued for the appellant;—It was not maintained, as the Sheriff seemed to think, that the mere execution of the poinding operated a complete transference of the property of the pointed effects, but only that as soon as the poinding was executed a nexus was imposed on the goods which the creditor could at any time render effectual by going on to sell. The debtor's sequestration within sixty days would have cut down that right, but a cessio had no such effect at any time, not being equal to a universal diligence like a sequestration.[1] Here the cessio was sixteen months after the poinding, and being a voluntary assignation by the debtor of his estate, the trustee had no higher right than the debtor, and could not defeat, any more than the debtor could have defeated, the appellant's diligence. Even arrestment on the dependence of an action was not interrupted by the bankruptcy of the debtor.[2] Then, again, mere delay in carrying out the diligence did not affect the creditor's right, although delay which could be construed into presumed relinquishment might be fatal to it. But relinquishment of diligence was not easily to be presumed, and all that the appellant had done was, by agreement with the debtor, and in consideration of his making payments from time to time, and for his convenience, to postpone further execution. Such conduct could not be said "to reasonably infer abandonment."[3] There being no intention to abandon, therefore, the mere delay had not rendered the diligence inept. In the case of Scoullar[4] there had been a delay of three years, and there were analogous cases in other branches of diligence which confirmed the appellant's contention.[5] The fact that the original warrant to sell was defective was not material, for the appellant might have at any time obtained a correct warrant, there being no limit of time fixed within which the Sheriff had to issue the warrant. That was in accordance with practice.[6]

Argued for the respondent;—It was admitted that a cessio did not necessarily operate a stay of diligence like a sequestration, but the trustee in a cessio was vested in the debtor's moveable estate to the same effect as a trustee in a sequestration under the act and warrant.[7] The strong presumption therefore was against the view that estate in the debtor's hands belonged to or could be carried off by a particular creditor. Creditors who had come into existence subsequently to the poinding, and who knew nothing about it, had given credit on the faith of the pointed effects belonging to the debtor. It was not necessary in the circumstances to maintain the ground of judgment on which the Sheriff proceeded, although it was perfectly sound and entirely warranted by the cases cited by him, and especially by the case of Tullis v. White,[8] because poinding was a diligence which in any view had to be promptly and timeously followed out,[9] and if it were not, then it ceased to be effectual to create a preference. Here there had undoubtedly been undue delay.[10]

Henderson v. Grant.

Besides, in executing a diligence like poinding, strict compliance with the statutory rules was essential, but here the warrant to sell was certainly incompetent. It was too late, more than a year afterwards, to have that corrected by obtaining a new warrant. The Act clearly intended that the Sheriff should fix the date of sale on receiving the report of the execution of poinding, and that it should not be left to the creditor at any time to obtain a warrant.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—(After narrating the circumstances)—The question is whether the appellant, in respect of these proceedings, has a right to a preferable ranking in the cessio to the extent of the value of the goods poinded.

It appears to have been maintained in the Sheriff Court that the effect of the execution of poinding was per se to transfer the property of the poinded goods to the poinding creditor, and that a sale was not necessary to complete the diligence, but that plea was not insisted in before us. It was admitted that a sale was necessary for that purpose, but it was maintained that the execution of poinding created a nexus on the poinded goods, which the poinding creditor was entitled to make effectual at any time thereafter, so long as it could not be shewn that he had abandoned the poinding. I do not know any authority for such a proposition, the effect of which would be to place poinded goods extra commercium, so to speak, for an indefinite period.

I do not see how this question could have arisen prior to the Act 54 Geo. III. c. 137, because prior to that statute the officer at the time of executing the poinding, failing payment of the debt, handed over the ipsa corpora of the goods poinded to the poinding creditor at the appraised value. It was by that statute that the goods were for the first time directed to be left in the hands of the debtor, and provision made for the sale of the goods and completion of the poinding. The matter is now regulated by the Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114. It appears to me that the provisions of both statutes clearly indicate that the poinding shall be completed without undue delay. Thus by section 25 of the last named statute, the officer is directed to report the poinding to the Sheriff within eight days of its execution. Then by the next section, on the execution being reported to the Sheriff, he is directed, if required, to grant warrant to sell the goods by public roup, at such time and place, with such public notice of the sale as may appear to him most expedient for all concerned, at the sight of a judge of the roup to be named by him, and by the 28th section the judge of the roup must make a report of the sale to the Sheriff, and lodge in the hands of the Sheriff-clerk the roup rolls, also within eight days of the sale.

Thus, it will be observed, that short and definite periods are appointed for the various steps of procedure necessary to complete the poinding. Then, again, it is not left in the discretion of the poinding creditor to determine when the goods poinded shall be sold; that is to be done by the Sheriff, who is to fix the time most expedient for all concerned, and it is to be done on the execution being reported to him. That does not appear to me to mean that he may do so at any time, no matter how long, after the execution has been reported to him. If it were so, it would put it largely in the power of the creditor to determine when the sale should take place, and at a time most expedient for himself, which is not what I think the Act intended. I am therefore of opinion that if the appellant were now to apply, or had applied at any time after lodging her affidavit and claim in the cessio, for a warrant to sell the poinded goods, the Sheriff could not competently have granted it. Her inchoate diligence, it appears to me, cannot now be completed, and therefore can afford no ground for a preferable ranking.

If undue delay in carrying through the sale of the poinded goods be a relevant consideration at all in such cases, there can be no doubt of its application in this case.

I therefore think the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree. I think the principle that regulates cases of this kind is that, while an executed poinding does in a certain sense give a preference, it is only to this extent, that the creditor, notwithstanding bankruptcy, is entitled to follow out his inchoate diligence, and thus make his preference secure. But it is a condition that he follows it out in accordance with the provisions of the statutes regulating personal diligence, and without any undue delay. In the present case the delay has been such as to make it altogether inequitable that any such preference should be recognised.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think it necessary to determine whether Mr Bell's criticism of the case of Tullis v. White,[1] which was referred to in the course of the argument, is correct or not, both because that decision proceeded upon the construction of regulations which are not identical with those of the statute now in force, although they are very similar to them, and also because in either view of the question discussed by Professor Bell the appellant's diligence is inept. The decision was that the property of poinded goods was not transferred until the sale was completed, and a note of sale thereafter lodged with the Sheriff-clerk. Mr Bell thought that the messenger's execution was an adjudication of the property, and therefore that it was the completion of the diligence, the subsequent sale not being so much the point of completion as a necessary adjunct, without which everything that had gone before became useless. But in either view it was indispensable for the efficacy of the diligence that the goods should be sold or judicially delivered within the appointed time. There may be cases in which the distinction may be material, but in the present case it appears to me to be of no importance whether the transference of property in the poinded goods was still incomplete when the officer's execution was reported, or whether being provisionally complete, it was defeated by the invalidity of the subsequent steps of the diligence, or by his delay to obtain a valid warrant of sale. There can be no question at all that the warrant of sale which he did obtain was inept, because it did not satisfy the provisions of the statute.

I think with the Sheriff-substitute that it is unnecessary to decide whether that defect might have been remedied if it had been discovered within a reasonable time. The question would have been whether the application for a new and valid warrant, in place of the inept warrant that had been granted, was or was not made in such circumstances as to be fairly within the condition of the statute that the warrant must be granted upon the report of the execution. But however that may be, I entirely agree with your Lordships, for the reasons stated by Lord Adam, that the application for a new warrant more than a year afterwards is too late; and that to grant a warrant at the time when the arrangement was made by the appellant and the trustee, with the holder of the goods, would have been altogether beyond the powers conferred upon the Sheriff by the statute.

It appears to me therefore that at that time the property of the poinded goods had not been transferred to the creditor, but still remained with the debtor, and that it was too late for him to convert his inchoate diligence into a complete adjudication by obtaining a new warrant.

The appellant's counsel argued that it was not necessary that there should be an adjudication and transference of the property in order to a valid poinding, but that the poinded goods were affected by what he described as a nexus, by virtue of which they must be detained in the hands of the owner, subject to the creditor's right to sell whenever he might think fit to apply to the Sheriff for a warrant. Now, I agree with what Lord Adam has said, that there is no authority for that proposition, and I think it altogether inconsistent with the nature and operation of the diligence of poinding, because it is elementary that poinding operates as an adjudication or transference of the debtor's goods to the creditor, and if the creditor does not succeed in obtaining an effectual transference, he takes nothing by his proceedings.

The notion that the goods can be subject for an indefinite period to an attachment which is ineffectual to give them to the creditor, but effectual to prevent the debtor dealing with them, or to prevent other creditors obtaining right to them, appears to me to be entirely inconsistent with all authority. It is quite true that the Personal Diligence Act, like the previous statute of George III., prohibits the owner of the goods, the debtor, from disposing of them during the period for which they are left in his possession between the execution of the poinding and judicial delivery of the goods or the execution of the warrant for sale, and during that time it makes all unlawful intromitters liable to imprisonment, and to pay double the appraised value of the goods, if they are not made furthcoming.

But then that is a statutory provision for the purpose of preventing the goods from being carried away from the poinding creditor during the prosecution of the various steps of procedure which the statute introduced for the purpose of making his right effectual with greater safety to other interests.

But that provision necessarily falls if the provisions of the statute for the execution of the diligence itself are not rigidly complied with. The efficacy of the prohibition depends entirely upon the efficacy of the procedure for adjudging the goods, and if the creditor has failed to carry out that procedure so as to obtain a good adjudication, the incidental provision against interference in the meantime with the poinded goods can have no effect whatever in giving him any other right which could come in place of the right which a complete adjudication would have given him. I have no doubt at all, for these reasons, that the poinding in this case was inept, and that the Sheriff's judgment was right.

No. 125.

Mackie v. Presbytery of Edinburgh.

THE PRESBYTERY OF EDINBURGH AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—Cheyne—C. N. Johnston.

Process—Declarator—Relevancy—Trust—Powers—Object of power—Church.—A church in Manchester was held by trustees under a trust-deed which entitled them to sell the church, it being declared that in the event of a sale the proceeds should be held by the trustees for such purposes as the majority of the Presbytery of Edinburgh should direct.

The church was sold, and in consequence the congregation was dissolved.

The minister raised an action against the Presbytery of Edinburgh and the trustees for declarator that a majority of the Presbytery might competently direct the trustees to make payment to the pursuer of such sums as the majority of the Presbytery might appoint by way of compensation to the pursuer for loss of stipend or otherwise. The pursuer averred that a majority of the members of the Presbytery were willing to direct an allowance to be made to him if they were satisfied of the competency of doing so.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that the action was not relevant, as the pursuer's statement did not shew that he was an object of the power given to the majority of the Presbytery of Edinburgh.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

THE "SCOTTISH NATIONAL CHURCH" in Manchester was vested in trustees under an indenture dated 16th March 1863.

The following summary of the provisions of the indenture is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) in the action after mentioned:—

"It provides that worship in this church, called in the indenture Scotch Church, should be conducted in accordance with the forms of the Established Church of Scotland by a minister in full communion with the Church of Scotland, and that any minister who might be elected to the church should sign the indenture and should thereby acknowledge his liability to the jurisdiction of the Church of Scotland, and that if he should incur 'such sentence, decision, or enactment of or by any ecclesiastical Court which would have had jurisdiction in that behalf if he had been resident in Scotland as is equivalent to deposition or deprivation according to the usages of the said Church of Scotland, such minister shall cease to be the minister of the said Scotch Church, and shall thenceforward be deprived of all power and right to officiate therein or receive any future benefit or emolument therefor.' It is provided that on a vacancy the right of electing a minister should belong to the communicants, above eighteen years old, being seatholders. It is further provided that the managers for the time should collect the seat-rents, collections, and subscriptions, and apply them in the repair, maintenance, management, and endowment of the church, as the managers, with consent of the trustees, might direct, and that any surplus should be paid to the minister.

"It is further provided that at any time the trustees, with consent of the majority of the Presbytery of Edinburgh, might sell the premises, and it was declared that the trustees should 'hold the moneys to arise from such sale . . . for such purposes as the majority of the members, for the time being, of the said Presbytery, at a meeting of the said Presbytery, may in writing direct.'"

The Reverend James Mackie, the pursuer of the present action, was appointed minister of the church in 1881.

On 29th February 1892 the church was sold by the trustees, who retained the proceeds in their hands, and did not appropriate them to any particular purpose.

On 12th June 1895 Mr Mackie raised this action against the Presbytery of Edinburgh, and the trustees acting under the indenture.

The conclusions of the summons were for declarator that the defenders the trustees were bound to "hold certain sums of money, being the proceeds arising from the sale of the 'Scottish National Church,' upon trust for such purposes as the majority of the members for the time being of the said Presbytery of Edinburgh at a meeting of the said Presbytery may in writing direct: That a majority of the defenders" the Presbytery of Edinburgh "for the time being, present at a meeting of the said Presbytery, may, under and in virtue of the powers conferred on them by said indenture, lawfully and competently in writing direct the defenders" the trustees under the indenture "for the time being, as trustees under said indenture, to apply any part of the money held by them under the indenture arising from the sale of the said 'Scottish National Church,' or of the income accruing therefrom, in making payment to the pursuer of such sum or sums as such majority may appoint, and that by way of compensation to the pursuer in respect of the interruption of his pastorate by the sale of said church, or in lieu of stipend, or by way of retiring allowance or otherwise, and that at such time or times, and under such stipulations or conditions as such majority may so direct; and that in the event of such majority of the said defenders" the Presbytery of Edinburgh "for the time being, present at a meeting of said Presbytery, so directing them in writing, it shall be lawful to, and incumbent upon, the defenders" the trustees under the indenture, "and their successors in office, as trustees under said indenture, to make payment to the pursuer out of the money held by them as aforesaid of such sum or sums, at such time or times, and under such stipulations or conditions, as such majority shall have in writing so directed."

The pursuer averred that he was duly elected in 1881, and inducted as minister of the church by the Presbytery of Liverpool. "At the time of pursuer's appointment, it was proposed by the elders and managers of said church that his stipend should be at the rate of not less than £300 per annum, and arrangements were made for guaranteeing this amount for two years. For that period pursuer's stipend was duly paid at the said rate."

After reciting the indenture the pursuer further averred that after September 1883 the payments of his stipend became irregular, and after some time ceased altogether. Consequent upon the sale of the church "the congregation of the said Scottish National Church has been irretrievably dissolved, and the pursuer, although appointed to be its minister ad vitam aut culpam, conformably to the constitution of the Church of Scotland, has been deprived of the means of earning his stipend. No part thereof has been paid to him for several years, and he has now no means of effectually enforcing payment thereof. The pursuer has thereby been left without any regular or permanent means of support, and he and his family have been involved in much destitution." "In October 1894 the pursuer presented a petition to the said Presbytery craving it inter alia to direct the defenders the said trustees to pay to the pursuer out of the moneys in their hands as the proceeds of the sale of the said trust property such a sum as should, in the opinion of the Presbytery, be a fair and equitable allowance to him in respect of the period during which he has been deprived of his income, and further to direct them to pay him in future such an annual allowance out of the said trust funds, or the income thereof, as should be reasonably sufficient to enable him to support himself and his family in proper comfort. This petition came before the said Presbytery for consideration at its meeting on 31st October 1894, when a motion was carried by a large majority of the votes of the members present expressing sympathy with the pursuer in his necessitous circumstances and remitting it to the Law and Ordinances Committee of the Presbytery to consider whether it was competent for the Presbytery to direct the trustees in terms of the petition. For this motion thirty-one members voted as against thirteen for dismissing the petition. At a subsequent meeting held on 26th December 1894 a report was submitted by said committee negativing the competency of directing the trustees in terms of the petition, and the adoption of this report simpliciter was carried by a narrow majority of the members present, only eleven votes being recorded in its favour. This petition of the pursuer was thus dismissed entirely in consequence of the report of the said committee against the competency of making to him any payment out of the money arising from the sale of the said church held by said trustees under the indenture. The pursuer, however, believes and avers that a large majority of the defenders the members of the Presbytery of Edinburgh would be quite prepared to direct the trustees to apply part of the trust funds in making a payment or allowance of some sort to the pursuer were they only satisfied of the competency of doing so, and the pursuer has thus a substantial interest in having the declaratory conclusions affirmed. In consequence of the circumstances already set forth he has been under the necessity of bringing this action to have the powers of the Presbytery over the trust-estate judicially determined."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders the Presbytery of Edinburgh having upon a sound construction of said indenture power through a majority of the defenders its members for the time being, present at a meeting of Presbytery, to direct in writing the defenders the said trustees to the effect set forth in the summons, the declaratory conclusions ought to be affirmed. (2) The pursuer, having a substantial interest in the affirmation of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, has a good and sufficient title to pursue this action.

The defenders inter alia denied that the pursuer was appointed to be minister of the church ad vitam aut culpam.

They pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The action as laid is incompetent. (3) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (4) Under the indenture of 16th March 1863, the defenders the Presbytery are not entitled to apply the funds in question in making payment of any sums by way of compensation to the pursuer in respect of interruption of his pastorate, or in lieu of stipend, or by way of retiring allowance.

On 19th December 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) sustained the first, second, and third pleas in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.* No. 125.

Mar. 17, 1896.
Mackie v. Presbytery of Edinburgh.

* "OPINION.—This action of declarator is, so far as I am aware, unprecedented; at least, no example of such an action was referred to. The pursuer began his argument by quoting a well-known passage in Stair's Institutes, iv. 3, 47, where he says that 'declarators may be pursued for instructing and declaring any kind of right relating to liberty, dominion, or obligation. . . . Parties may call whom they please, the conclusion being to hear and see it found and declared that the party had such a right.' But the unique peculiarity of this action is that it does not seek to have any right of the pursuer or any obligation of the principal defenders the Presbytery of Edinburgh declared or enforced. It is an action without relation to civil right or civil obligation. No such action has as yet, so far as I am aware, been entertained in our Courts.

"The defenders plead that the pursuer has no title to sue, that the action is incompetent, and the averments irrelevant. In considering these pleas, the averments of the pursuer must be accepted so far as consistent with the document on which they are based.

"The case has relation to the price of a church in Manchester, which had been built for divine worship in connection with the Church of Scotland, and had been vested in certain trustees, and was thereafter sold. The conditions under which this church was held by the trustees, and the power in virtue of which it was sold, are expressed in an indenture dated 16th March 1863, on which the pursuer founds."

(After the summary of the indenture before mentioned and a narrative of the summons and condescendence his Lordship proceeded)—"The pursuer states that the condition of this church and congregation had from time to time been under the consideration of the Church courts in Scotland; that sympathy had on various occasions been expressed for him in his position; that a petition by him for an allowance out of the fund had come before the Presbytery of Edinburgh, and that a motion was carried by a large majority 'expressing sympathy with the pursuer in his necessitous circumstances, and remitting it to the Law and Ordinances Committee of the Presbytery to consider whether it was competent for the Presbytery to direct the trustees in terms of the petition'; that at a subsequent meeting a report by the committee was submitted which negatived the competency of granting the petition, and that the report was adopted by a narrow majority; and he brings his averment up to this,—that a large majority of the members of the Presbytery 'would be quite prepared to direct the trustees to apply part of the trust funds in making a payment or allowance of some sort to the pursuer were they only satisfied of the competency of doing so.'

"As the defenders are the Presbytery it is known to them whether this statement is accurate or not, yet they neither admit nor deny it. Still, it seems impossible to hold their answer as an admission, seeing that they altogether resist the conclusions of the action.

"From this narrative it appears that the only obligation which the Presbytery of Edinburgh undertook towards the pursuer was to allow him to conduct worship in the Scotch Church. He was not appointed by the Presbytery, but by the communicants. He was not admitted by the Presbytery of Edinburgh, but by the Presbytery of Liverpool. The defenders came under no engagement to provide him with a stipend.

"There was some discussion as to the tenure on which the pursuer held his office, and as to his present position in regard to it. He maintained that his position was strictly analogous to that of the minister of a parish in Scotland, and that he held his office, like such a minister, ad vitam aut culpam; and he referred to various provisions in the indenture in support of that position; and, in particular, to the clause which has been quoted as

No. 125.

Mar. 17, 1896. Mackie v. Presbytery of Edinburgh.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuer had a direct interest in the right of the trustees to apply the funds in the way proposed being established. He was entitled to a declarator of that right on the principle laid down by Stair in the passage cited by the Lord Ordinary.[1] He was a party to the indenture. He still held the status of minister of the church or congregation. That was his until death, and he was willing to perform the duties belonging to the office. The proceeds of the sale were just a surrogatum for the church, and the pursuer had not ceased to be an object of, and to have a direct interest in, the purposes for which the trustees stood vested in the fund. Declarators in cognate circumstances had been held competent.[2]

The defenders argued that the action was incompetent and irrelevant for the reasons stated by the Lord Ordinary.[3] to his 'deposition or deprivation according to the usages of the said Church of Scotland.' The defenders denied that he was still minister of the congregation, or that he held his office ad vitam aut culpam, maintaining that no office was so held unless that were so expressed or necessarily implied, or unless the office was, as this was not, a munus publicum, as laid down by the Lord President (Inglis) in Hastie v. M'Murtrie, 4th June 1889, 16 R. 715. I think this contention is not material to the case stated on record. I think it impossible to contend that the pursuer held his office ad vitam aut culpam, for the reasons stated by the defenders, and also for the plain reason that the defenders had full power at any time to sell the church. But the pursuer avers that he is the minister of the congregation, and I find no averment that he was dismissed from that position; and I am inclined to take the argument on the footing that the pursuer holds that position or would hold it if a congregation existed. But the pursuer takes nothing by that concession, for he does not say that any obligation by the defenders results from that state of the facts; and this is not an action to enforce such an obligation. If this had been an action concluding that the Presbytery were bound to furnish the pursuer with some other building in which to conduct his ministrations to his congregation, the consideration that he was still the minister of the congregation might be relevant, although I do not suggest that that position would be maintainable. Under this record the allegation that he is still the minister of the congregation can be little more than the statement of a ground for an appeal to the bounty and favourable consideration of the Presbytery.

"The pursuer referred to various cases, as shewing that the Court will entertain an action of a declarator of a right before it has become exigible, and even while it is contingent. That has no doubt been done in one or two exceptional cases, such as Fleming v. M'Lagan, 28th January 1879, 6 R. 588, and Chaplin's Trustees v. Hoile, 30th October 1898, 18 R. 27. The case of Falconar Stewart v. Wilkie, 15th May 1892, 19 R. 630, quoted by the pursuer, was not a case of that kind, for the Court found that the right there declared was immediately exigible. But although the Court may have pronounced a decree of declarator in regard to a right which was contingent, they have never done so where the pursuer had no right at all whether present, future, or contingent.

"The pursuer must contend either that the Presbytery hold this fund in

Mar. 17, 1896. Mackie v. Presbytery of Edinburgh.

LORD M'LAREN.—The pursuer has instituted this action in the character of minister of the Scottish National Church, Manchester, against the Presbytery of Edinburgh, with which his congregation was connected, concluding that the Presbytery may lawfully direct that a part of the money arising from the sale of the church at Rusholme Road, Manchester, should be paid to him, or applied for his benefit.

The church in Manchester,—I mean the place of worship,—was held by trustees under an indenture, in which it is provided that the managers for the time shall collect the seat-rents, collections, and subscriptions, and apply the money in the repair, maintenance, management, and endowment of the church, and that the surplus shall be paid to the minister.

It is further provided that at any time the trustees, with the consent of the majority of the Presbytery of Edinburgh, may sell the property, and it is declared that the trustees shall hold the moneys to arise from such sale "for such purposes as the majority of the members for the time being of the said Presbytery at a meeting of the said Presbytery may in writing direct."

The pursuer in 1881 was appointed minister of the congregation in accordance with its constitution, and it is stated that under the arrangement between the congregation and himself he was paid a stipend at the rate of their absolute discretion, or that they hold it under the limitations of a trust. The pursuer's pleas in law do not shew which of these views he maintains. If the former, then the pursuer is a mere stranger, and an applicant for charity; and I am of opinion that an action cannot be maintained to the effect that the defenders hold a fund at their pleasure, and are free, if they choose, to bestow it on the pursuer. If the pursuer's case be that the fund is held under the limitations of a trust, then I think that the pursuer must bring himself within the trust, and shew himself to be an object of the trust, as in the well-known case of Ross v. Heriot's Hospital, 14th February 1843, 5 D. 589, rev. 5 Bell's App. 37. But in my opinion the pursuer cannot invoke the interference of the Court in an action like this. It is impossible to say that the pursuer is a direct object of the trust, if trust there be. The immediate object of this trust has apparently failed, at least for the present. I do not say whether it would be possible or not to bring the pursuer's claim within a scheme authorised by the Court for the administration of this fund on the cy près principle. But such a scheme, if settled by the Court at all, would be settled in the Inner-House, and probably the views of the Liverpool Presbytery would be considered. But I do not think that I can pronounce any judgment in the present condition of the case, affirming the competency of paying this fund, or any part of it, to one who is not a primary object of the supposed trust, and I do not see that I am bound to pronounce any decision to the contrary.

"I think the action should be thrown out, because, as I said at the beginning, it raises no question either of civil rights or of civil obligation.

"Further, the pursuer's allegations as to the favourable views of the defenders are far too vague to form the ground of any judgment. He says that a large majority of the Presbytery are in his favour, but the extent to which they favoured him does not appear. But if this be really the case, and if the majority of the defenders are, as well as the pursuer, desirous to ascertain the extent of their powers in order to enable them to afford relief to the pursuer, it might not be impossible so to shape the case as to raise a proper lis on which the Court might be able to adjudicate."

£300 for two years, and thereafter at a lower rate. But in January 1892, in the exercise of the powers which I have narrated, the property of the congregation, including the church, was sold, and the price remains unappropriated in the hands of the trustees. By the sale of the church property, without any arrangement having been made for the acquisition of another place of worship, the congregation has in effect been dissolved, and the theory of the pursuer's case is that he is entitled to be compensated out of the proceeds of the sale of the church property for the loss of his living. As I read the summons this claim is not put forward as a matter of absolute right. The pursuer only proposes that the payment of compensation to himself should be declared to be a proper application of the trust-fund, consistent with the provisions of the trust-deed and the power of sale, leaving it to the trustees to act upon the power or not, as they may see fit.

Now, the Lord Ordinary has discussed very fully the legal bearings of this claim, and I agree with his Lordship that the pursuer's claim is unsupported either by principle or authority. In order that the pursuer should obtain the declaratory judgment which he desires, it is necessary that he should shew that he is an object of the power given by the deed of foundation to the Presbytery of Edinburgh. But this is, of course, impossible, because the power of the Presbytery to direct the application of the fund is unlimited, and the pursuer is unable to shew that he has an interest in its disposal distinguishable from that of any other member of the public.

I wish, however, to be understood as referring only to the particular conclusion which is before us, under which the pursuer claims a personal interest in the fund. While the power given to the Presbytery is unlimited in form, it may very well be that the nature of the trust imposes a limitation which might, if necessary, be enforced by a decree of this Court. The subscribers, on whose credit the church at Manchester was purchased, doubtless left the disposal of the proceeds of the sale of the church to the Presbytery of Edinburgh, because they had confidence in the Presbytery, and believed that under its direction the money would be applied to purposes cognate to those for which it was subscribed.

But if it was proposed to misapply the money, and I am very far from suggesting that this is at all probable, I think we should hold that the minister, or a committee of members of the dissolved congregation, would have a title to enforce the trust, that is, to restrain the misapplication of the funds. Again, I do not say that the Presbytery would not have a title to have it declared by decree of this Court that the mode in which they may hereafter propose to exercise the power is a good execution of their trust. But the Presbytery has not proposed to make an award of compensation to the pursuer out of this fund, because I cannot accept the statement that individual members of that body are favourably disposed to the pursuer's claim as having any relevancy in a question of this nature, and we are invited to affirm the proposition, not that the pursuer has a right to a share of the money as a beneficiary under the trust, but that an application of the money which the Presbytery are not proposing to make is lawful. I am very clearly of opinion that the pursuer has no right to such a declaration, and therefore that the action is bad on the ground of want of relevancy.

Held that in taxing the expenses in an election petition, the Auditor had rightly refused to allow the successful party the fees of a third counsel.

(SEE previous report, supra, p. 178.)

ELECTION JUDGES. Lord M'Laren. Ld. Kyllachy.

On 28th February 1896 the Auditor in taxing the respondent's account of expenses disallowed the fees paid to a third counsel employed during the preliminary procedure and at the trial of the election petition.*

The respondent lodged a note of objections to the report, and argued;—The case was one of considerable magnitude, and three counsel had been employed on each side. Fees to third counsel should therefore be allowed.[1] In Walker v. Waterlow,[2] the petitioner had withdrawn the petition a few days before the trial.

Argued for the petitioners;—Walker v. Waterlow laid down the general rule that the principle of taxation as between agent and client was not the same when the unsuccessful party had to pay as when the client had to pay, and the fees of only two counsel were allowed. This rule had been followed in the unreported Wigtown Burghs case of Lockyer, and it was the rule in England.[3] It had been decided[4] that the expenses of three counsel would not be allowed in a case like this, which was not of great magnitude, although the losing party himself employed three counsel.

* The Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 51), enacted, section 68, subsection 17,—"The costs of petitions and other proceedings under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, and under this Act, shall, subject to any regulations which the Court of Session may make by Act of Sederunt, be taxed as nearly as possible according to the same principle as costs between agent and client are taxed in a cause in that Court, and the Auditor shall not allow any costs, charges, or expenses on a higher scale."

Hood v. Gordon.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I see no reason to doubt that the principle which we must follow in this case is that established in the case of Walker v. Waterlow,[1] and also in the case of the Wigtown Burghs.[2] That principle is that while the taxation must, as prescribed by the statute, be as between agent and client, yet as the expenses in a case like this have to be paid, not by the client, but by a third party, the principle of taxation, though not indeed identical with that between party and party, must yet be different from that applied in the ordinary case of agent and client. That being the principle, I think it can hardly be disputed that, except as between agent and client in the ordinary sense, fees to three counsel are not as a rule allowed. There may indeed be cases in which three counsel are allowed—cases in which it would be reasonable for an agent, without any authority from his client, to employ three counsel. But except in such exceptional cases, the rule, both in England and Scotland, is that two counsel only should be allowed.

Now, I do not consider that the present case was so exceptional as to justify a departure from the general rule, and I am therefore of opinion that the report of the Auditor, with the deductions he has made, should be approved.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship that we ought to follow the practice established by the Courts in England, especially when it is considered that there has necessarily been a much larger experience of the working of this statute in England than in Scotland. On the merits of the question my view is that when a statute authorises the taxation of expenses as between agent and client, what is given is the expenses which a prudent man of business, without special instructions from his client, would incur in the knowledge that his account would be taxed. Now, I do not think that a prudent man of business, dealing with a case which presents no special features of difficulty or importance, but which is very like the ordinary run of cases that are sent to proof in the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court, would take on himself the responsibility of employing three counsel, especially as he can always protect himself by employing two of the most eminent counsel who may be willing to undertake the duty. I therefore agree with your Lordship that the Auditor's report should be approved.

THE COURT approved the Auditor's report.

up as Protestants. In October 1895 the grandfather and an uncle of the children, who were their nearest male agnates, presented a petition craving the Court to deliver the children to them, or otherwise to ordain the manager of the Homes to bring up and educate the children as Roman Catholics. They averred that the parents of the children were Roman Catholics, and that they had both expressed the desire that their children should be brought up in that religion. The Court refused the petition in respect that the children had been sent to the Homes by their mother, who was their legal guardian, and that it would not be for the benefit of the children to disturb the arrangements made for their upbringing and religion, seeing that these had endured for three years.

1ST DIVISION.

HUGH KINCAID, bleachfield worker at Neilston, died on 24th May 1892, survived by his wife, Mrs Mary Kincaid, who died on 26th May 1893. They were survived by four children, the eldest of whom resided with his grandfather Alexander Kincaid, labourer, Neilston.

On 24th April 1893, about a month before their mother's death, the three younger children, who were born respectively in 1883, 1884, and 1886, were received into one of the Orphan Homes of Scotland, a charitable institution under the management of Mr William Quarrier, where they were well cared for and brought up as Protestants.

On 15th October 1895 Alexander Kincaid, the grandfather, and Alexander Kincaid, an uncle of the children, and their nearest male agnates, presented a petition craving the Court to "ordain the said William Quarrier to deliver the three children, viz., Alexander Kincaid, John Kincaid, and Hugh Kincaid, to the petitioners, or to any person having their authority; or otherwise, and alternatively, to find and declare that the said three children ought to be brought up in the Roman Catholic religion, and to approve of a scheme for that purpose; and to decern and ordain the said William Quarrier to educate and bring up the said children in terms of the said scheme."

The petitioners made averments to the following effect:—Hugh Kincaid, the father of the children, lived and died a Roman Catholic. Mrs Kincaid was originally a Protestant, but before her marriage had been received into the Roman Catholic Church. The children were brought up as Roman Catholics while both their parents were alive, and their father, before his death, expressed his wish that the children should continue to be so brought up. After his death the children continued to attend a Roman Catholic school "until 24th April 1893, when the three youngest children were illegally removed to one of Mr Quarrier's Homes in Glasgow." Shortly before 24th April 1893 Mrs Kincaid, who was dying of consumption, expressed herself as most anxious that the children should be brought up as Catholics, and arrangements were accordingly being made to send the children to Smyllum Orphanage, Lanark, when they were removed to Mr Quarrier's Homes, where they were being brought up as Protestants.

The petitioners further averred;—"The petitioners repeatedly applied to Mr Quarrier for delivery of the said children, but without success. They were not in a position to take legal proceedings at that time, but they subsequently, in March 1895, instructed an agent to write to Mr Quarrier, calling upon him to deliver up the said children. Mr Quarrier, in reply, sent copies of two documents to the following effect:—

"'To Mr Wm. Quarrier. Barrhead, 24th April 1893.

MARY CL. KINCADE.

"'Witness, James Baird.

"'Barrhead, 24th April 1893.'

"Jeannie Connley, referred to in the first of the foregoing writings, was the sister of Mr Kincaid, and is now dead. She was a Protestant. Robert M'Lean, mentioned in the said writing, is a working man, a religious enthusiast, and a street preacher. He was in the habit of calling upon Mrs Kincaid, and, as the petitioners believe and aver, it was he who conceived the idea of sending the children to Mr Quarrier's Homes. He made all the arrangements with Mr Quarrier for this purpose, and removed the children from Barrhead to Mr Quarrier's Homes in Glasgow.

"The petitioners believe and aver that the said documents, if signed by Mrs Kincaid, do not express her real wishes in regard to the said children. She was dying at the time she is alleged to have signed them, and was weak and facile in mind. The witnesses to the said documents did not see Mrs Kincaid sign, nor did they hear her acknowledge her signature. Their signatures were obtained by the said Robert M'Lean. The purport of the said documents is directly at variance with Mrs Kincaid's previous life and conduct. In any case, the petitioners submit that she had no right to alter her children's religion in violation of the wishes of her deceased husband, and in disregard of the religious training which they had received during the whole of their lives. The eldest brother of the said children is a Roman Catholic."

Mr Quarrier lodged answers, and inter alia, made the following statements:—"On 24th April 1893 the children were brought to the respondent's City Orphan Home in Glasgow by their aunt, Jane Connelly. She was accompanied by Mr Robert M'Lean. It was explained to the respondent that the children's father was dead; that their mother was ill of consumption, and not likely to live many weeks; that the father had been a Roman Catholic, but that the mother was a Protestant, and wished, in prospect of her decease, to make arrangements for the maintenance of the children; that she was in receipt of parochial relief on behalf of the children; and that she wished them removed from the control of the parochial authorities and brought up as Protestants. In support of the statements so made to the respondent, there were handed to him the two documents" referred to by the petitioners. "The respondent had no previous knowledge of the children. The form of agreement was that usually employed with reference to the admission of children to the respondent's Homes. The children were visited at the Orphans' Home, Bridge of Weir, by their eldest brother, James Kincaid, in or about June 1893, and by the petitioner Alexander Kincaid junior, and his wife, along with the said James Kincaid in February 1894, and on this occasion they were informed by the boys Alexander and John of their wish to go to Canada the following month. The two elder children, Alexander Kincaid and John Kincaid, were accordingly sent to Canada on 29th March 1894. Notice of the respondent's intention to send them there was as usual sent to the persons by whom the respondent had been entrusted with the children. The petitioner Alexander Kincaid senior refused to do anything for the support of the children during their father's lifetime, or after his death while their mother survived. During all her married life the said Mrs Mary Kincaid, the mother of the children, was obliged to work for her own living and for their support. She was a bleachfield worker. Owing to her not being able to earn sufficient for the support of herself and her whole family, she was obliged to apply for parochial relief, and she obtained an allowance from the parish even during the life of her husband, the said Hugh Kincaid. During the period that she was in receipt of parochial relief the children attended Roman Catholic schools as a matter of course, because their father was entered in the parochial books as a Roman Catholic. The signature of Mrs Kincaid was appended to the documents before mentioned in presence of the said Robert M'Lean, William Jack, one of the attesting witnesses, and Mrs Baird, the wife of James Baird, the other attesting witness, and was subsequently acknowledged in his presence. So far as the respondent has been able to gather, the subscription of said documents was the voluntary act of Mrs Kincaid, and the same expressed her real intentions and desires in reference to her children."

The respondent further averred;—"In these circumstances the respondent considers that the documents signed by the mother are a sufficient nomination of a guardian under the Guardianship of Infants Act; and that in face of these documents, he ought not to part with the children without judicial sanction on the application of persons who have hitherto taken little or no interest in the children, and have done nothing for their support, but have allowed them to become chargeable to the parish."

On 16th November 1895 the Court allowed the respondent a proof that the letter, No. 10 of process, being the first of the two documents above set forth, was subscribed by Mrs Kincaid, and by the witnesses by whom the writing bore to be attested, and to the petitioner a conjunct probation.

A proof was led, which shewed that the letter, No. 10 of process, had been signed by Mrs Kincaid, but that it had not been duly tested. It was also proved that the other document referred to in the letter had been signed by Mrs Kincaid at the same time.

Argued for the petitioners;—The writing which was said to appoint the respondent guardian was improbative and of no avail. The respondent had accordingly no title from the children's mother, and he was not a relative. The averments of the petitioners as to the father's religion, and as to the father's wish that the children should be brought up as Roman Catholics, were not disputed by anyone with a title, and the case was the same as Reilly.[1] A father had an absolute right during his life to determine the religion of his children, and after his death, their guardian was bound to carry out his wishes. The mother, as guardian under the Guardianship of Infants Act, was in no different position from an ordinary guardian.[2] Besides, at the time when she sent the children to the Home, she was in a dying condition, and did not fully understand what she was doing. The Court should at least ordain that the children be brought up as Roman Catholics. They could do that under section 4 of the Custody of Children Act, 1891, 54 Vict. c. 3.

Argued for the respondent;—While admitting that the document was improbative, it was proved that Mrs Kincaid had signed it, and there was complete evidence, therefore, of her distinct desire that the children should be taken care of by the respondent, and brought up by him as Protestants. As their guardian she had a right to arrange for their education. But the paramount consideration was the welfare of the children,[3] and it would be most injurious to them to once more change their religious training. Besides, out in Canada they had a better chance of a fair start in life than at home. The children had practically been abandoned by their grandfather, who had never done anything to support them, and had allowed them to come on the rates. In any view, therefore, it should be made a condition of the children being given up to the petitioners that they should repay the respondent the costs he had incurred in bringing up the children. That was provided by the Custody of Children Act, 1891, sec. 2.

Lord Kyllachy.—The petitioners in this case are respectively the grandfather and uncle of three pupil children, who have since April 1893 been inmates of the respondent's Homes, and two of whom have since February 1894 been brought up and educated in one of those Homes situated in Canada. The children are aged respectively thirteen, eleven, and ten. Their parents are both dead, the father having died in May 1892, and the mother in May 1893. The object of the petition is to obtain an order for delivery of the children, with a view, as it appears, to their being placed in a Roman Catholic seminary. There is an alternative prayer that the respondent shall be ordained to bring up and educate the children in the Roman Catholic religion.

In this case it does not appear to me that the circumstances are favourable to the demand of the petitioners. Their individual merits are not perhaps in question. But it has to be noted that while undoubtedly the nearest agnates, they have not taken up the office of tutory, nor do they propose themselves to undertake the maintenance and upbringing of the pupils. Their object, they admit, is to hand them over to a Catholic institution. For themselves, they have not probably been in a position to act otherwise, but it is the fact that since prior to the father's death in 1892 they have not shared in the burden of the pupils' maintenance. It has also to be noted that the mother of the children, who, on their father's death, became their legal guardian, was the person by whom, or at whose instance, they were handed over to Mr Quarrier. She was at the time on her deathbed—within a month of her death—and it is impossible to doubt that what was done was done with her cognisance, and that the motive must have been a strong one which induced her while still in life, to part, and to part finally, with her young children. No doubt the proof led has failed to establish the probativeness of the writings by which she placed them in the respondent's charge; and these writings therefore cannot be held as constituting a nomination of guardian under the Act of 1886. Still, the fact remains that the respondent derived his custody of the children from a lawful source. It is not admitted that the mother died a Protestant, although it is admitted that she had been so up to her marriage. But that question is not material. It is material that she deliberately placed the children in the respondent's charge.

What is, however, to my mind the conclusive consideration in the case is this, that the children have now been for nearly three years in the respondent's hands, educated no doubt as Protestants; but well educated and well cared for, and with the prospect, if left where they are, of obtaining a fair start in life. In these circumstances, I cannot hold that it would be for their benefit that we should disturb arrangements which have now lasted for so considerable a period. It may be—I express no opinion to the contrary—that prima facie the father's religion is the religion in which a child should be brought up. But if the guardian of the child, or those who are left to act as such, arrange otherwise, and the interference of the Court is invoked to control their action, it is not, I think, an unsafe rule that that interference must be invoked timeously, and not (unless in exceptional circumstances) after such lapse of time as occurred here. Extreme cases may, of course, occur, and they must be dealt with when they arise, but the question of creed is never the only question to be considered.

On the whole matter, and laying down no general rule, but having regard to the whole circumstances, and to the welfare of the pupils in the particular case, I am of opinion that the petition should be refused.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

cost of erection. There was no other building within the burgh of a similar construction and applied to similar purposes. The proprietors maintained that the several portions of the premises fell to be valued as separate subjects by comparison with the value of similar subjects in the burgh.

Held that the Assessor was right in valuing the premises as a unum quid by taking a percentage of their cost.

ON 11th September 1895, the St. Cuthbert's Co-operative Association, Limited, appealed to the Magistrates and Council of Edinburgh against the Assessor having entered premises belonging to them described as "bakery, workshops, stables, &c.," and situated at High Riggs, as of the yearly rent or value of £1625, and craved that the valuation should be reduced to £748.

The premises in question which were in the occupation of the proprietors, formed one range of buildings including a bakery, workshops, stables, a refrigerator, and all other requirements necessary for carrying on the varied business of the Association. There was no building of analogous construction in existence in Edinburgh.

The Assessor had arrived at his valuation by taking 4 per cent on the cost of the site, 7 per cent on the cost of the buildings, and 7 per cent on the cost of the fixed machinery.

The Co-operative Association led evidence to shew the yearly value of similar bakeries, workshops, stables, and refrigerators in Edinburgh as separate subjects. They contended that as the structure was adapted for four main branches of industry "the proper method of ascertaining the value of the whole structure was to determine the value of each of these four parts separately, by ascertaining the value of an existing structure of similar nature and accommodation in another part of the town, and adding together the four values so obtained."

The Magistrates preferred the principle adopted by the Assessor, but considering that in the circumstances of the case the valuation fixed by him was too high, they reduced it to £1200.

The Co-operative Association obtained a case. The foregoing facts appeared from the case.

Argued for the appellants;—The fact that the separate industries were combined in the same premises was a mere coincidence. They were each independent of one another, and fell to be valued as separate subjects by comparison with similar subjects in the burgh. Valuation by percentage on their cost was inadmissible.[1]

The respondent was not called upon.

At advising,—

LORD KYLLACHY.—I see no reason to doubt that the decision of the Magistrates in this case was right. I cannot affirm that they were wrong in declining to break up this building into sections, and to value each of these sections separately. Nor can I say that in the circumstances they were wrong in valuing the subject by taking a percentage upon the cost. It does not appear that any other or better means of arriving at the value existed. There is no hard and fast rule that the element of cost shall be discarded as an element in valuation. On the contrary, when there is no other measure of value available, such as rent paid for the subjects, or rent paid for or values attached to similar subjects, it may be a quite proper method to take a percentage upon the cost. The Magistrates have not, therefore, erred in any matter of principle, and I see no reason to interfere with their decision upon the facts.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree with your Lordship that this appeal should be dismissed. I think the decisions on valuation by the cost of erection go no further than this, that if there are other materials for estimating the annual value, they should, as a rule, be adopted in preference, or at least be considered in conjunction with cost of erection. But we have never decided that the cost of erection should not be taken into account in cases where there is no other way of arriving at the annual value.

In the present case there is no similar building with which the subject of this appeal can be compared. I think it would have been a mistake to split up the building into several sections, and value each of these sections separately. The Assessor was entitled to treat the whole subject as a unum quid. He did so, and, having no other means of arriving at a valuation on that basis, he has taken a certain percentage on the cost. The Magistrates did not adopt the Assessor's percentage, but they approved of the principle upon which the Assessor proceeded. I think they were right in doing so, and that there is no reason for our altering their valuation. I therefore agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates was right.

Case 174.

THE BURNTISLAND OIL COMPANY erected a large number of workmen's houses about a mile from the town of Burntisland, for the use of the employees in the factory. Some of the houses were in the parish of Burntisland and some in the adjoining parish of Kinghorn. The business having proved unprofitable, the company closed their works, which were dismantled. As a result most of the houses became vacant. There were 143 houses in all, whereof 121 were occupied in 1892-3, 72 in 1893-4, 48 in 1894-5, and 14 in 1895-6—13 of the last mentioned number being in Burntisland, and one in Kinghorn.

Burntisland Oil Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Fife.

the Burntisland Oil Company appealed against the following entries in the Valuation Roll:—

No.	Description and Situation of Subject.	Proprietor.	Tenant.	Occupier.	Yearly rent or value.
		Parish of Burntisland.
49	Workmen's Houses and Reading Room, Binnend.	The Burntisland Oil Company (Limited).		Proprietors (Empty £420 17s. 10d.)	£481 7 10
		Parish of Kinghorn.
201	Workmen's Houses at Common.	The Burntisland Oil Company (Limited).		Proprietors (Empty £42, 18s.)	45 10 0

They craved that the above entries should be reduced to £60, 10s. for the Burntisland entry, and £2, 12s. for the Kinghorn entry, being the amount of the actual rents received from houses which were let.

The Committee refused the appeal, and confirmed the Assessor's valuation. The Oil Company obtained a case. The foregoing facts appeared from the case.

Argued for the appellants;—As it was very unlikely that the houses would ever again be occupied, they should either be deleted altogether from the roll or valued at a nominal sum.[1]

The Assessor in supporting his valuation, stated that though there was no immediate prospect of the houses being let, yet if new dock accommodation should be resolved upon, the houses might become very valuable.

At advising,—

Lord Moncreiff.—The question in this case relates to the valuation of a block of workmen's houses, some of which are in the parish of Burntisland and some in the parish of Kinghorn, which were built in connection with an oil manufactory carried on by the Burntisland Oil Company. The Oil Company have now ceased to carry on business, and the result of the stoppage is that there is great difficulty in letting these houses, which were intended solely for the accommodation of the workmen while the business was being carried on. It appears that at present only fourteen of the houses are let; and, owing to the fact that they are situated fully a mile from the town of Burntisland, it seems unlikely that they will be fully let again for some time. I think we are entitled to take into account the probability or improbability of the houses being again let soon, and that it is unfair to take the rent paid for the houses which are let as a criterion of the yearly value of those which are unlet. I think we should allow a nominal rent for the houses which are unlet, and arrive at a proper valuation of the whole by adding that nominal rent to the actual rent received for the houses which are let. Therefore, in regard to No. 49 of the valuation roll for the parish of Burntisland, and No. 201 of the roll of the parish of Kinghorn, I propose to add to the actual rent received for the houses which are let, a sum of £1 per house for those which are unlet. I take the £1 per house not as representing the actual rent which would be received for any one house if let, but in order to reach a rough calculation of the present yearly value of the whole on the footing that some may be let and some not. No. 129. Mar. 20, 1896. Burntisland Oil Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Fife.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I concur. Looking to the situation of these houses, £1 a house is, I think, as much as would be at all likely to be got for them in existing circumstances.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"We are of opinion that, as regards the subjects No. 49 of Burntisland Parish, and the subjects No. 201 of Kinghorn Parish, the actual rent received for the houses let should be entered, and a sum of £1 for each of the houses unlet.

The Assessor, in fixing the valuation, took one-half of the £550 paid in name of goodwill as representing the goodwill attaching to the house as a heritable subject and spread it over the period of the lease at the rate of £27, 10s. a-year, making with the rent stipulated in the lease £51, 10s. as the annual value entered in the roll.

In an appeal by the proprietor, held that, in fixing the valuation, there ought to be taken into consideration, not merely the amount paid for goodwill, but also the rents or valuations of similar licensed premises in the neighbourhood.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the Haddingtonshire County Council held at Haddington on 12th September 1895, an appeal was made by John Crawford, spirit-dealer, and John C. Chisholm, solicitor, against the entry of their names in the Valuation-roll as tenant and proprietor respectively of a public-house in the burgh of Tranent, at the yearly rent or value of £51, 10s. They craved that the valuation should be reduced to £24.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court. Ld. Moncreiff. Ld. Kyllachy. Case 175.

From evidence led at a proof it appeared that prior to 1893 the premises in question were occupied by Mrs Port, the proprietrix, and that they were then assessed at the annual value of £19, 10s. In March 1893, Mrs Port having become insane, and John C. Chisholm having been appointed curator bonis, the premises were let to the appellant Crawford on a ten years' lease, at an annual rental of £24, a lump sum of £550 being paid to the curator bonis for the business, goodwill, &c.

The Assessor, in fixing the valuation, had taken one-half of the lump sum of £550 as representing the goodwill attaching to the house as a heritable subject (the other half being allowed as representing personal goodwill, in respect that the proprietrix had been the previous occupier), and spread it over the period of the lease (£27, 10s. a-year), making with the annual rent (£24) stipulated in the lease, the annual value as assessed, £51, 10s.

The appellants maintained that the premises had by far the smallest accommodation of licensed premises in the town, and were the least inviting, while with one exception they were the most highly assessed; that the Assessor had declined to apply his mind to ascertain from the facts and circumstances what was a fair rent; that £51, 10s. was a rack-rent for the subjects in question; and that the rent of £24 stipulated in the lease was the bona fide rent, and was ample, according to the only test that could be applied, i.e., by reference to the valuation of similar premises in the same town.

The Valuation Committee were of opinion that the principle adopted and acted on by the Assessor was right. They found (1) that while according to the evidence led, and to the admission of the Assessor, the assessed rent of £51, 10s. was in excess of the assessment made on other similar public-houses in Tranent, it was only necessary for them to consider the amount paid for the goodwill of the business, and they disregarded the evidence led as to the value of other similar public-houses in Tranent; (2) that the sum of £550 paid for the goodwill of the business fell to be reduced in respect of an allowance for utensils to £500; and (3) taking the one-half as rent, they spread it over the full period of the lease, making with £24 per annum of rent payable to the proprietor, the annual value £49, and they reduced the assessment accordingly.

The appellants obtained a case.

The foregoing facts appeared from the case.

On 21st February the Valuation Judges pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the Committee were wrong in disregarding as an element to be considered the valuation of other public-houses in Tranent, and holding that they had only to consider the amount paid for goodwill: Find that the Committee are bound to consider the whole circumstances, including not only the gross sum paid for goodwill but also, inter alia, the rents or valuations of similar licensed premises in the neighbourhood: With these findings, remit to the Committee to reconsider their valuation, and to report."

On 6th March the Valuation Committee reported as follows:—"The Valuation Committee having, in terms of the foregoing remit, reconsidered the whole circumstances of the case, including the gross sum paid for goodwill and the rents of similar licensed premises in the burgh of Tranent, and how much of said goodwill effeired to the premises, adhere to their former decision, and fix the valuation at £49, and they beg respectfully to report accordingly."

On 20th March the Valuation Judges intimated the opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

Case 177.

On 10th September 1895 Messrs Mitchell & Sons, brick and tile manufacturers, Westbank Brick Works, Portobello, appealed to the Magistrates of the burgh against the Assessor's having entered them in the Valuation-roll for the burgh as proprietors and occupiers of "engines and erections" at Westbank at a yearly rent or value of £80.

They were lessees under a lease for ten years from Whitsunday 1891 granted by Wakefield Christie Miller, of Craigentinny, whereby there was let to them, inter alia, "the right of digging and taking clay from the triangular field lying to the west of the road leading from Edinburgh to Portobello."

The subjects the entry of which in the Valuation-roll was objected to were erected partly by the previous tenant and partly by Messrs Mitchell, and they had acquired from the previous tenant those erected by her. Being erections voluntarily made by a tenant, their yearly value could not have been entered in the Valuation-roll prior to the passing of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 41),* and the question raised was

* The Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 41), section 4, enacted,—"Section 6 of the Valuation Act, 1854, shall be read and construed as if the following proviso were inserted after the words 'as compared with the amount of such valuation,'—that is to say, 'Provided also, that where any lessee of any such lands and heritages, holding under a lease or agreement the stipulated duration of which is twenty-one years or under from the date of the entry under the same, and in the case of minerals thirty-one or under from the date of such entry, has made or acquired erections or structural improvements on the subjects let, and where the actual yearly value of such erections or structural improvements cannot, under the provision of section 6 of this Act, be entered in the Valuation-roll, such erections or structural improvements shall be deemed to be lands and heritages within the meaning of this Act, and such lessee shall be deemed to be proprietor thereof for the purposes of this Act; and the Assessor shall ascertain the yearly value of such erections or structural improvements, as a separate subject, by taking the amount of rent, if any, in addition to the rent stipulated to be paid under such lease or agreement at which, one year with another, the subjects let, and such erections or structural improvements might together in their actual state be reasonably expected to let from year to year, in consequence of such erections or structural improvements having been made, and shall make a separate entry thereof in the Valuation-roll, setting forth all the particulars relating thereto as hereinbefore provided with respect to other lands and heritages.

whether the Assessor was now entitled to enter such value under the authority of section 4 of that Act.

The Valuation Committee by a majority held that the erections fell within the exception contained in the second subsection of section 4, and they therefore sustained the appeal, and ordered the entry to be deleted.

The Assessor obtained a case. The above facts appeared from the case.

Argued for the appellant;—Clay was not a mineral within the meaning of the subsection.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—The word "minerals" was given a wider or more restricted construction according to the terms of the statute or deed upon which its interpretation depended.[2] Here a wide construction fell to be given. The erections in question were of the character used in working any other mineral. Farie's[1] case was decided upon a construction merely of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. cap. 17), sec. 18.

At advising,—

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee is right. The word "minerals" is an elastic term, and admits of construction. It will be held to have a wider or more restricted signification according to the circumstances of the case and the terms of the statute or deed upon which its interpretation depends.

Taken in its widest sense, "mineral" includes every substance which can be got from beneath the surface of the earth for profit by means of mining, quarrying, or excavation, including not merely coal and ironstone, but also clay and other strata. There have been many cases in which a restricted signification has been given to the words "mines" and "minerals," particularly in Scotland. But I think it will be found that these decisions proceeded on a consideration of the circumstances of each particular case, and the view that to give a wider signification to the words would be inconsistent with the contract between the parties or the true meaning of the Act of Parliament under construction. In the case of the Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie, 14 R. 346, reversed 15 R. (H. L.) 94, which was founded on by the Assessor, there was a great difference of opinion among the Judges in both Courts. While the judgment of the First Division was reversed, it will be observed that Lord Herschell dissented, and that the majority of the Lords proceeded each upon different grounds. It is true that the Lord Chancellor held that the word "minerals" fell to be construed in accordance with the ordinary use of the word in dealing with proprietary rights in Scotland. But both Lord Watson and Assessor for Portobello v. Mitchell & Sons.

Lord Macnaghten proceeded upon the special nature of the transaction to which the statutes in question applied.

Now, in the present case, I find nothing in the Valuation Acts to lead me to put a restricted meaning on the word "minerals." It is not inconsistent with the due operation of the statutes to give the word its widest signification; and when we look to the right conferred on the tenant by his lease and the terms of the proviso in the statute, I think it is plain that the right given to the tenant in the subject let is something very different from the ordinary use of the surface of the ground for agricultural or other purposes, which can be enjoyed salva substantia. Here the tenant is given the right and liberty of digging and taking clay to a considerable depth below the surface, thus removing the substance of the ground. Now, exception 1 to the proviso relates to leases for agricultural purposes. The second and third exceptions relate to mineral leases. The second exception, which applies to this case, runs as follows:—"But this proviso shall not apply (2) to any erections or structural improvements made or acquired and used exclusively for the purpose of working or cleaning minerals let under such lease or agreement as aforesaid, in respect of which minerals rent or lordship is stipulated to be paid."

The engine and erections in question are used exclusively for the purpose of working or cleaning the clay let under the lease.

I think that clay must be held to be a mineral in the sense of this exception, and that the determination should be affirmed.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I concur.

Case 179.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee of Lanarkshire on 11th September 1895, the Furnace Gases Company, Limited, appealed against a valuation of £1180 placed by the Assessor upon certain ammonia works erected by them on ground leased by them from the Shotts Iron Company.

The appellants maintained that the case fell within exception 3 of section 4 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895.*

These works had been erected by them under an agreement between the Shotts Iron Company and Messrs Robert and John Dempster, engineers, Manchester, whose rights under the agreement the appellants had acquired.

Under the agreement in question the Shotts Iron Company, for the royalty therein mentioned, conceded to the Dempsters the sole right to treat the gases of four close-topped blast furnaces belonging to them at Shotts Iron Works for the recovery of tar and ammonia from the gases, and to work up, manufacture, and mix with other products and substances the whole products obtained by the treatment of said gases; and the Dempsters undertook to provide plant and apparatus for the recovery of these products. Further, the Shotts Iron Company agreed to allot and let to the Dempsters all necessary and suitable ground, not exceeding four acres, as a site for the chemical or other works to be erected by them for treating the gases.

As the price of the rights granted to them by the agreement, the Dempsters agreed to pay to the Shotts Iron Company a shilling for every ton of twenty cwts. of coal consumed by them in the four furnaces from which gas was being drawn by them, "and which payments are hereinafter referred to by the expression 'royalty' or 'royalties.'"

The appellants craved that the entries should be expunged from the roll.

The Valuation Committee upheld the Assessor's valuation, and the Furnace Gases Company accordingly craved a case, in which the foregoing facts were stated.

Argued for the appellants;—The erections came under exception 3 of section 4 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895. Under the agreement the royalty was calculated on the amount of coal burnt in the furnaces. As the amount of gas obtained by the appellants depended upon the amount of coal so burnt, the practical result was a lordship calculated on the amount of gas obtained.

Argued for the respondents;—This was not a lease of minerals at all. The case contemplated by the Act was a rent calculated by the amount obtained by the lessee. Here the rent was calculated on the amount of coal used by the lessor.

At advising,—

LORD MONCREIFF.—There is no doubt that the subjects in question fall within the proviso in the 4th section of the Lands Valuation Amendment Act, 1895 (as being erections or structural improvements which the appellants have made upon the ground let to them, the yearly value of which cannot, under section 6 of the Valuation Act, 1854, be entered in the Valuation-roll), unless the appellants are able to shew that they are entitled to the benefit of one or other of the exceptions to the proviso. They accordingly appeal to the third exception, which provides that the proviso shall not apply to "coke ovens or other structures in which coal or other minerals are treated, where the rent or lordship stipulated in such a lease or agreement as aforesaid to be paid in respect of such coal or other minerals is, by the terms of such lease or agreement, calculated upon the coke or other minerals as treated in such ovens or other structures."

The simple answer to this contention is, that that exception only applies to erections or improvements made by a tenant under a proper lease of minerals as a heritable subject where the rent or lordship in respect of coal or other minerals let is calculated upon the minerals in question as treated in ovens or other structures.

Now, here there is no lease of minerals to the appellants. What are the minerals said to be let? Are they the ironstone treated by the Shotts Company, or the coal used as fuel in their blast furnaces? The appellants simply have right to recover the tar and ammonia from the gases of the adjoining blast furnaces belonging to the Shotts Iron Company. This is not a lease of minerals, or of a heritable subject of any kind; and the fact that the return made by the appellants under the agreement is called a royalty, and is calculated at the rate of 1s. per ton on the coal consumed in the blast furnaces of the Shotts Iron Company, does not alter the nature of the transaction.

No question was raised before us as to the amount of the valuation, and I do not know how it is arrived at. But I wish to guard myself from being held as deciding that the royalties paid by the appellants to the Shotts Iron Company form the proper measure of the valuation of the erections made by them. But as the appellants have raised no question about the value, I say no more about it.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee of Lanarkshire for the Middle Ward of the county held on 11th September 1895, the Caledonian Railway Company appealed against the valuation at £18 of a house in Bellshill belonging to the company and occupied by Thomas Struthers, a station-master in their employment, maintaining that the valuation should be reduced to £9, 2s.

Case 178.

The following were the facts of the case as submitted to the Caledonian Railway Co. v. Assessor for Lanarkshire.

Committee:—The house in question was a detached cottage, self-contained, situated outside the railway fence but closely adjoining the railway, and consisting of four rooms and a kitchen. It was let to Struthers at a rent of £9, 2s. per annum in addition to a fixed payment for water supply. Struthers occupied the house subject to certain terms of engagement contained in the company's book of rules and regulations and signed by him.*

At a proof before the Committee, John Gibson, assistant factor to the railway company gave the evidence quoted below.†

The Assessor led evidence, which was not contradicted by the railway company, to shew that £18 was the fair annual value of similar houses in the locality.

The Committee decided "(1) that, in the whole circumstances, the Assessor was entitled to fix the valuation of the subjects irrespective of the rent paid to the appellants, and (2) that the rent, at which one year with another the premises might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, was fairly stated at £18. They accordingly refused the appeal."

The Caledonian Railway Company obtained a case. From the case the foregoing facts appeared.

Argued for the appellants;—(1) As long as the rent was one fixed at so much a year, it did not matter that the landlord had it in his power to terminate at any time the tenancy. The house being let for £9, 2s. that sum must be taken as the true rent or value thereof, unless there was collusion or consideration other than rent. The only consideration suggested was the obligation of the tenant to remove at the landlord's pleasure, and that was really only a definition of the tenancy.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) There was here no yearly rent exigible by the landlord from his tenant as matter of right. The tenant only paid a weekly sum, and might be called upon to quit the house at any moment. In such a case a reasonable rent fell to be taken,[1] and £18 was shewn by the evidence to be fair. (2) It could not be said that the tenant paid a rent conditioned as the fair annual value of the house, for the evidence shewed that it was really occupied as part of his wages, and moreover that it was fixed without regard to the true letting value of other houses in the locality. The Assessor was right in fixing the rent at £18, which was well within the letting value of similar houses in the locality.

* The rules and regulations referred to were as follows:—"All dwelling-houses specially appropriated by the company for the accommodation of their servants, as such, are only let during their employment, and any servant taking or occupying such a dwelling-house shall be bound or entitled to remove therefrom on his receiving or giving notice of the termination of his employment, in accordance with the foregoing regulations, without the necessity of any other notice or warning, and he shall also be bound to remove therefrom instantly and without the necessity of any notice or warning whatever, on his dismissal or resignation or desertion from the service."

† "By the Assessor.—Can you tell me how the £9, 2s. is arrived at? (A.) They have a rate. They charge 1s. 9d. for a room and kitchen. The rest depends on the size of the apartments. It may be 6d. or 9d. The value of the property in any particular locality does not affect the rent charged. (Q.) So that this £9, 2s. is not fixed at all with reference to the value of house property in Bellshill? (A.) I do not know anything about the value of houses there. It is according to what the company consider their servants should pay for the houses that the rents are fixed. (Q.) It is not with any reference to the value of property in a particular district, but to a fair rent for the man who has to pay it? (A.) Not exactly a fair rent for the man—a fair rent for the houses. We won't rack-rent them."

LORD KYLLACHY.—This case raises questions of difficulty,—some of them of general application,—and the first question is this,—whether, when a house is let by a master to a servant at what is described as a yearly rent, but subject to the condition that the continuance of the tenancy shall depend on the continuance of the service, and the service may be terminated by either party upon four weeks' notice, and may be terminated by the master without notice on payment of certain wages, the house can in these circumstances be held to be let for "a yearly rent" in the sense of the 6th section of the statute?

It is said, on the one hand, that a yearly rent implies a yearly tenancy, that is to say, that it implies, as in ordinary yearly tenancies, an obligation by the tenant to pay, and a right in the landlord to exact, the full year's rent, whatever may be the period of actual occupancy; and that this cannot be predicated, as in the case supposed, where the tenancy may be terminated between terms, without payment to or liability for more than a proportion of the year's rent. It is said, on the other hand, that the statute says nothing about yearly tenancy, but speaks only of yearly rent; and that a tenancy even from week to week would quite suffice, if the rent be a rent fixed at so much a year.

A second question, which also arises, may be stated thus. A house is let by a master to a servant on terms which are terms of the contract of service. The house is, in short, really occupied as part of the servant's wages; and being so, it at least may happen that, if the rent was higher or lower, the wages would be just so much lower or so much higher. The question is, whether it can, in these circumstances, be held that the house is bona fide let to the tenant for a rent conditioned as the fair annual value of the subject? The one view is that the rent which the statute contemplates must be a rent in the amount of which both landlord and tenant have a real interest, and that, in the case supposed, the amount of the so-called rent is immaterial to either party. The other view is that, if the subject has been in fact let, and the rent in fact fixed, there is no room to inquire into the motives or considerations by which the parties were moved; or, at least, that the presumption is that the rent has been fixed by agreement, according to what the parties consider is the fair annual value of the subject.

Both of those general questions have been raised and argued, and, as general questions, they are not free from difficulty. In the view, however, which I am disposed to take, it is not necessary for the disposal of this case, or of the similar cases which follow, to decide either of them. There is, as it happens, a third question in all the cases,—a question depending on matter of fact,—and our decision on that question will, it appears to me, be sufficient for the disposal of the appeals.

No. 133.

Mar. 20, 1896. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Assessor for Lanarkshire.

That third question is this,—whether, conceding to the appellants that there is here a yearly rent, and also that the presumption is that the rent fixed was conditioned as the fair annual value of the subjects, the evidence which is part of the case does not displace that presumption, and establish that in point of fact the rents in question were fixed on a different principle, viz., on a rule of the railway company that the rents charged to their servants shall be on a fixed scale, having no relation to the true letting values of the houses, or to the rents or values of similar houses in the locality.

Now, I am of opinion on the evidence that on this matter the respondents are right. I think that the evidence does establish that the rents of the houses in question, set forth in the company's pay-bills, do not really represent a contract rent conditioned as the fair annual value of the subjects, but represent merely the company's estimate of the annual value of that part of their servants' remuneration which consists in the occupation of a free house. I refer particularly to the evidence of James Gibson, the appellant's factor, who states quite frankly that, while the so-called rent is fixed over the company's system on a certain scale depending on the number and size of the apartments in each house, yet, "the value of the property in any particular locality does not affect the rent charged. . . . It is according to what the company consider the servants should pay for their houses that the rents are fixed." In view of this evidence, which, I have no doubt, correctly represents the fact, it is not, I think, necessary to consider any general question as to the inferences or presumptions to be drawn from the relation of the parties, or from the nature of the contract under which the houses are let or occupied.

On the whole, I see no reason to disturb the decision of the Valuation Committee.

Lord Moncreiff.—I agree with your Lordship that, on the evidence presented to us, these appeals should be dismissed. I understood that, as a general rule, where employers, such as the railway company, built dwelling-houses for their officials or workmen, and let them to them, the rent paid for such houses was accepted on both sides as the fair yearly value of the houses; and I take it that as a rule that is not a disadvantageous arrangement from an assessor's point of view. It may be regretted that this practice has now been departed from; but the Assessors have raised the question, and we must deal with it.

I agree that it is not necessary for us to decide some of the questions to which your Lordship has referred. It strikes me that the evidence is defective in more ways than one. In the first place, we are not given a very clear or satisfactory explanation of the basis on which the railway company fix the rents of such houses. In the next place, the appellants, relying, I suppose, upon the rent paid to them being accepted as the yearly value of the subjects, have been at no pains to traverse the evidence for the Assessor as to the true yearly value of the houses as compared with the rents of other subjects in the neighbourhood.

But taking the evidence as it stands, if it is the case, as is represented in the evidence, that the railway company in fixing the rent of dwelling-houses let to their officials do not take into consideration the letting value of houses in the district, and if, on the evidence, it appears that the rent paid is substantially below the rent of other houses of a similar class, I am afraid we have no alternative but to hold that the rent is not conditioned as the fair annual value of the subjects.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

Shepherd v. Elliot.

ADAM SHEPHERD, Pursuer (Respondent)—Comrie Thomson—M'Lennan—Ingram.
SAMUEL ELLIOT, Defender (Reclaimer)—Jameson—Watt.

Expenses—Jury Trial.—The Court has a discretion in jury trials, as in other cases, to depart from the general rule whereby expenses follow the event.

A jury having returned a verdict for the defender in an action of damages for defamation, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) who had presided at the trial found the defender only entitled to one-half of the taxed amount of his expenses, on the grounds (1) that the defender had provoked the action by persistently insulting the pursuer, and (2) that his pleadings had been uncandid. The defender having reclaimed, the Court declined to interfere with the manner in which the Lord Ordinary had exercised his discretion.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

THIS was an action of damages for defamation at the instance of Adam Shepherd, Solicitor, Wick, against Samuel Elliot, Doctor of Medicine, Wick, the pursuer complaining that the defender had used calumnious language towards him in presence of third parties in the Caithness Club, Wick, and other places.

The case was tried before Lord Kyllachy and a jury.

The jury found for the defender.

The pursuer applied to the First Division for a rule, but the Court refused his motion and remitted to Lord Kyllachy to proceed. Thereafter Lord Kyllachy pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary applies the verdict of the jury upon the issues in the cause; and, in respect thereof, assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: And having heard counsel on the question of expenses, finds the defender entitled thereto, subject to modification; modifies the same to half of the taxed amount thereof; allows an account to be lodged," &c.*

* "OPINION.—The defender has obtained absolvitor, and is therefore, prima facie, entitled to expenses. But that question is always in the discretion of the Court, both in jury trials and in proofs. In this case I am of opinion that the defender should have expenses, but subject to modification. It appears to me, in the first place, that the defender's pleadings in respect of the first issue were, to say the least, not candid, and I think the same observation applies to his attitude when an explanation was asked and an apology demanded by the pursuer's agent. I think I am also entitled to take into account that, upon his own shewing, the defender here provoked this action; that he behaved badly throughout; that, if he did not slander, he persistently insulted the pursuer, his motive being a private quarrel; and that in the final scene in the club, which was the immediate cause of the action, his insults got the length of, to say the least, conduct unworthy of a person in his position. On the whole matter, I think I deal leniently with the defender in restricting the modification to one-half of the expenses."

Mar. 20, 1896. Shepherd v. Elliot.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The general rule in all cases was that expenses followed the result, and in jury trials the Court had no right to depart from that rule, unless success were divided, or the jury had made a recommendation, or where the jury had awarded a pursuer merely nominal damages—a case now provided for by statute.[1] At all events it was the universal practice of the Court, except in these cases, to allow expenses to follow the verdict.[2] There was no case of a jury trial where the Court had refused full expenses to a party who had been entirely successful. The practice of the Court was well illustrated by the case of Ross,[2] where, in an action of damages against a criminal officer for wrongous imprisonment, the defender who had been found by the jury to have committed gross dereliction of duty, was yet given full expenses because he had not been found liable in damages. Great inconvenience would result from a contrary practice, which would imply two trials, one by the jury on the merits, and a second by the Court, who would not have before them the necessary material for forming a correct judgment on the question of expenses. The contrary practice would lead to continual applications to the Court on the question of expenses. In jury trials the contest was limited to the acts put in issue, and it was contrary to the policy of that mode of trial to inquire into the previous conduct of parties. If such an inquiry were permissible it would be difficult to fix its limits. In any view the conduct of the defender did not justify the Lord Ordinary in refusing him full expenses.

Argued for the pursuer;—Where a case was not tried by jury, the Court applied its mind to the conduct of the parties in dealing with the question of expenses, and would, if the circumstances warranted it, refuse expenses to the successful party.[3] The same rule was applicable to jury trials.[4] Nothing was withdrawn from the Judge but the right to decide on the facts. The circumstances justified the action of the Lord Ordinary.

At advising,—

Lord President.—The principle upon which the Court proceeds in awarding expenses is that the cost of litigation should fall on him who has caused it. The general rule for applying this principle is that costs follow the event, the ratio being that the rights of parties are to be taken to have been all along such as the ultimate decree declares them to be, and that whosoever has resisted the vindication of those rights, whether by action or by defence, is prima facie to blame. In some cases, however, the application of the general rule would not carry out the principle, and the Court has always, on cause shewn, considered whether the conduct of the successful party, either during the litigation, or in the matters giving rise to the litigation, has not either caused or contributed to bring about the law suit.

The reclaimer does not question the propositions which I have thus stated:

but he has maintained that, in actions tried with a jury, the Court has no discretion, and the rule is absolute that costs follow the event. His argument was put, as I should think, needlessly high in two respects,—first, because in no possible view can the function of the jury conflict with the consideration by the Court of the conduct of the litigation—and second, because in many causes tried with a jury the conduct of the litigants antecedent to the litigation enters only in the slightest and most incidental manner into the subject of the jury's consideration. In questions of boundary, of right of way, of mercantile contract, and in numerous other instances, the conduct of the litigants touches but little, if at all, the trial of the issue.

In the case actually before us, and more or less in all actions for defamation, the conduct of the parties was necessarily and directly considered by the jury. But, then, it was so considered with reference solely to the questions in the issues. The jury had no duty or right to consider the question of expenses. Accordingly, if the reclaimer's argument be sound, the result is that in cases tried with a jury nobody can consider the conduct of the successful litigant as bearing on his right to costs. For the elimination in jury causes of this element, proper to the just determination of the question of expenses in all other cases, no reason can be suggested on the ground of principle. There is no difference in the nature of those cases which are generally tried with a jury which can found such a distinction. Accordingly it was rather argued as if this was, so to speak, a mechanical necessity of the conditions of jury trial. I am quite unable to see it. There is no incompatibility between the function of the jury in answering the issue, and the function of the Court in examining the same material for the decision of the separate question of expenses.

The exercise of this jurisdiction in cases tried by a jury is delicate, but the principles to be followed are clear, and are well illustrated in Harnett v. Vise.[1] The Court, however it may dissent from the verdict, must not take upon itself to overrule the finding of fact. In the present case, accordingly, it is to be assumed that there was no defamation. But, well within this admission, there may be ample material for cause being shewn that the conduct of the successful defender had been such as to conduce to the litigation.

I have only to add that, as far as I have observed, the Court exercises considerable reserve in departing from the general rule that costs follow the event; and, where the conduct of the parties has already been considered by a jury, although for a different purpose, probably an additional reason is furnished for caution in entering on doubtful questions. In the present case, the Lord Ordinary knew much more about the facts than I do; and for this reason, more than for any other, I am content to abide by his decision. I am therefore for adhering.

Blackburn's Trustees v. Blackburn.

JOHN BLACKBURN AND ANOTHER, Second Parties.—Craigie—Blackburn.

MRS ELIZABETH BLACKBURN, Third Party.—C. J. Guthrie—Macfarlane.

Succession—Vesting—Marriage-Contract—Clause of survivorship—Power of appointment.—By antenuptial marriage-contract A bound himself "to make payment to the child or children that may happen to be procreate of this marriage of" £8000 "to be payable at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the longest liver of him" and his intended spouse, "which sum in the event of there being more children than one shall be divisible in such proportions as A shall appoint, by a writing under his hand at any time of his life, and failing such appointment, to be divided equally amongst the survivors of them and the issue of such as may have predeceased leaving issue, such issue succeeding always only to the shares to which their parents would have been entitled had they been in life."

Thirty years after his marriage A executed a deed apportioning the fund among his children then alive (there being no issue of predeceasers) as follows,—to his son B, "whom failing, by his predeceasing the term of payment his issue," a certain sum and the remainder equally among his other children C, D, and E, "and the survivors and survivor of them, and the issue of such as may have predeceased the term of payment leaving issue."

A was survived by his widow and by these children.

In a special case presented during the lifetime of A's widow by the representative of one of the children who had survived A and had died without issue, and by the surviving children, held (1) that under the marriage-contract the right to the sum payable by A's executors at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the surviving spouse did not vest in the children prior to that date; and (2) that the apportionment was valid.

1ST DIVISION. BY antenuptial contract of marriage, dated in 1850, Andrew Blackburn, Esq., Edinburgh, bound and obliged himself to make payment to his intended wife Miss Elizabeth Mary Buchanan in case she should survive him all the days of her life of an annuity of £500, and in part security of the payment of this provision he obliged himself, within six months from the date thereof, to make payment to trustees named in the deed of the sum of £5000, of which the interest was to be paid to himself during his life, and after his death to his widow, to be imputed towards payment of her annuity, and the fee was to be applied in manner after directed. He further bound and obliged himself, his heirs, and successors whomsoever, "to make payment to the child or children that may happen to be procreate of this marriage of the following sums of money, viz., if one child, £5000; if two children, £6000; and if more than two, £8000, to be payable at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the longest liver of him and the said Elizabeth Mary Buchanan, with interest during the not-payment thereof, which sum, in the event of there being more children than one, shall be divisible in such proportions as the said Andrew Blackburn shall appoint, by a writing under his hand at any time of his life, and failing such appointment, to be divided equally amongst the survivors of them and the issue of such as may have predeceased leaving issue, such issue succeeding always only to the shares to which their parents would have been entitled had they been in life: And the said Andrew Blackburn obliges himself and his foresaids to aliment, maintain, and educate his said children suitably to their station until the term of payment of their said provisions: And it is hereby declared that the foresaid sum of £5000 to be vested in trustees as aforesaid shall form part of the provisions in favour of children, and shall be applied accordingly, failing whom the same shall, upon the death of the said Elizabeth Mary Buchanan, be paid over to the heirs or assignees of the said Andrew Blackburn." These provisions were declared to be in full of the legal rights of the children.

By deed of appointment, dated in 1885, Mr Blackburn, after referring to the terms of the marriage-contract, provided as follows:—"And further, considering that there are at present four children of the said marriage surviving,—videlicet, John Blackburn, Andrew Buchanan Blackburn, David William Ramsay Blackburn, and Mrs Euphemia Blackburn or Fergusson . . . and that there exists no issue of deceased children thereof: And now seeing that I have resolved to execute and use the power of apportionment conferred on me by the said contract of marriage: Therefore I do hereby apportion out of the said sums of £6000 or £8000 as the case may be to the said David William Ramsay Blackburn, whom failing, by his predeceasing the term of payment, his issue £200: And I apportion the remainder of the said sums of £6000 or £8000 as the case may be to and between and among the said John Blackburn, Andrew Buchanan Blackburn, and Euphemia Blackburn or Fergusson, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the issue of such as may have predeceased the term of payment leaving issue, equally between and among them, such issue succeeding always only to the shares to which their parents would have been entitled had they been in life."

Mr Blackburn died in 1885, survived by his wife, and the four children mentioned in the deed of apportionment. At the date of the special case after mentioned the widow still survived. Of the children David died in 1888 unmarried, and Andrew in 1895, survived by a widow (Mrs Elizabeth Blackburn), but without issue. Andrew left a will bequeathing his whole estate to his widow, and appointed her his sole executrix.

Questions having arisen during the lifetime of Mrs Elizabeth Mary Buchanan or Blackburn between the two surviving children of Mr Blackburn and Mrs Elizabeth Blackburn as to their respective rights in the sum of £8000 which Mr Blackburn bound himself to pay after the death of the longest liver of himself and his wife in the event of there being more than two children procreated of the marriage, a special case was presented, to which Mr Blackburn's marriage-contract trustees were first parties, his two surviving children second parties, and Mrs Elizabeth Blackburn third party, in order to obtain the opinion of the Court upon the following questions:—"(1) Was the said deed of apportionment within the power of the said Andrew Blackburn, and does it now regulate the succession to the fee of the provisions made by the said Andrew Blackburn in favour of the children procreated of his marriage? (2) In the event of question No. 1 being answered in the affirmative, is vesting of said provisions postponed until the date of the death of Mrs Elizabeth Mary Buchanan or Blackburn?"

The third party maintained that the fee of the provision of £8000 vested in Mr Blackburn's children as they came into existence, or otherwise at the dissolution of the marriage, and that the deed of apportionment was ultra vires of Mr Blackburn, and that her husband was at the date of his death vested in one-fourth of the provision in his own right, and in one-eighteenth as one of the heirs in mobilibus of his deceased brother David.

The second parties maintained that the deed of apportionment was intra vires of Mr Blackburn, and that, whether that deed was valid or invalid, the fee of the provision of £8000 did not vest in any child of the marriage until the death of the longest liver of the spouses.

Argued for the third party;—(1) The general rule was that marriage-contract provisions vested at the dissolution of the marriage, and there was nothing in the present contract to displace the rule. The postponement of payment was on account of the widow's liferent, and the mere interposition of a liferent never operated to postpone vesting. The power of appointment was not limited to survivors, and the deed being a marriage-contract and not a mortis causa settlement, the period to which the condition of survivorship introduced in the following clause referred was the dissolution of the marriage.[1] (2) If vesting took place at the dissolution of the marriage, the deed of apportionment was ultra vires, because, contrary to the intention of the contract, it postponed vesting, made the uncertain element of survivorship a condition of taking benefit, and, by the destination to the issue of predeceasers, introduced persons who were not proper objects of the power of appointment.[2]

Argued for the second party;—(1) The clause of survivorship was according to the usual rule referable to the period of payment, which was the death of the longest liver of the spouses. Until that date, therefore, no right transmissible by will vested in any individual child of the marriage.[3] The destination over of the £5000 held by the trustees to the heirs and assignees of the husband supported the view that vesting was postponed. (2) If vesting were postponed until the death of the survivor of the spouses, no objection could be stated to the deed of apportionment, but that deed was valid even if vesting took place at an earlier date. A power of appointment enabled the person possessing it to select among the objects of the power those whom he desired to benefit. If he could exclude directly, it would seem to follow that he could do so indirectly, as by postponement of vesting. The appointment to the issue of predeceasers was in accordance with the power given by the marriage-contract.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—The case submits to the decision of the Court, first, the question whether a deed of appointment executed by Mr Andrew Blackburn in the year 1885 is a deed within the powers reserved by him in his contract of marriage, and then in alternative questions, in what manner and at what time did the children's right under the contract vest. But it is evident that the question, whether the deed of apportionment is or is not a valid exercise of the power must depend on the true construction of the destination in the contract of marriage, and I shall therefore consider this question first in order.

The obligation undertaken by Mr Blackburn in contemplation of marriage is thus expressed—leaving out of view for the moment the power of apportionment—it is to make payment to the child or children of the marriage of the following sums of money, viz., if one child £5000, if two children £6000, and if more than two £8000, to be payable at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the longest liver of him and his spouse, with interest. Then, passing over the power of apportionment, the deed proceeds,—and failing such appointment, to be divided equally amongst the survivors of them and the issue of such as may have predeceased leaving issue, such issue succeeding always only to the shares to which their parents would have been entitled had they been in life.

There is nothing unusual in this destination; it is neither elliptical nor redundant in expression; and there is nothing in the context that suggests a different construction from that which would be put on the destination if it stood alone. Now, if we apply to this destination the established principle of construction, that words of survivorship are presumed to refer to the period of payment or conveyance, the clause which I have quoted must be taken as confining the benefit of the provision to such of the issue of the marriage as may survive the longest liver of Mr Blackburn and his spouse. The fund which he undertakes to provide is to be divided equally amongst the members of his family who may be then surviving, amongst whom it is explained the issue of a deceased son or daughter are to be included, but only to the effect of taking the parent's original share. It is quite true that where a marriage obligation in favour of children is expressed in general terms the law presumes that the obligation is prestable at the dissolution of the marriage. But all such presumptions must give way before the plainly expressed conditions of the obligation, and I cannot admit the existence of any jus crediti on the part of children of such weight as should compel a father or his representatives to confer a benefit at an earlier period than he intended, or to include in the benefit of the provision members of his family for whom he has not undertaken to provide in this particular way. I have only to add on this question that the words of the power which I am about to read do not in my judgment affect the construction of the destination, because the power only enables the father to divide the fund unequally amongst the objects of the gift, whoever these may be. The same observation may be applied to the provisions vesting the sum of £5000 in trustees; this trust fund is applicable to the purposes of the destination, but the trust purpose has no influence on the construction of the destination, which, as I have already said, stands by itself.

Coming now to the power of apportionment, I see no reason to doubt that the persons amongst whom the fund is to be apportioned are the same as those who would take under the provision for equal division in case of the power not being exercised. The meaning of any power of apportionment is that the fund is to be divided, but may be divided unequally, amongst the members of the class who would take failing apportionment. Any other construction, if not exactly a contradiction in terms, would at least involve a departure from the principle of apportionment. I do not read the power as meaning anything different from a division amongst the class, because nothing more is said than that in the event of there being more children than one the fund "shall be divisible in such proportions as the said Andrew Blackburn shall appoint." If this be the meaning of the power, then I cannot doubt that it was well exercised by the deed of 8th March 1885, because the deed of division is an echo of the destination in the marriage-contract, and follows closely the lines of that destination. The result is that, in my opinion, the power of apportionment is well exercised, and that the vesting of the estate is postponed until the death of Mrs Blackburn.

No. 135.

Mar. 20, 1896. Blackburn's Trustees v. Blackburn.

In this view the first and second questions of law will be answered in the affirmative.

LORD ADAM.—In this case Mr Blackburn bound and obliged himself, his heirs, executors, and successors, to make payment of £5000 or £8000, according to what the number of children might happen to be, to the child or children of the marriage. The period of payment was to be the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the longest liver of him, and Mrs Buchanan if she should be his widow. Now, it is clear that that being the term of payment, there could be no period of division different from, or at least prior to, the period of payment, for the simple reason that the sum was in the hands of nobody to divide. By his will the executors are in possession of the money and they are debtors in the obligation undertaken by Mr Blackburn; they are not in any sense trustees, and in no sense do they hold the fund for the children. Now, if that be so, the next thing is that Mr Blackburn has a power of appointment, and the direction in this deed is to divide the money according to such proportions as he may appoint by deed of apportionment, and failing apportionment, equally, and the parties to whom this payment or division is to be made are the survivors of the same, and the issue of such as may predecease leaving issue, such issue succeeding always to the shares which their parents would have been entitled to if in life. Now, I entertain no doubt that the survivors, to whom payment is to be made, are the children surviving at the date of payment, that is, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the longest liver of the spouses, and failing such survivance, to the issue—that is to say, to the issue of such as may predecease, that is, of such of the children as may predecease. They are to take their parent's share. Now, if that be so, there can be no doubt at all, in my humble opinion, that this fund vested, and could vest only, on the death of the longest liver of the spouses. I can see no other possible period at which it could vest. It is quite true that there was a sum of £5000 held by the trustees in security of an annuity which Mr Blackburn provided for his widow, if that should be necessary for that purpose, but that would make no difference on that sum, for the direction is that the fee of that £5000 is to be applied in manner after directed, the manner after directed being the manner prescribed in the clause which I have just been dealing with.

If that be so, and if there was no vesting at any period prior to the period of payment, then it follows, and was not disputed, that the deed of appointment was perfectly valid. I therefore agree that the first two questions must be answered in the affirmative, and that the other requires no answer.

Blackburn's Trustees v. Blackburn.

LORD KINNEAR.—If we were to read the obligation contained in this marriage-contract as we ought to do, for the purpose of ascertaining the fair meaning of the words used in it according to the ordinary acceptation of language, irrespective of any previous decision, there could be very little doubt indeed as to the meaning of the obligation. The husband obliges himself to pay a certain sum or certain sums, varying according to the number of children, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the longest liver of himself and his wife, and then he goes on to provide—(omitting words which are not necessary for the construction of the obligation itself, but which only describe the qualifications which pertain to the right created by that obligation)—that this sum which he obliges himself to pay at that time is to be divisible, failing apportionment by him, among the survivors of his children and the issue of such as may have predeceased. That appears to me to be an obligation to the children surviving the term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the longest liver of the spouses, and to the issue of those who predecease, and to nobody else; and therefore I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion which your Lordships have expressed that the husband had undertaken no obligation in favour of anybody except the children surviving at the time.

If that be the natural meaning of the words used, the only question is whether there is any rule in law founded on prior decisions which obliges us to put upon this marriage-contract a construction different from that which we would otherwise place upon it. I am not aware of any such rule, and, taking it by itself, I concur.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT answered the first and second questions in the affirmative, and found it unnecessary to answer the third.

Right in Security—Catholic Security—Contribution of separate estates to common burden—Annuity.—Where two heritable estates, which were both subject to the common burden of an annuity, passed into the possession of separate proprietors, held, in a question between these proprietors, that each estate was bound to contribute to the annuity from year to year, in proportion to the amount of its free rental after deduction of the interest on prior burdens.

WILLIAM COWAN, of Kirkton, Boghall, and Linburn, died in 1875. By his trust-disposition and settlement, dated 28th April 1873, Mr

1ST DIVISION.

No. 136.

Ferrier v. Cowan.

Cowan directed his trustees to infeft his widow in an annuity of £200 per annum, "to be paid to her out of the rents" of his estate of Boghall, "in each year, so long as she lives, and continues my widow." He also directed his trustees to convey Boghall to his eldest son, James Henry Cowan, and to convey the estate of Drumcrosshall and Kirkton to his second son, John Robert Cowan.

By a codicil, dated 19th November 1874, Mr Cowan directed his trustees, when the time arrived to "convey my estates of Drumcrosshall and Kirkton to John Robert Cowan, my second son, to do so under burden of the annuity of £200 in favour of my wife," and to convey Boghall to his eldest son free from said annuity.

After Mr Cowan's death the trustees duly implemented these directions, and conveyed Boghall to James Henry Cowan free of the annuity, and Drumcrosshall and Kirkton to John Robert Cowan, under the real burden of the annuity.

In 1886 the estate of Kirkton was sold by a heritable creditor, and was purchased by William Cochrane Ferrier. The disposition in Mr Ferrier's favour disponed the lands under the real burden of the annuity.

In 1887 John Robert Cowan disponed the estate of Drumcrosshall to his brother, James Henry Cowan. There was excepted from the warrandice, "any right which Mrs Cowan . . . has to receive payment of her annuity of £200 per annum, or part thereof, out of the lands of Drumcrosshall."

After Mr Ferrier acquired the estate of Kirkton he was called upon to pay the annuity to Mrs Cowan, and from Whitsunday 1886 to Martinmas 1894 he paid the whole annuity, receiving from Mrs Cowan assignations of her right to the part of the annuity payable by the estate of Drumcrosshall.

In 1895 Mr Ferrier, as an individual, and as assignee of Mrs Cowan, brought an action against James Henry Cowan for declarator (1) that the lands of Drumcrosshall, belonging to the defender, were and had all along been, before and since they were acquired by the defender, along with the lands of Kirkton, subject to the real burden of Mrs Cowan's annuity; (2) that £875, being one-half of the annuity, less income-tax, for the period between Whitsunday 1886 and Martinmas 1894, or otherwise, the cumulo amount of such other proportion of the annuity for that period, less income-tax, as the Court should fix, with interest on each termly payment, still formed a real burden on the lands of Drumcrosshall; and (3) that the pursuer was entitled to payment from the lands of Drumcrosshall of the sum of £875, or the cumulo amount of such other proportion of the annuity as should be fixed, with interest.

The pursuer set forth the facts already narrated, which were not disputed, and further averred;—(Cond. 10) "The rentals of Kirkton and Drumcrosshall are practically equal in amount, and the defender's lands are liable for one-half of the said annuity."

The defender stated;—(Stat. 1) "At the date of Mr Cowan's death in 1875, the estate of Drumcrosshall was burdened with a debt of £10,000, heritably secured. This debt, which still subsists, ranked prior to the annuity of £200 to his widow secured over the estates of Drumcrosshall and Kirkton." (Stat. 2) "At the date of pursuer's purchase of the estate of Kirkton, the securities upon the two estates were as follows:—

"1. Mrs Cowan's annuity of £200 secured over both estates.

"2. Bond over Drumcrosshall only, preferable to said annuity, ...	£10,000	0	0
"3. Bond in favour of Samuel Lewis, and assigned by him to the Scottish Equitable Insurance Company, over both estates, postponed to annuity, ...	3,000	0	0
"4. Bond over both estates, postponed to annuity,	7,950	0	0

(Stat. 5) "The pursuer purchased the said estate of Kirkton at the reduced upset price of £6115, which was applied in payment of the exposer's (Scottish Equitable Company) bond for £3000 and interest and expenses, and in payment of the postponed bond for £7950 to the extent of £2500. The balance of said bond, amounting to £5450, and the bond for £1000 remained burdens on Drumcrosshall alone. The nett rental of said estate of Kirkton, after deducting public burdens, was £519, and in fixing the upset price, as was well known to the pursuer, allowance was made for the whole annuity of £200 payable to Mrs Cowan, it being known that the remaining heritable debt would more than exhaust the estate of Drumcrosshall." (Stat. 6) "The estate of Drumcrosshall is now burdened with the following heritable bonds:—Said £10,000, for which the defender has undertaken personal liability; said £5450, and said £1000, both originally catholic securities, but now exclusively secured on Drumcrosshall, and for which the defender is not personally liable. Hitherto the rental of the estate has enabled the defender to do little more than keep down the interest on the primary bond for £10,000, and for crop and year 1894 there was no surplus whatever for the postponed bondholders, and were any portion of Mrs Cowan's annuity to be paid out of Drumcrosshall, even on an improved rental, the result would be to the prejudice of the holders of said postponed bonds for £5450 and £1000."

In answer to the defender's statements, the pursuer denied that the debt of £10,000 ranked prior to the widow's annuity, and explained "that by his settlement William Cowan directed his trustees to pay off out of his moveable estate the whole heritable debts affecting his lands before they conveyed his estates to his sons. It is believed that William Cowan left sufficient moveable estate to pay off the heritable debt referred to. . . . Explained further, that instead of securing the discharge of the debt, John Robert Cowan, to whom the estate of Drumcrosshall was conveyed by his father's trustees, voluntarily undertook personal liability for the debt, and by the terms of the disposition in his favour the defender also became personally liable for the said sum of £10,000. Since the defender acquired the property the debt has been due on his personal obligation, and he is primarily liable for payment both of principal and interest."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) In respect of the respective titles of the parties, and of the payments made by the pursuer, and of the assignations in favour of the pursuer, the pursuer is entitled to decree as concluded for. (2) The defences are irrelevant. (3) The defender being primarily the debtor in the bond for £10,000 is not entitled to charge the estate with the interest or principal thereof in a question with the pursuer. (4) In any case, the truster having directed the said debt to be paid out of his moveable estate, the defender

No. 136. is not entitled to take the debt into account in allocating the annuity.

Mar. 20, 1896. Ferrier v. Cowan.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The action is irrelevant. (2) The pursuer having purchased the estate of Kirkton expressly under burden of the payment by him out of the said estate of the whole of the said annuity, he is not entitled to relief against the defender or the estate of Drumcrosshall. (3) In any view the pursuer is not entitled to recover from the defender any sum in respect of past payments of the annuity except in so far as he can instruct that the defender has drawn surplus rents from Drumcrosshall, and in proportion to the amount of said surplus rents in relation to the free rent of Kirkton. (4) In any view the defender is entitled to require that the annuity to Mrs Cowan be taken out of the estate of Kirkton to the effect of enabling him to make full payment of the interest due to the postponed bondholders on the estate of Drumcrosshall. (5) Separatim, In case that it shall be found that the estate of Drumcrosshall is liable to contribute to the said annuity, the said bond for £10,000 over Drumcrosshall being preferable to said annuity, said bond and the interest thereon falls to be taken into account in any allocation of the annuity between Drumcrosshall and Kirkton.

On 21st December 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Low) "repels the fourth plea in law for the pursuer and the second plea in law for the defender: Before further answer, allows to the defender a proof of his statements on the defences in regard to the burdens on the estates of Kirkton and Drumcrosshall, and also as to the value of the latter estate; and to the pursuer a proof of his averments in answer thereto: Appoints the said proof to proceed," &c.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The pursuer avers that Kirkton and Drumcrosshall are practically of the same value, and that therefore, in a question between him and the defender, each estate is liable to contribute one-half of the annuity.

"I did not understand the defender seriously to dispute that, as a general rule, when two estates, upon which a debt is secured, came into the hands of separate proprietors, they must pay the debt rateably according to the value of the estates. He contended, however, that the debt of £10,000 having been secured over Drumcrosshall before the widow's annuity was made a burden upon that estate, the interest upon the £10,000 must be deducted from the rental, and only the surplus rental taken into account in comparing the value of the two estates, and allocating the annuity beween them.

"The answer which the pursuer makes to that view is that, even assuming that the debt of £10,000 is preferable to the annuity, which he does not admit, William Cowan gave directions to his trustees to pay out of his moveable estate the whole heritable debts affecting his lands, before they conveyed his estates to his sons. The direction in the settlement upon which the pursuer founds is to sell certain railway stock and to pay the heritable debts out of the proceeds. In a codicil, however, Mr Cowan directed his trustees only to realise the railway stock in certain events, and declared his wish to be that 'the existing mortgages shall remain secured on my estates of Boghall, Drumcrosshall, and Kirkton, until all my other debts are paid.' It is not said that the railway stock has been realised, or that all the other debts of Mr Cowan have been paid, and therefore if it were material to consider whether in terms of the settlement the debts with which Drumcrosshall is burdened might not have been paid off, inquiry would be necessary.

"It seems to me, however, that the pursuer has no title to found upon Ferrier v. Cowan.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuer's right to an apportionment of the common burden was clear,[1] and the rental of the two estates being practically equal, they were bound to contribute equally to the burden, for which each was bound up to its full value. There was no authority for the view that, in fixing the relative liability of two estates subject to a common burden, prior burdens affecting either estate were to be taken into account. In a question arising inter hæredes as to liability for the debts of a common ancestor different considerations arose, and it might well be that the liability was proportioned to the nett value of the estate taken by each. But that would involve the deduction of all burdens imposed before the estate was received, whether prior or postponed to the common burden. It was evident that this principle could not be applied to a case of singular successors like the present, and it was not so contended. In their case, the theory that the surplus or reversionary values of two estates were the true measure of their liability seemed the directions in the settlement. Drumcrosshall and Kirkton were both left to John Robert Cowan, and if he chose to allow the heritable debts to remain upon these estates, or either of them, instead of calling upon the trustees to pay them off, it seems to me that he was quite entitled to do so. If the security for the widow's annuity had depended upon the debts being paid, she might perhaps have had right to insist that the directions of the settlement should be carried out, but I do not think that the pursuer has any such right. I think that he must take matters as they stood when the separation of the estates occurred by his purchase of Kirkton, and at that date (assuming the defender's statement to be correct) Drumcrosshall was burdened with a debt of £10,000 preferably to the widow's annuity.

"I am therefore of opinion that the defender's contention, that if the bond for £10,000 is preferable to the annuity it falls to be taken into account in any allocation of the annuity between Drumcrosshall and Kirkton, is sound.

"The defender further contends that the pursuer is barred from making any claim of relief against him or the estate of Drumcrosshall, in respect, first, that in the disposition of Kirkton to the pursuer the whole annuity is declared to be a burden upon that property; and, secondly, that the upset price at which the pursuer purchased Kirkton was estimated, to his knowledge, upon the footing that the whole annuity was exigible from the estate.

"In regard to the first point, the whole annuity was, as matter of fact, a burden upon Kirkton, and the disposition seems to me to do no more than state that fact in order that there might be no dubiety on the point between disponer and disponee.

"In regard to the second point, if the defender's statement is correct, that after deducting the preferable debt of £10,000 there is practically no free value or rental of Drumcrosshall to meet the annuity, it was very natural that the bondholders in fixing the reduced upset price of Kirkton should have proceeded upon the assumption that the purchaser would have to pay the whole annuity. I do not think, however, that the way in which the sellers arrived at the upset price, even if known to the pursuer, barred him from enforcing any right of relief which he might find to be open to him.

"The defender also argued that no part of the annuity could be demanded against Drumcrosshall, because to do so would prejudice the rights of the postponed creditors on that estate.

"The defender argued that the pursuer could have no higher right than to rest on no ground of principle. The remedy sought in the present case was a real remedy against the lands, which were certainly liable quantum valeant. The application of the rule of surplus value was a limitation sought to be fixed in the personal interest of the owner; and yet the surplus contended for was determined at a period long before that owner acquired the property, and had no meaning relatively to him. Further, the adoption of the theory contended for by the defenders would result in many difficulties and anomalies, e.g., it would make the liabilities of two estates depend on the mere incident—generally determined entirely on grounds of convenience—of whether bonds in transactions with purchasers were taken over or discharged and received. Again, it would make it possible for the proprietor of one estate, with the aid of the catholic creditor, to throw the whole common burden upon the other. The only practicable rule in estimating the relative values of two estates for the purpose of contribution was to disregard bonds altogether.

In the present case there was an additional and most material reason against taking the bond into account. The defender was personally and primarily liable for the debt due under the bond, the estate being only bound in security. In estimating the comparative liability of the estates, matters were to be taken as they stood now, when the claim for relief was made, not as they stood at the period of separation. If, however, the defender was entitled to go back to the time when the common burden was imposed, the pursuer was entitled to rely on the terms of the settlement imposing the burden. In terms of that settlement the bond in question should have been paid off. It was the duty of a purchaser to have a catholic security allocated. If he failed to do this, he was himself to blame if the application was made at a worse time for him.

The defender had no title to plead the interest of the postponed bondholders. If he had, their interest could not prejudice the right of the pursuer to have the catholic burden apportioned according to the value of the estates. The equity which required a catholic creditor to exercise his rights so as not to prejudice other creditors unnecessarily could not be pleaded by the debtor.[1]

Argued for the defender;—Apportionment was an equitable remedy, and must be applied equitably, and not according to the technicalities of conveyancing law. The legal position was that the creditor in a catholic security could exact payment out of any one estate subject to the burden, but the debtor who was compelled to pay more than the widow had, and that she as a catholic creditor was not entitled to prejudice the secondary creditors over Drumcrosshall by demanding payment of any part of her annuity out of that estate, Kirkton being sufficient for the payment of the whole annuity.

"The question is one of some nicety, but although it was stated, there was little argument upon this point, and no citation of authorities, and I do not propose at this stage to express any opinion upon it, because as the defender's statements in regard to the burdens upon the estates are not admitted, the facts must be ascertained.

"I am therefore of opinion that I am now in a position to repel the fourth plea for the pursuer and the second plea for the defender, and before further answer I shall allow the defender a proof of his averments in regard to the burdens upon the two estates, and in regard to the value of Drumcrosshall."

his proper share was entitled to an assignation, in order that he might operate his relief out of the other estates, the rule being that each estate was liable to contribute to the common burden rateably according to its relative value.[1] The only equitable mode of applying the remedy was to take the reversionary value of each estate, after deduction of burdens ranking prior to the catholic security, as the true measure of its liability, and that value, so far as burdens were concerned, must be taken as at the date of the separation of the estates, for it would be inequitable to increase the liability of the proprietor of an estate to a catholic burden merely because he had paid off a burden affecting his own estate only. In England the rule with regard to annuities chargeable on separate estates was that each must contribute to the annuity rateably according to its rental de anno in annum.[2] If the rental of one estate increased largely, e.g., owing to the discovery of minerals, its liability to the common burden would be modified, but this rule was not applicable to a case of burdens separately affecting the estates. So far as these were concerned, it was quite consistent with the English rule that the apportionment should be fixed once for all at the date when the estates passed to separate proprietors. The fact that the defender was personally bound for payment of the prior bond over his estate could not affect the apportionment of the common burden, the question being one of real rights, with which personal obligations had nothing to do. Nor could the pursuer found upon the provisions of Mr Cowan's will, with which he had no concern.

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—The estates of Kirkton and Drumcrosshall, belonging to the pursuer and defender respectively, are subject to the common burden of an annuity of £200, payable to the widow of William Cowan, a former proprietor. The burden is imposed by the trust-disposition and settlement of Mr Cowan, who directed his trustees to infeft his widow in an annuity of £200 a year, "to be paid to her out of the rents of the estate of Boghall in each year so long as she lives and continues my widow"; and by a codicil he directed that the estates of Kirkton and Drumcrosshall should be conveyed to his son, John Robert Cowan, under burden of this annuity, and that the estate of Boghall should be conveyed to his son James Henry entirely free from the said annuity. The disposition to John Robert Cowan which the trustees executed in terms of the direction has not been laid before us, but the parties are agreed that the directions of the truster were duly carried out by his trustees. So long as Kirkton and Drumcrosshall remained in the hands of John Robert Cowan there could be no question of contribution as between these estates. But the question arose when the two estates were separated and came into the hands of different owners by the pursuer's purchase of Kirkton in 1886. Since that date the pursuer avers that he has been required to pay the entire annuity to Mrs Cowan as if it had been a burden upon his property of Kirkton alone, and he brings this action, founding upon assignations which he has taken from the annuitant, for the purpose of establishing his claim to a proportional relief from the Drumcrosshall estate. It is not now disputed that both estates must contribute rateably to the annuity, but the parties are in controversy as to the conditions on which the common liability is to be apportioned. The Lord Ordinary has decided three questions which have been raised, but he has reserved his judgment as to a fourth point until the facts shall be ascertained. I think that this was a proper course, and also that, subject to one qualification, his Lordship's judgment on the points he has decided is right. The Lord Ordinary holds, in the first place, that the burden must be apportioned according to the value of the estates. If this means the saleable value or the capitalised value of the rental, I am unable to agree with it. It is unnecessary for the present purpose to consider what the remedy of the annuitant might be if the rents were insufficient to meet her claim. But primarily at all events, her annuity is a charge upon the rents, or if the lands be unlet, upon the income or annual proceeds of the estates. I think it follows that in the application to this particular case of the general rule which his Lordship has correctly stated, the contribution must be in proportion to the rent or annual proceeds. The burden to be divided is an annual charge from year to year during the widowhood of the annuitant, and the contribution must be made from year to year as the claim arises in proportion to the income of each year. On the second point which the Lord Ordinary has decided, I agree with him, for the reasons he has stated. The defender claims that the interest of a heritable debt of £10,000 which was secured over Drumcrosshall before the burden was imposed, and is therefore preferable to the claim of the annuitant, must be deducted, and that only the balance of the rental is to be taken into account in apportioning the annuity between the two estates. This appears to me to follow from the rule that the burden is to be divided in proportion to the value of the estate charged. The estate of Drumcrosshall is charged with the annuity, subject always to the preferable claims of the creditors in the £10,000 bond. The annuitant could not have attached the rents which have in fact been applied, or the rents which may in future years be applicable to payment of interest on the bond; and the pursuer cannot look for his relief from rents which are beyond the reach of the annuitant. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the pursuer has no title to inquire whether the debt might or might not have been cleared off by Mr Cowan's trustees in the execution of their trust. He has no personal claim against the defender, who is under no personal obligation either to him or to the annuitant. His right to relief depends upon the incidence of real burdens, and these must be taken as they stood when he acquired the estate of Kirkton, and as they still stand when his claim for contribution is brought forward. If the debt on Drumcrosshall were cleared off the income available from that estate to meet the annuity would be enlarged, and the proportionate liability of the estate to contribute along with Kirkton would be increased. But, in the meantime, there is a real security over Drumcrosshall which is preferable to the annuity, and the rental available for the annuity must be so much the less so long as that security subsists.

The third point decided by the Lord Ordinary is not now in dispute.

No. 136.

Mar. 20, 1896.
Ferrier v. Cowan.

His Lordship has repelled the second plea in law for the defender, and that part of his interlocutor is not brought under review.

The question which the Lord Ordinary has reserved is whether the pursuer is entitled to a decree which may prejudice the interests of secondary creditors over Drumcrosshall. The only point of this kind that has been argued is whether the equity which in certain circumstances enables creditors holding postponed securities over part of an insolvent estate to prevent a catholic creditor from impairing their securities unnecessarily in the exercise of his preferable rights can be made applicable to such a case as the present, where the right which it is proposed to control by equity is not that of another creditor on the estate of a common debtor but of the owner of a separate property, who is under no personal obligation either to the creditor in the real burden or to the creditors on the other estate over which the burden extends. But it is not clear that that question arises in the shape in which it was presented in argument. We have heard no argument as yet as to the precise terms of the decree to which the pursuer may be entitled, and I think it would be premature to decide anything as to the rights of postponed creditors until the conclusions of the summons have been fully considered. I am of opinion that we should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

The trustee, James Landell Selkirk, C.A., having rejected the claim in toto, Campbell & Sons appealed to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire. Mar. 20, 1896. Stevenson's Trustee v. Campbell & Sons.

The trustee denied that the goods were delivered on the order or on the credit of Stevenson & Lauder.

Proof was led, of which the material results were as follows:—

In 1890 William Stark had certain building contracts in hand, which he was unable, without financial assistance, to carry through. Stevenson & Lauder acted as financial agents for the properties on which the buildings were to be erected, and arrangements were made by James W. Stevenson to enable Stark to obtain material for the completion of the work.

Thomas Wallace, Campbell & Son's cashier, deponed,—"I told him (Stevenson) that we were not fond of giving Stark goods unless we had some security for the money. Mr Stevenson told me that Stark was doing work entirely for him. Mr Stevenson was a property speculator. It did not suit him to have the account in J. W. Stevenson's name, but said his firm of Stevenson & Lauder would bind and oblige themselves to see us paid, and so these transactions went on for a series of years, —I think three. During that time we got about £500 paid to us by the late J. W. Stevenson. The settlement took place in almost every case in the same mode as the bill before the Court. We put on Stark & Son, and Stevenson & Lauder indorsed the bill. It was arranged that Mr Stark was to order the goods, and that we should render the accounts and draw on Stark, and Stevenson should indorse the bills. I looked to J. W. Stevenson as the party ordering the goods. Stark was simply ordering the goods as a workman employed by Stevenson, and Mr Stevenson was to see us paid. . . . We stopped Stark's account immediately we knew that Stevenson was dead. . . . Cross.—Mr Stevenson told me that he would see me paid for what Stark ordered."

Ebenezer Gilchrist, a partner of the dissolved firm of Stevenson & Lauder, deponed,—"My firm acted as financial agents in connection with certain properties in Langside and Shawlands. Stark was carrying on the building operations in connection with these transactions. My firm drew all the advances in connection with the buildings, and paid Stark's wages and the material in connection with the work . . . I had general instructions from Mr Stevenson that if Mr Stark presented the appellants any orders, I was to sign or initial them. (Q.) Did you not understand that Mr Stevenson had agreed to pay the material got from the appellants; was that not the footing on which you were dealing with them? (A.) It practically amounts to that."

William Stark deponed,—"I said to Mr Stevenson that if I carried on he would require to become security for the stuff I required. I think Mr Gilchrist told me to go up to T. B. Campbell's and order what stuff I wanted. . . . I understood by my arrangement with Mr Stevenson that it was on his behalf that I was ordering that material. . . . Cross.— . . . I got my wages, and the stuff was guaranteed by Stevenson & Lauder. . . . The goods supplied by the appellants (Campbell & Sons) was not on my own account, it was for the properties I was completing. I had no credit, and Mr Stevenson was security."

To the extent of £22, 1s. 10d. the orders for the goods referred to in the claimants' account were initialed by Stevenson & Lauder.

The claimants also produced in support of their claim a bill for £84, 19s. 2d., payable on 15th September 1893, and undischarged, drawn by them upon Stark, and indorsed by Stevenson & Lauder, and evidence, which need not be further referred to, was led to shew that the indorsation imputed an obligation on Stevenson & Lauder to retire the bill at maturity.

On 5th February the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) recalled the deliverance of the trustee, and appointed him to rank the claimants to the extent of £107, 1s., that being the amount of the bill indorsed by Stevenson & Lauder, and of the orders initialed by them, upon the ground that the indorsations and initialings were given to infer the liability of a security.

The trustee appealed, and argued;—The obligation of the bankrupt and his firm, if there was any obligation, was merely cautionary. They had come under no direct obligation for the price of the goods supplied to Stark, but had merely interponed their credit to enable Stark to get goods. He was not, therefore, liable as principal debtor. Further, he could not be made liable as security, for there was no valid evidence of a cautionary obligation.

Argued for the claimants;—It was proved that Stevenson was Stark's employer. It followed that Stevenson was liable for the price of the goods supplied to Stark. He had also undertaken to see the claimants paid, and this imported a primary liability against him.[1] At all events his liability as cautioner to the extent allowed by the Sheriff was validly proved.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am unable to take the Sheriff-substitute's view of this case. To my thinking the true question is, were the goods admitted to have been delivered to William Stark so delivered under a contract of sale with the bankrupt; or was the agreement between T. B. Campbell & Sons and the bankrupt merely that he should be cautioner for Stark? On this question I adopt the former alternative, and I am therefore for recalling the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor and also the deliverance of the trustee, and am for remitting to the trustee to rank T. B. Campbell & Sons for £192, 6s. 7d., being the full amount of their claim, minus 6s. for noting a bill.

The question which I have stated is to be determined on the evidence as a whole. The bankrupt was a building speculator. He found Stark in labouring circumstances, with a contract on hand which he had not the means to execute. Thinking there was money in the contract, the bankrupt is said to have "financed" Stark. What this exactly means, so far as concerns the ultimate adjustment of accounts between the bankrupt and Stark, I do not know, for the parties were unable to explain. It is enough to know that the bankrupt had a material interest to get the work finished, and, so far as the present question is concerned, we are required to see what he did, rather than why he did it. Now, his partner says quite plainly, "My firm drew all the advances in connection with the buildings and paid Stark wages and the material in connection with the buildings." If this be so, then the case of T. B. Campbell & Sons is simply an instance of the system, for their account is for material in connection with the buildings. When it is read as a whole, I think that the evidence comes to this, that the execution of the contract was undertaken by the bankrupt, Stark being reduced to the position of a servant on wages, and that this was the footing on which T. B. Campbell & Sons supplied the material in question.

In my judgment the present case is in substance and very nearly exactly that stated by the Court in Birkmyr v. Darnell,[1] "If two come to a shop, and one buys and the other . . . says, Let him have the goods, I will be your paymaster . . . this is an undertaking as for himself, and he shall be intended to be the very buyer, and the other to act but as his servant."

WILLIAM A. WILSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Chisholm.
JOHN TURNBULL & COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—W. Campbell—Constable.

Sale—Horse—Warranty—Proof of warranty—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), sec. 14.—Circumstances in which held that an oral statement, by a dealer in horses to a purchaser who said that he wished to buy a horse quiet to ride and drive, that a horse was quiet to ride and drive, did not imply a warranty.

Sale—Horse—Warranty.—The purchaser of a horse the second day after he received it rejected it on the ground that it had been warranted quiet to ride and drive, and that it was disconform to warranty.

It appeared that on the day after it had been put in the purchaser's stable it had been tried in the saddle by the purchaser and had given satisfaction, that on the following day the purchaser drove it in a dogcart along a road new to it, and that on coming near a bridge over a railway it was scared by the steam of a train which it could not see; that it then reared and turned round and refused to proceed.

Opinion, per cur., that even if the warranty were proved the conduct of the horse in the exceptional circumstances in which it was placed did not shew that it was not quiet to drive, and that the purchaser was not entitled to reject it without further trial.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Roxburghshire.

WILLIAM A. WILSON, merchant, Newcastle-on-Tyne, raised this action in the Sheriff Court at Selkirk against John Turnbull & Company, job and postmasters, Selkirk, who had a sale of horses in October 1894 at Cooper's Yard, Newcastle-on-Tyne. The summons concluded for payment of £34 as the price of a horse bought by the pursuer from the defenders at Newcastle.

The pursuer averred;—"On 29th October 1894 the pursuer purchased from the defenders a black horse, which John Turnbull, a partner of defenders' firm, warranted to the pursuer sound and quiet to ride and drive. The price was to be made up of the value of a grey horse belonging to the pursuer, and delivered to defenders at the time of sale, and the balance of £14 in cash. The value of the pursuer's grey horse is £20."

The pursuer further averred that on 31st October he tried the horse in harness and found it unsafe to drive, and that thereupon he rejected it as disconform to warranty.

Wilson v. Turnbull & Co.

The defenders denied "that any warranty was asked or given by either party, or that any price or standard of value was put on either horse."

A proof was allowed.*

* The pursuer deponed,—"I saw John Turnbull of defender's firm on Monday morning, the 29th of October. I then told him what sort of horse I required. . . . I said I wished a horse to carry me occasionally, and that my wife could drive,—a thorough quiet, aged horse, but sound. I said I wished it quiet in harness. No one overheard this conversation. I saw Turnbull afterwards on the same day, and then I sent my groom, Turner, to look at defenders' horses. Turnbull said he had a black horse that he thought would suit me. That was after I had described the horse I wished. Turner has been with me about three years. He is an experienced man, and knows a deal about horses. He reported that he thought the horse would be a very suitable one. I asked the horse to be sent along for my inspection to my house at five o'clock that day. Turnbull came a little after that. It was getting dark when he arrived. I went out to the stable to see the black horse. I found it in my stable. . . . Turnbull said it was a horse that had been regularly hunted, and was a great favourite with the gentlemen around, and was thoroughly quiet in both single and double harness. . . . I bought the horse on his statement—on the statement he had made to me that the horse was perfectly sound, and quiet to ride and drive. I would not have bought the horse if he had not made that statement. . . . On the following morning, the 30th October, the horse was tried in the saddle, and he went very well. . . . I tried him in harness on the morning of the 31st of October. He was yoked in a dog-cart. It was not a trial. I used him to take me to the train. I drove the horse myself. The groom was sitting beside me. About 300 yards from my house is a railway bridge. The horse went quite well to within a short distance of the railway bridge. A train was passing, and when he saw the smoke he stopped, and got up on his hind legs. I tried to get him to face the bridge, but found it dangerous. He reared two or three times. I could not get him to go forward, the horse turned from the bridge in spite of me. I said to my man, This horse is no use to me, take him back to the stable. I am sure it was dangerous to drive that horse past there. My man went back for another horse. I consider I gave the horse a fair trial on that occasion. I thought at the time that the horse was not what it had been represented to be as to quietness. . . . Cross-examined.— . . . I relied upon the opinion of Turner about the horse, or I would not have sent him. . . . When the horse was brought, I told Turnbull that unless it was perfectly quiet it was no use to me. I am quite sure I said that. After we had made the bargain, in presence of his groom and my coachman, he said that my wife need have no regret in parting with the grey; that the black horse was just as good in every respect, and was as quiet as a lamb. The words, as quiet as a lamb, I took to be a warranty. He used the same words in my house. I do not think that he tried the grey horse, but I believe it was run up the street. He took my word, and did not ask me for any warranty. . . ."

W. A. Wilson, the pursuer's son, who was on the dog-cart when the horse reared, deponed that there was not much smoke from the train, but a great deal of steam.

John Turnbull deponed,—"I remember pursuer coming to the stables on 27th October. . . . He said he wanted a horse, and described the sort of horse he wanted. He said he wanted a thick-set, old-fashioned made horse, about eight or nine years old. I said I had something to suit him. I shewed him a brown horse, but we did not come to terms about this horse. . . . Next time I saw pursuer was on Monday, the 29th October, in the forenoon. I saw him in the yard. . . . I drew his attention to another horse, the black horse in dispute in this case. I said here was a horse like suiting his purpose, that I had just got in. He saw

May 12, 1896. Wilson v. Turnbull & Co.

On 14th February 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Harper) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds the pursuer's case depends upon an alleged warranty of the black horse in question: Finds in law the said alleged warranty is not proved: Therefore assoilzies the defenders."

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—There was evidence of warranty that the horse was quiet to ride and drive. If a purchaser asked for a horse quiet to ride and drive and a seller said, "Here is such an one," that amounted to warranty.[1] It was not necessary to use the word "warranty." It was always a question for a jury or a Judge whether representations came up to warranty, and this was to be inferred from the nature of the sale and the circumstances of the case. Even if there was not express warranty, at least under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sec. 14 (1),* there was implied warranty. Even although the horse was sent for inspection, that could not remove the onus to the buyer's side, because he could not there and then decide if the horse was quiet. He gave it a fair trial, and the result was to disclose inherent vice.

him ridden in the yard, and shewed up and down. . . . He said he would send his man to look at it. . . . I bought that horse on the Monday forenoon after breakfast time. I bought it from John Lowther, horsedealer, Carlisle. Lowther said he would sell a horse to me as quiet to ride and drive, and a good hunter. I did not take that as a warranty. . . . Turner put the horse now in question to trials at the stables, in my presence. He seemed pleased with him, and said he would go along and see his master. He returned and said I was to be out at his master's house at five o'clock. I went out at that time to the pursuer's house. Stewart was with me. I drove. The horse went very well. We had some difficulty in finding the house, and in that way we spent some time on the road. The horse gave every satisfaction to me as it went. When we arrived at the pursuer's he was not at home, and we put the horse in the stables. Pursuer came in shortly afterwards. The black horse and the grey horse were both driven out. We then set to bargaining. We came to terms. . . . We went into the pursuer's house. . . . The bargain was completed before we went in. We saw Mrs Wilson in the house. She came out with us, to say good-bye to the grey horse. I did not understand in making the bargain that I was giving the pursuer a warranty with the black horse. Neither the word warranty nor guarantee was used by either of us. I said that the horse was quiet to ride and drive, so far as I knew, and sound. It was after dark when the bargaining was done. I had a conversation with Mrs Wilson, and told her she need not be sorry to part with the grey horse. I might have said the black horse was as quiet as a

* The Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. c. 71), sec. 14, enacts,—"Subject to the provisions of this Act, and of any statute in that behalf, there is no implied warranty or condition as to the quality or fitness for any particular purpose of goods supplied under a contract of sale, except as follows:—(1) When the buyer expressly or by implication makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required so as to shew that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose, provided that in the case of a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade name there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose."

Argued for the defenders;—There was a presumption against warranty in (1) the low price of the horse; (2) the absence of evidence of the seller's misrepresentations regarding the nature of the horse; (3) the pursuer sending a man to inspect the horse, and relying on his opinion; and (4) the numerous occasions on which the horse was exhibited and inspected, in none of which the word "warranty" was used. To constitute warranty the representations must be made in such circumstances that the seller should realise that the buyer was looking for warranty, and was relying for this on the seller's words. The words used were only the usual recommendations common to horse-dealers, and did not amount to warranty.[1] No question was asked of the seller to shew him that the sale depended on his answer, and this differentiated the case from Scott v. Steel.[2] (2) There was no implied warranty under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, as the pursuer was relying on his own and his groom's inspection. (3) Assuming a warranty, the horse had not had a fair trial, and in the circumstances the behaviour of the horse did not amount to breach of warranty.[3]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Cases relating to warranty generally present considerable difficulty, for the border line between mere recommendation and warranty is a very hazy one. The authorities to which we have been referred illustrate this difficulty. In this particular case, however, I think there is lamb. It is a common expression. I did not say to her that it had been driven by a lady. The recommendations I have mentioned were just general statements made to the pursuer, not in answer to questions put by him. The pursuer did not say that he was relying upon anything I was saying as a warranty. I consider that the transaction being a swop, a warranty was not customary. I did not ask a warranty for his horse, and he did not ask me for one for mine. Pursuer had seen the horse tried, and seemed satisfied. He had also sent his man to try the horse. All the circumstances I have mentioned, to my mind, exclude the idea of the pursuer putting reliance upon what I had said as a warranty. . . . Wilson said he wished the horse quiet to ride and drive. I am quite sure that I had the black horse in Cooper's yard on the Monday forenoon when Mr Wilson came. I pointed out this horse to him. I told him this horse had just come in. Pursuer's groom described the kind of horse his master wanted, quiet to ride and drive, for his master was a big weight. . . . In driving the black horse out to the pursuer's house on the Monday, we did not pass any steam. I was thoroughly pleased with it, and thought he was the quietest horse I had ever seen. I did not give a warranty with the horse. I would scruple to give a warranty with any horse; we never give a warranty with a swop. I would be very much against giving a warranty with any horse. If I was in the habit of warranting horses, I would have had no hesitation in warranting this horse as quiet to ride and drive, after driving it out to pursuer's house. I consider that in offering this horse to the pursuer I was offering him the sort of horse he wished. If a gentleman comes to me and asks for a horse quiet to ride and drive, and I say here is a horse that will suit you, I do not consider that a warranty. I often do that. I did that in this case. . . ."

no evidence sufficient to justify us in finding that a warranty was given. The Sheriff-substitute has gone carefully into the circumstances of the case, and I agree with him in finding that the defenders gave no warranty. It is unnecessary for me to go into all the circumstances which lead me to that conclusion. I think the quotation from the late Lord President's opinion in the case of Robeson v. Waugh,[1] 2 R. at p. 66, is clearly in point here. I refer to the passage where he says, "It would be absurd to attach any importance to such words, which were merely verba volantia." I am therefore satisfied that here there was no warranty.

But apart from that I agree with the Sheriff-substitute that even if there was a warranty there was no sufficient trial. To take a strange horse, in a strange vehicle, in strange hands, and in a strange country, and to drive it to a place where it would suddenly be confronted with the smoke and noise of an unseen train, to which it was not accustomed, was to expose it to a very severe trial. I am not surprised that the horse reared a little and tried to turn back. Even if it had been quite up to the warranty that it was quiet to drive, it would not have been at all remarkable if it had been startled in the circumstances disclosed in the evidence, particularly if it had not been long out and was fresh. The circumstances were the most trying conceivable to the nerves of any horse, and its conduct upon such an occasion might not indicate anything incompatible with perfect quietness in harness. The best of horses may occasionally be taken suddenly by surprise and rear up. I think there is no ground for interfering with the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD YOUNG and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the interlocutor appealed against: Find in fact (1) that on 29th October 1894 the pursuer purchased a black horse from the defenders, which was duly delivered and the price thereof paid to the defenders; (2) that the pursuer on 31st October thereafter rejected said horse as disconform to warranty, which he alleged had been given by the defenders, and that the defenders refused to accept said rejection; (3) that said horse was not warranted by the defenders: Find in law that the pursuer was not entitled to reject said horse: Therefore assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decern: Find the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.

Horse—Agreement to winter a horse—Injury to horse—Liability of custodier—Proof—Onus.—A farmer undertook to winter a colt belonging to a postmaster. In the course of the winter the colt was found to have sustained a serious injury to its right eye. The postmaster raised an action of damages against the farmer, averring that the injury to the colt's eye was caused by its being struck in the face by the defender, or some person for whom she was responsible; or otherwise, that the injury was caused through the colt's eye having come in contact with some of the sharp edges of the reed fence in which the colt, with culpable negligence, was enclosed, and pleaded that the injury having been caused by the fault or neglect of the defender, she was liable in damages.

The Court assoilzied the defender, on the ground that the pursuer had failed to prove that the accident to the colt had been caused by the fault of the defender.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that the custodier of an animal in such circumstances is only liable for an accident to it if fault is proved against him.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Fife and Kinross.

WILLIAM SUTHERLAND, postmaster, Cupar, raised this action in the Sheriff Court at Cupar against Mrs Marianne Hutton, tenant of Cults Farm, Fifeshire, for payment of £40 as damages for injury sustained by a colt belonging to the pursuer, which the defender had agreed to winter from 1st November 1894 to 31st March 1895, for £3.

The pursuer's averments included the following statements:—(Cond. 4) "It was an inherent or implied part of said bargain, and it is the practice in the county of Fife in such bargains, that the party receiving a colt in terms of such a bargain is bound to see to it that the colt is well cared for and treated, and well and safely housed, and placed in no dangerous or injurious proximity, or with any such surroundings, that it comes by no harm or injury, and that at the end of the wintering period arranged for it is equal in health and condition to the state in which it was when first left on the farm, or that the person receiving the colt and taking it in charge is responsible to the owner of it for the loss and damage the owner may sustain if the colt be not at the end of the period of wintering in similar health and condition to that in which it was when taken in hand at the beginning of the period."

On 14th January 1895 a messenger from Cults informed the pursuer that the colt had received an injury to its right eye. On that day he visited the colt, and finding the injury serious, he employed a veterinary surgeon to treat it, but without effect, and the colt ultimately became blind in that eye.

(Cond. 9) "The injury to said colt's eye was caused either through its being struck on the face by defender, or a person or persons for whom she is responsible, with a ragged or a sharp-pointed stick, or a hayfork, or a stone or a graip; or otherwise, the injury was caused through the colt's eye having come in contact with some of the sharp edges of the reed fence in which the colt was, with culpable negligence, enclosed. On pursuer calling on defender's manager to explain how the colt received the injury he professed his inability to do so, although he was bound to have been in a position to give the required information. Defender's counter averments are denied."

The defender averred that her son Alexander Hutton, who managed her farm, discovered the injury to the colt on the evening of 13th January, and on the earliest possible opportunity next morning sent word to the pursuer. She admitted her inability to explain the cause of the accident, explained that in her view the injury was the result of pure accident, and denied the pursuer's statements of the manner in which the injury was inflicted, and of the practice in Fifeshire in such bargains. She stated that it "was a distinctly expressed condition of the arrangement that the animal, during its stay at Cults Farm, was to be at the risk of the owner, and that if an accident occurred to it the defender was at once to inform the pursuer thereof."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) Said colt having been injured while in defender's custody, and by the fault or neglect of the defender, as stated, she is liable to pursuer in the loss and damage thereby sustained. (2) Defender having through fault or neglect failed to restore the said colt to pursuer at 31st March 1895 in sound and good condition, and pursuer having thereby sustained loss and damage to the extent of £40, defender is liable to pursuer in that sum. (3) Said colt having suffered damage through the failure or neglect of defender to observe and fulfil the conditions of pursuer's said bargain, and pursuer having thereby suffered loss and damage to the extent of £40, defender is liable to pursuer in that sum, and in any event the injury to the colt having been aggravated by defender's neglect thereof, defender is liable to pursuer in reparation therefor. (4) Pursuer having sustained damage through the fault or neglect of the defender, is entitled to reparation as craved.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The colt in question not having sustained injury through the fault or negligence of the defender, or of those for whom she is responsible, the defender is not liable in damages to the pursuer. (2) The defender having bestowed all reasonable care and attention on the colt while in her custody, is not liable for the consequences of an accident, against which no amount of forethought or care could provide. (3) It being an express or implied condition of the bargain between the parties that the animal while it remained in the defender's custody was at the pursuer's risk, the defender is entitled to be assoilzied.

After a proof, the Sheriff-substitute (Henderson) found, inter alia, that it was one of the conditions of the bargain that the colt was to stand at the owner's risk; that the cause of the injury could not be ascertained; and that the injury was one of the risks which the pursuer undertook; and assoilzied the defender.*

* "NOTE.—If this case had to be decided apart from the conditions under which the bargain was made—which it is however proper to remark appear to be the usual conditions in Fife, and even elsewhere—I am inclined to think that the result would be very different.

"The whole tendency of the law of Scotland with regard to injuries suffered by horses, whether hired, lent, or grazed out, seems to me to make the hirer, borrower, or custodier liable for any injuries which the animal may receive while under his control, unless he can prove that the injury suffered was not owing to any fault in himself, his servants, or anything for which he is responsible. He must prove that he has exercised that reasonable care with reference to the animal entrusted to him which a prudent man would take of his own property. While fully recognising this as the regular rule of law in such circumstances, I feel that in this case, and indeed in all similar cases in Fife, unless the owner makes a separate bargain for himself, the custodier of a wintering colt is understood not to be under that rule. The only obligation he seems to be under is to intimate the occurrence of an accident to the owner as soon as he knows of it himself. Whether this practice has arisen from the infrequency of accidents, or on account of the wretchedly low sum paid for wintering, it is useless to inquire. The practice has been proved to exist, and even if it did not exist as the rule in Fife, it was expressly made a part of the bargain in this case. . . .

"On the general rule of law, apart from special bargain, a very interesting argument was adduced to me, and the following authorities were cited, and have been carefully considered :—

"For Pursuer— ——— v. Davidson, June 2, 1749, M. 10,081; Robertson v. Ogle, June 23, 1809, F. C., No. 120; Marquis v. Ritchie, June 11, Sutherland v. Hutton.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The horse being uninjured when placed in the defender's custody, and injured when returned, fault was to be presumed, and it lay on the defender to prove that there was no fault on her part.[1] The pursuer averred fault, but he did not require to prove it, for his case rested on fault presumed, not on fault proved. The Sheriff-substitute was wrong in not applying the law which he correctly stated. He took the case out of the common law by holding that a special contract was made. But this special contract did not relieve the defender of responsibility for injury caused by her fault.

Counsel for the defender was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case in certain aspects might have raised considerable difficulty, especially in view of certain observations on the law occurring in decided cases. But in the view which I take it is not necessary to consider these questions. The pursuer in his averments and the pleas which he has based on these averments, asserts that in point of fact the defender was in fault. I have considered the evidence and the arguments which have been presented to us upon that evidence, and I find that the facts as proved do not establish any fault on the part of the defender, and therefore that no facts are proved to support the pleas upon which the pursuer's case is based. These pleas cannot therefore be upheld. On the case I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is right, and ought to be affirmed.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. But I would be prepared to go a step further. I think that not only was this action laid upon fault, but it does not occur to me that it could have been laid upon anything else. If we look at the ninth condescendence we find that it sets forth the grounds of the pursuer's case.—(His Lordship read the article). I should have thought that the colt's eye was hurt by coming in contact with a projection or nail in the fence, a chance to which all cattle in a field are exposed, though the chances are very considerably in favour of their not hurting themselves in that way. I think the probability is that the animal's eye was hurt in the second of the ways indicated in the article of the condescendence which I have read. If it had been proved that the reed was enclosed in a dangerous manner, in a way in which no person who engages to take care of other people's cattle was entitled to have it enclosed, the only question would have been whether such a case was supported by the evidence. It is admitted, and very properly admitted by Mr Lorimer, for the pursuer, that there is no evidence of anyone having struck the colt, or of its having been injured owing to the dangerous state in which the fence was left. So it came to this, that the pursuer said,—"I don't know how this injury happened, but by law the person who

I am quite prepared to negative that, and to say that that is not the law of Scotland, but that the law is that the risk of accident is not with the custodier but with the owner. The custodier is liable for neglect or any actionable fault, but not for accident without fault. I think that that was what happened here. There was an accident which happened without anyone being to blame for it. That was just a risk—an infinitesimal risk—to which the colt was exposed. I think it will be sufficient in pronouncing our interlocutor to negative the statements of fact on which the pursuer's case rests, to find that in fact there was no fault, and that in point of law there was consequently no liability.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the interlocutor appealed against: Find in fact that the pursuer has failed to prove that the accident to the colt in question belonging to the pursuer was caused through the fault or negligence of the defender: Find in law that the defender is not liable in damages to the pursuer: Therefore assoilzie her from the conclusions of the summons, and decern."

Reparation—Master and Servant—Coal Mine—Person in superintendence—Engineman—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42), section 1, subsection 2—Fault in failing to light pit.—A brought an action of damages against a coal company on account of the death of her son, who had been employed in one of the defenders' pits, and had met his death by falling down the shaft. She claimed damages (1) under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, on the ground that the accident was due to the fault of the engineman in hoisting the cage from the midworking, where the pursuer's son was employed, before the indicator shewed that the gate at the entrance to the shaft was closed; and (2) at common law on the ground that the accident had been caused by the defenders' failure properly to light the pit-bottom.

Held (1) that the engineman was not a person having superintendence entrusted to him in the sense of subsection 2 of section 1 of the Employers Liability Act, and that the action was therefore irrelevant under the statute but (2) that there was a case for trial at common law in regard to the alleged failure of the defenders properly to light the pit-bottom.

MRS ELLEN MILLWARD OR FARNHAM, residing at Galston, brought an action of damages in the Sheriff Court at Kilmarnock against the New Bank Coal Company on account of the death of her son, William Millward, who had been employed as a driver and bottomer in a midworking of one of the defenders' pits, and had met his death by falling down the shaft.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 3) "The duty of the said William John Millward was to run the hutches, which the other two men filled, from their working place to the shaft, a distance of about 200 yards. He had also to remove the empty hutch from the cage, draw it into a short lye, and push the full hutch on the cage. He then required to lower a bar across the entrance to the shaft, and signal to the engineman to draw the cage with the full hutch to the pit-head." (Cond. 4) "The shaft of the pit is protected by two bars across the entrance, one at a distance of about two feet and the other at a distance of four feet from the ground." (Cond. 5) "When these bars are raised in order to allow a hutch to be placed on or taken from the cage, the shaft remains open. This is shewn at the pithead by an indicator, and it is provided by rule 2 of the additional special rules for East and West of Scotland mining districts, 'the engineman is prohibited from moving the cage from said midworking until the indicator shews that the gate is closed.'" (Cond. 6) "Prior to and at the date of the accident after mentioned, the defenders were in fault in not having a light at the pit-bottom where the said William John Millward was working, as, in the absence of a light, the open shaft was a source of constant danger to the workmen in the pit. . . . Since the date of said accident a light has been provided for said pit-bottom." (Cond. 7) "In the course of his employment during the night of said 17th December 1894, the said William John Millward took from the cage an empty hutch which had been sent down from the pithead and pulled or pushed it into said lye. Immediately afterwards he pushed forward a full hutch, which he had a short time previously brought from the working place of the said . . . During the short interval which had elapsed between his taking off the empty hutch and pushing forward the full one, the engineman, ——— Martin, carelessly, negligently, and in breach of the foresaid regulation, removed the cage upwards towards the pithead, the result being that the said William John Millward was precipitated down the shaft along with the full hutch which he had just been engaged pushing along towards the cage, and was instantaneously killed." (Cond. 8) "The said accident was due to the engineman having raised the cage to the pithead in contravention of the foresaid rule. The said engineman is a person in the service of the defenders having superintendence entrusted to him, and the accident referred to happened whilst he was in the exercise of such superintendence, and was caused by his negligence." (Cond. 9) "Said accident was also caused by the fault of the defenders and their manager in failing to place a light near the part of the shaft at which the deceased was working. This was, on the part of the defenders and their said manager, neglect of a precaution which was indispensable to the safety of the deceased and the defenders' other employees; and the said open shaft did, in the darkness, form a trap which, even with the exercise of more than ordinary care, would not have been avoided by the deceased. . . ."

The defenders denied that the engineman was a person to whom superintendence was entrusted, or that they were in fault in not having lights at the places mentioned by the pursuer.

On 12th February 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Hall) allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial.

The defenders objected to the relevancy, and argued;—(1) An engineman was employed wholly in manual labour, and was not a person to whom superintendence was entrusted in the sense of the Employers Liability Act.[1] The case of persons in charge of engines was not overlooked by the Legislature in framing the Act, for it contained a special clause dealing with those in charge of locomotive engines.[2] (2) There was no case at common law, for it was the negligence of the engineman, and not the absence of light, which was put forward as the primary or real cause of the accident.[3] Employers were under no obligation to take special precautions to obviate the possible results of breaches of duty on the part of their servants. Further, miners were not in the habit of trusting to fixed lights, but to the lamps which they carried with them. There were no provisions in the Coal Mines Regulation Act[4] making lighting obligatory.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) The defenders were liable under the Employers Liability Act for the fault of the engineman, who was a person having superintendence entrusted to him in the sense of the Act.[5] (2) The averments as to the failure of the defenders properly to light the pit were sufficient to support the action at common law.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the pursuer has no case under the Employers Liability Act, but condescendence 9 makes statements as to the light which seem to me to make it impossible to preclude inquiry, and the inquiry must be in the ordinary form of trial before a jury.

I observe that the issue does not specify the alternative sum claimed under the Act, and therefore in approving the issue we are really determining that the case is one solely on the question of light.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

Held that the sale embraced the deceased's whole interest in the assets of the firm, including not merely the book debts outstanding at the date of the agreement, but all fees received by the firm since the last division of profits on 31st January 1894.

THE late Alexander Alexander, M.B., C.M., Pulteneytown, Wick, carried on a medical practice in Wick in partnership with his brother, John Alexander, M.D., Wick, and Samuel Elliot, M.D., was their assistant. Dr Alexander Alexander died on 15th April 1894, and his widow, Mrs Elizabeth Alexander, was decerned his executrix-dative.

By minute of agreement, dated 21st and 26th July 1894, between Mrs Alexander, executrix-dative of her husband, and Dr Elliot, the former sold to the latter "the deceased's whole right and interest in the practice carried on by the said firm of J. & A. Alexander, and now belonging to the first party as his executrix-dative qua relict, consisting of (first) the deceased's share, right, and interest in the horses, harness, machines, and others belonging to the said firm of J. & A. Alexander; (second) the deceased's share, right, and interest in the medical and surgical instruments and medical books belonging to the said firm; (third) the deceased's share, right, and interest in the book debts, including the goodwill of the business belonging to the said firm," all in consideration of the sum of £485, Dr Elliot undertaking to free and relieve Mrs Alexander and the representatives of the deceased of all debts and obligations due by the firm of J. & A. Alexander in any matter of way whatsoever.

In January 1895 Mrs Alexander, as executrix of her late husband, raised this action against Dr John Alexander for count and reckoning as to the profits of the late firm due to the pursuer for the period between 31st January 1894, the date of the last division of profits, and the date of her husband's death, and for payment.

The pursuer averred that between the 31st January 1894 and the 15th April there were banked sums of money collected by the partners of the firm from patients and others, and that between 15th April and 21st July there were collected by the defender Alexander sums in respect of business done by the firm prior to her husband's death, although not paid for until after that event. She averred that the nett profits amounted to £371, 18s. 4d., of which the half was the share of her late husband.

With regard to the agreement the pursuer averred;—"In respect of said agreement the pursuer lays no claim in the present action to any sum in consideration of the deceased's interests disposed of to Dr Elliot under the said agreement, and limits her claims to the deceased's share of the partnership funds actually recovered and in bonis of the firm prior to the date of the said agreement."

The defender Alexander pleaded;—(1) No title to sue; (2) All parties not called.

Dr Elliot was thereafter allowed to sist himself as defender, and lodged defences. He pleaded;—(2) No title to sue.

On 26th February 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the first plea in law for the defender Dr Alexander, and the second plea in law for the defender Dr Elliot, and therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns." *

Alexander v. Alexander.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuer was entitled to the deceased's share of the profits from 31st January to 15th April 1894 in so far as ingathered before 21st July 1894. The agreement only applied to debts outstanding at its date, and not to sums already in bonis of the firm. Ingathered money was not a "book debt." After 15th April the firm still existed for winding up, and sums in the defender Alexander's possession belonged to the firm, and were debts due by him to it. A balance in bank was not a book debt.[1] A book debt was a debt on current account.[2] Book debts were particularly specified as assigned to Dr Elliot, and excluded collected money under the maxims specialia derogant generalibus and enumeratio unius est exclusio alterius.[3] This was not a mortis causa transaction, but one inter vivos, and the passage in M'Laren on Wills[4] relied on by the defenders did not apply.

the period between 31st January 1894, when there was a division of the profits between the two brothers, and the 15th of April 1894, when the firm was dissolved by the death of the pursuer's husband. The defence is, or rather one defence is, that the pursuer has no title to sue, in respect that the whole interest of the deceased in the assets of the firm was assigned by the pursuer, by a certain agreement of 21st July 1894, to the defender Dr Elliot.

"Now, that being so, the question I have to decide is a question upon the construction of that agreement. It is on the one hand maintained that the agreement dealt merely with certain corporeal moveables belonging to the firm, with the goodwill of the firm, and with certain book debts which were outstanding at the date of the agreement of July 1894. The other view, the view of the defenders, is that the agreement covered the whole assets of the firm, and that in particular it covered all book debts, whether collected or uncollected, which had been outstanding at the date of the deceased's death, and whether these book debts had been incurred prior to 31st January 1894, the date of the last division of profits, or between that date and 15th April 1894, when, as I have said, the partnership was dissolved. It appears that between January 1894 and the date of dissolution a number of book debts,—that is to say, fees due by patients,—were ingathered and put in bank; and it also appears that certain further collections were made by the surviving partner between the date of dissolution and the date of the agreement of July. And the point really in controversy is, how far the book debts thus collected and placed in bank are to be dealt with as within the agreement. Now, I have had a good deal of difficulty about that matter. The agreement, I must say, does not seem to me to be very well expressed,—it is, indeed, very loosely expressed; but after full consideration I have not seen my way to hold otherwise than that the agreement covers the whole assets of the firm, including the whole book debts, whether collected or uncollected, whether they remain payable by customers or have been paid by them and lodged in bank. Of course so far as they were in that position they were not book debts in the popular sense, but debts due by the firm's bankers to the partners. Still I think they must be held to have been book debts in the sense of the agreement."

Alexander v. Alexander.

Argued for the defender Elliot;—This was a question of construction, and the intention of the agreement clearly was to transfer to him the deceased's whole interest in the firm and all his claims against it. On the defender's part he agreed in lieu of this to take over all the deceased's liabilities. The specification in the agreement did not exclude the generality.[1] The various things mentioned were only illustrations.[2] In this view book debts included not only those still outstanding but those already collected. If less had been intended it should have been expressed.

Counsel for the defender Alexander adopted the argument for the defender Elliot.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There can be no doubt that this agreement was not very fortunately expressed, but I think it was plainly the intention of the parties to make a complete settlement between this lady and Dr Elliot. No doubt if we were to put a very strict and technical meaning on the expression book debts, the proceeds of debts which had been collected would not fall under that expression, but I have come to be of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that we must read the term book debts in the sense of the agreement, and that the intention of the agreement was that all the moneys due to the firm should be collected by the defender and retained for his own use, he undertaking all responsibility for the firm's liabilities.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and have practically nothing to add. I think that the meaning of the parties to this agreement was that the executrix was to transfer the whole of the deceased's interest in the undistributed fees of patients. She gave up all right to claim as representing the deceased, and she was relieved from all liability as representing him. I concur with the Lord Ordinary, and think that his interlocutor should be affirmed.

May 14, 1896. Henderson's Trustees v. Dunfermline District Committee of Fife County Council.

1st Division. Sheriff of Fifeshire.

THIS was an action at the instance of the testamentary trustees of the deceased George W. Mercer Henderson, of Fordel, as proprietors of the estate of Fordel, upon which Pitadro Quarry was situate, against the Dunfermline District Committee of the Fife County Council, who in terms of the Local Government Act, 1889, acted as road trustees within their district. The pursuers craved the Court to interdict the defenders "from introducing a stone-breaking machine with steam traction engine, or any other machinery for the purpose of breaking stones which have been taken from" Pitadro Quarry, "and from making into road metal by said stone-breaking machinery in said quarry the stones quarried therefrom."

The pursuers averred:—(Cond. 3) "The defenders and their predecessors have for a considerable number of years quarried stones from said Pitadro Quarry for the purpose of providing metal for the roads under their charge. Recently they have adopted a novel method of dealing with the stones which are quarried from said Pitadro Quarry. Instead of merely searching for, digging, and carrying away materials for making or repairing roads, footpaths, &c., the defenders have, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the pursuers, persisted in introducing from time to time into said quarry a stone-breaking machine and steam traction engine, the stone-breaking machine being driven by the said traction engine, and the stones quarried by the defenders are broken into road metal by the said stone-breaking machinery within said quarry. In particular, this has been done, in spite of the pursuers' remonstrances, so recently as November 1895. Said quarry is situated within the policy wall of the estate of Fordel, and the defenders' operations, as condescended on, are detrimental to the interests of the pursuers as proprietors of said estate."

The defenders stated:—"(1) The defenders and their predecessors have for a period exceeding forty years quarried stones from Pitadro Quarry under the powers conferred on them by the General Turnpike Act (1 and 2 Will IV. cap. 43), and the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878.* (3) For a good many years after the quarry was opened

* By section 80 of the General Turnpike Act (1 and 2 William IV. cap. 43), which is incorporated with the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, schedule C, it is enacted—"That it shall be lawful for the trustees of any turnpike road, or any person authorised by them, to search for, dig, and carry away materials for making or repairing such road, and the footpaths thereof, or building, making, or repairing any toll-house, bridge, or any other work connected with such road, from any common land, open uncultivated land or waste, or to deposit mud or rubbish thereon, without paying any surface damages or anything for such materials, except for stone to be used for building, and to carry the same through the ground of any person; . . . and also that it shall be lawful for such trustees, and other persons authorised by them as aforesaid, to search for, dig, and carry away any such materials in or out of the enclosed land of any person where the same may be found, and to land or carry the same through or over the ground of any person (such materials not being required for the private use of the owner or occupier of such land, and such land or ground not being an orchard, garden, lawn, policy, nursery for trees, planted walk, or avenue to any house, nor enclosed ground planted as an ornament or shelter to a house, unless where materials have been previously in use to be taken by the said trustees), making or tendering such satisfaction for stones to be used for building and for surface damage done to the land from whence such materials the rock or stone was broken only by hammers used with the hand, but in the year 1881 the defenders introduced a stone-breaking machine into the quarry in question. It was used during the stone-breaking seasons 1881-2 and 1882-3. The machine then in use was found not to be adapted to the work, and was discontinued. A new machine was introduced in August 1893, and has wrought in the quarry during the last three seasons. The average time during which the working has gone on has been ten days during each season. The only difference between the former practice and the later is that in the one case the breaking was by hand, and in the other by a machine. The machine causes no damage whatever to the property of the pursuers, and no damage is alleged to have occurred through the use of the machine."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The proceedings of the defenders as regards the acts complained of being warranted by the statutes founded on, interdict should be refused.

On 13th February 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Gillespie) repelled the defences, and granted interdict in the terms craved.*

shall be dug and carried away or over, or on which the same shall be carried or landed, as such trustees shall judge reasonable," or, in case of difference between them and the proprietor, as the Sheriff or Justices of the Peace for the shire shall determine.

* "NOTE.—The Sheriff-substitute, though with much hesitation, concurs in the decision of the Sheriff Court of Perthshire, referred to at the debate—Whitson v. Road Trustees of the County of Perth, 1887, 24 S. L. R., p. 42.

"The road authorities are empowered by section 80 of the General Turnpike Act, incorporated in the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, 'to search for, dig, and carry away materials' for certain purposes. In the words of Sheriff Gloag, now Lord Kincairney,—'That is what the trustees are empowered to do, and that only, and it may be conceded for the purposes of this case that they are entitled to do all acts and to use all appliances and novel inventions which may be of use to them in searching for materials, digging them, and carrying them away, and which may enable them to take the materials and remove them in a convenient and economical fashion; but the point of this case seems to me to lie here, that it cannot be affirmed that a stone-breaking machine is brought into the quarry for the purpose of either searching for, digging, or carrying away materials, or of aiding in any way these operations. Its use is utterly foreign to any of them. The defenders do not allege that they used or wished to use a stone-breaker for any of these purposes, and yet it does not appear that they have power to enter on or occupy the quarry for any other purposes whatever. They are not empowered to store their materials in the quarry, although it may be that a limited power of storage might be allowed as incident to their other powers. Neither are they empowered to prepare materials. They are only empowered to take them away, and to be on the private property of pursuer only for such limited period as may enable them to make their statutory powers effectual with reasonable despatch. They are no more than trespassers when they occupy the quarry for any other purpose.' These sentences express the Sheriff-substitute's view better than he could have done himself, and it may be hazardous to add to them. He thinks it, however, respectful to the very able argument for the defenders to make a few remarks with special reference thereto.

"1. If it had been intended to confer the power of preparing materials on the ground, nothing would have been easier than to confer it in express terms. The statute is a copious one, in which words are not stinted, and the

The defenders appealed to the First Division.
Counsel for the pursuers were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Under the General Turnpike Act, road trustees have a right "to search for, dig, and carry away materials for making or repairing" a road. That is a somewhat serious interference with private rights, such as could be licensed only by statute, and in considering the statute we must have regard to that fact. All that the road trustees are authorised to do is to search for and carry away materials for repairing the roads. What is now complained of is that they did not forthwith carry away the materials, but manufactured them by means of a stone-breaking machine in preparation for use on the roads. Now, it seems to me that to do this is simply to add to the statutory burden upon the adjacent proprietor, and to impose upon him a new and unauthorised burden. Instead of forthwith carrying away the materials, the road authority encamp upon the pursuers' grounds in the quarry, and there prepare the stuff for its ultimate use.

I do not think that there is anything in the word "materials," for I think it is used in the sense of raw material, and it is a complete satisaddition of a single word would have sufficed,—'search for, dig, prepare, and carry away.'

"2. The question was pressed, what possible object the Legislature could have had in withholding a power to use private land for the purpose of preparing materials. If it is clearly not given, the pursuers are not bound to find a reason. But it may quite well be that the framers of the Act thought that what would virtually be a power of occupation of the land might lead to interference with proprietary rights more burdensome than was consistent with a gratuitous privilege.

"3. It is too much to say that the construction maintained by the pursuers renders the powers conferred abortive. It is well known that until recently stones were usually broken into road metal not in the place from which they were taken, but at the side of the roads.

"4. It was properly admitted that if the pursuer's construction is sound, it involves that the occupation of private ground for breaking of stones into road metal, whether by machinery or by manual labour, is outside the powers conferred by the statute. But there is no inconsistency in their seeking interdict only against the use of a steam-breaker. Because a person does not stand on his extreme rights, and does not object to a comparatively innocuous excess of power, he is not thereby debarred from complaining of what he considers a burdensome nuisance.

"5. It is perhaps worth while to repeat again that the question is not one of new methods as against old methods, but of purposes,—whether are they authorised or unauthorised? A proprietor might not be able to object to the use of a 'steam navvy,' because that is for the purpose of digging, which is authorised. He might be able, if he thought it worth while, and if the Court did not apply the maxim de minimis non curat prætor, to prevent the respectable old man, over whom the defenders' agent was humorous, breaking stones into metal in his lands, because that is not one of the authorised purposes. An enabling statute frequently involves some anomalies, especially when it comes to be applied to a state of matters unknown at its date.

"6. The defenders' agent ingeniously founded on the use of the word 'materials' in the following section, to shew that the framers of the Act meant prepared as well as raw materials. But it is often found that a word faction of the powers given by the statute to hold that, having sought for and found the materials in such form that they can be carried away, the road trustees shall carry them away and the proprietor be relieved of their presence.

Revenue—Excise—Licence to carry armorial bearings—Customs and Inland Revenue Duties Act, 1869 (32 and 33 Vict. cap. 14), sec. 19, subsec. 13.—Held that a device upon a ring consisting of a shield charged with a crowned lion rampant was an armorial bearing in the sense of subsec. 13 of sec. 19 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Duties Act, 1869.

1ST DIVISION. Exchequer Cause.

SAMUEL MILLIGAN, an officer of the Inland Revenue at Inverness, brought a complaint against Alexander Cowan, wine and spirit-merchant, Inverness, charging him with having contravened the 27th section * of the Act 32 and 33 Vict. cap. 14, by having worn armorial bearings on a ring without having a proper licence under the Act, whereby he was liable to a penalty of £20.

On 3d February 1896 the Justices of the Peace for the county of Inverness, at Petty Sessions, assoilzied the respondent from the complaint.

Milligan appealed to the next General Quarter Sessions, at which the left undefined in a statute is not used precisely in the same sense wherever it occurs.

"7. The defenders' agent skilfully put questions, such as whether it would be within the powers of the defenders to break up a big stone in the quarry into manageable pieces in order to carry them away, and if so, why should they not be allowed to break up these pieces into smaller fragments, and so ultimately into road metal? The answer is, that the road authorities are entitled to perform any acts which are fairly incidental to the powers conferred in the statute, and no others. It is but a slender argument against the soundness of a particular construction of a statute that it may give rise to difficult questions. In every enabling statute the line must be drawn somewhere, and wherever the line is drawn there will always be cases in which it is difficult to say on which side of the line they lie. The Courts must deal reasonably with each case as it arises. In this case, if the principle maintained by the pursuers is sound, there is no difficulty in its application.

"8. It is for the Legislature, and not for the Court, to consider whether it would be expedient to confer upon road authorities the power of using lands for preparing materials, and if so, with what limitations and conditions as to compensation or otherwise."

* The Act 32 and 33 Vict. cap. 14, sec. 27, enacts that any person wearing or using armorial bearings "without having a proper licence under this Act . . . shall forfeit the penalty of £20 over and above any other penalty to which such person may be liable. . . ."

No. 143. May 16, 1896. Milligan v. Cowan.

Justices resolved, before pronouncing judgment, to state a case for the opinion and direction of the Court of Exchequer in terms of section 84 of 7 and 8 Geo. IV. cap. 53.

The facts stated were these:—"On 6th December 1895, at Union Street aforesaid, the respondent wore and used a signet ring on which there was a shield charged with a lion rampant, surmounted by a crown or coronet or other ensign. At the base or bottom of the shield there was a bar or other cutting. There was no wreath. An enlarged sketch of the device on the ring is herewith submitted. The respondent had not an Excise licence in force authorising him to wear or use armorial bearings."

The questions put to the Court were:—"(1) Whether the device on the ring is an armorial bearing, crest, or ensign, within the definition of 'armorial bearings' contained in subsection 13 of section 19 of 32 and 33 Vict. cap. 14?* (2) Whether, upon the facts stated, the respondent contravened the statute, and is liable as charged in the complaint?"

Argued for the appellant;—A device borne on a shield was an armorial bearing. The device in the present case was a well-known heraldic device, although that was not necessary to satisfy the definition of armorial bearing in the Act.—Grieve, Assessed Tax Cases (Scottish), No. 482; Duncan, Assessed Tax Cases (Scottish), No. 1098.

No appearance was made for the respondent.

LORD PRESIDENT.—My opinion is that both questions should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. My view is that this is an armorial bearing. It is an ordinary heraldic lion on a shield. I do not know what else constitutes an armorial bearing.

LORD M'LAREN.—If the question were whether this was such a bearing as anyone was entitled to use in accordance with the rules of the Heralds' College, one would like to be better informed as to the laws of heraldry before deciding it, for there are rules of a highly artificial character with regard to the bearing of shields and like matters. But on inspection of the statute it appears to me that it is not required of an armorial bearing before it becomes subject to duty that it should be regular; so that even though the person making use of the sign was not entitled to use it, still if it is used by that person as an armorial bearing that would be sufficient to subject it to duty. We have here a shield with a well-known heraldic cognisance, and I cannot doubt that it subjects its owner to duty.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with all that your Lordships have said.

THE COURT answered both questions in the affirmative.

Brown v. Halbert.

Parent and Child—Illegitimate Child—Aliment—Custody—Father's offer to receive and support male child of seven years—Religion of Child.—The rule that the father of an illegitimate male child seven years of age is entitled to be relieved of the burden of alimenting it in its mother's custody if he offer to support it in his own home will not be applied when it appears that it would be detrimental to the welfare of the child to remove it from the mother's custody.

Circumstances in which held that such an offer by a father could not be accepted without detriment to the child, and that the father was bound to aliment it in its mother's custody.

Question whether such an offer by a Roman Catholic father, who declares his intention to bring up the child in his own faith, will relieve him of the obligation to aliment the child if the Protestant mother chooses to retain the custody of the child, and states that she wishes the child to be brought up as a Protestant.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.

MRS CHARLOTTE BROWN, Glenluce, raised this action in the Sheriff Court at Wigtown against Bernard Halbert, miller, Wigtown, for aliment for her illegitimate child at the rate of £6 per annum until the child should attain the age of fourteen years, on 7th March 1902.

The defender admitted that he was the father of the child, and stated that he had paid aliment to September 1893, and was willing to continue to pay it till 7th March 1895, when the child would attain the age of seven years, but no longer, offering to take it into his own care and custody.

The pursuer stated that she was a Protestant, and that she was anxious to bring up the child as a Protestant; that the defender was a Roman Catholic; and that it would be detrimental to the child's physical and moral welfare to place him in the defender's custody.

The defender admitted that he was a Roman Catholic, and stated that he failed to see "that the interest of the child would be in any way prejudiced by his father bringing him up in the religious faith to which he (the father) belongs, until the child is of age to judge of such matters, when he can make his own choice." He denied the pursuer's averments quoad ultra.

Proof was led. The import of the proof is given in the note to the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor. The Sheriff-substitute (Watson), on 11th February 1896, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in fact (1) that the defender admits that he is the father of the pursuer's male child, which was born on 7th March 1888; (2) that the defender has paid aliment for the said child down to 7th March 1895, when the child reached the age of seven years, but that he now refuses to pay further aliment, offering instead to take the child into his own custody and keeping; (3) that the pursuer is a Protestant and is anxious to bring up the child in the Protestant faith, whereas the defender is a Roman Catholic; (4) that apart from the question of religion, for reasons which are mentioned in the subjoined note, it would be detrimental to the child's welfare that he should be transferred to the guardianship of the defender: Finds in law that the pursuer is entitled to retain the custody of the child, and that in the circumstances of this case the defender is not freed from liability to contribute to the aliment of the child by the offer which he has made to take him into his own custody: Therefore repels the defences, decerns and ordains the defender to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £6 yearly as aliment for the said child, until the said child attain the age of ten years complete, viz., on 7th March 1898, . . . reserving to the pursuer right to apply for extension of aliment on due cause shewn, and to the defender his defences as accords." *

* "NOTE.— . . . The pursuer is not in any case bound to part with her child, but if she keeps him she cannot claim aliment any longer from the defender unless she has proved that the child's welfare would be injuriously affected by his being transferred to the defender's custody. . . . The result of the proof, in the opinion of the Sheriff-substitute, is to shew that it would be detrimental to the child's welfare that he should now be removed from his mother, and live henceforth with the defender. In the first place, the pursuer is a Protestant, and has brought up her child in the Protestant faith, whereas the defender is a Roman Catholic. In the case of an illegitimate child it is the mother's right, by the law of Scotland, to direct the religious upbringing of her child, and this right has always been carefully guarded by the Courts—See Brand v. Shaws, 16 R. 315." The Sheriff-substitute then referred to a judgment of Lord Craighill in the Outer-House in M'Carroll v. Kerr, 15 S. L. R. 106, "to the effect that such a difference in religious creed as here exists is sufficient to entitle the mother to retain her child without losing her claim against the putative father for aliment. Following this judgment, the Sheriff-substitute is of opinion that the difference in religious faith is of itself a good ground for deciding against the defender. . . .

"Apart from the question of religious creed other considerations combine to shew that it would be injurious to the child's welfare to be transferred to the custody of the defender. The child is attached to his mother, and extremely averse to the proposal that he should live with the defender. He is of nervous temperament, and the change would probably involve some risk to his health. The pursuer is generally reputed to be leading a respectable life, though, of course, her moral character has been destroyed by the defender, to whom she has borne two children. . . . The defender's own establishment, on the other hand, would be an eminently unsuitable and unwholesome home for a boy of seven years to be reared in. The defender is a bachelor, his house is at present kept by a young niece who is out all day working, and there is another female servant. For some years the defender has had a constant succession of new housekeepers and servants. The witness Agnes Milligan, who served in the house for some months in 1893 and 1894, deponed that immoral relations had subsisted between her and the defender during that period, and that she had sued him for aliment in respect of two children. Since the evidence was taken in this case proof has been led in Milligan's actions, and the Sheriff-substitute has found that while in the case of the elder of the two children there was no evidence to corroborate her charge against the defender, in the case of the younger child, which was born in July 1895, the defender's paternity was established by evidence of immorality within the house.

"On these combined grounds the Sheriff-substitute is of opinion that the defender's offer does not exonerate him from liability to pay aliment, and that the pursuer is entitled to decree."

† "NOTE.—The defender desires to discharge a pecuniary claim for the aliment of this child in the manner least burdensome to himself. He has no right to the custody of the child, but he has the privilege of meeting this claim for further payments by offering to take the child into his own house and under his own charge. The benefit of the child must be the

Brown v. Halbert.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The mother of an illegitimate son was entitled to his custody and to aliment from his father until he was seven years old. After that the father was entitled to select the form in which his support should be given, and a bona fide offer to receive the child into his house and support him, if rejected by the mother, absolved the father from his liability to support.[1] The ground of the judgments of both Sheriffs was too slender. No serious aspersions were cast on the defender's character, and the difference of religious faith, which seemed to be the main ground of the judgments, was not relevant to the question.

Counsel for the pursuer were not called on.

LORD YOUNG.—This is an ordinary action of filiation and aliment by the mother of an illegitimate child against the father. The latter acknowledges the paternity and his liability, but he pleads that while it was right that the mother should have the custody of the child and receive aliment from him until the child reached the age of seven, he, the father, is now entitled to substitute for his liability for aliment a bona fide offer to take the child into his own custody.

The common case where the father takes up this position is where his circumstances are such as to make it hard upon him to pay £6 or £7 per annum to the mother, when he can at less expense to himself support it in his own house. But this is not the position of the defender. He is in easy circumstances; a miller keeping servants and having an apparently prosperous business. The want of money is therefore not the reason of his asking for the custody of the child.

The mother, on the other hand, has led evidence to shew that the child is well kept by her, that its comfort is well attended to, that its education is taken care of, and that the father's house would not be a suitable home for it.

I am of opinion that the child should be left with the mother, and that the father should pay aliment to her till the child reaches the age of ten. Both the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute have arrived at the conclusion that it would be better for the child's welfare that it should remain with its mother until it is ten, and that the father's house is an unsuitable home for it, and they have ordained the defender to pay aliment until the child has chief consideration. Here the child is being brought up as a Protestant by the mother, who has the legal right to the custody and to determine the religion of the child—a right not always to be affected by agreement—Macpherson, 14 R. 780; Brand, 16 R. 315. The health of the child is good, though it is of a nervous temperament, and the mother evidently attends well to its comfort and has secured its affection. The defender accompanies his proposal to take the child in future into his own hands, with the announced condition that he will have the child brought up as a Roman Catholic,—that is, that he will change its religion. I do not think that he is entitled to discharge his obligations to contribute to this child's aliment under any such condition, contrary to the lawful wish and determination of the mother as to the boy's religion and training. Moreover, the defender, from the evidence, is not quite the man to be entrusted with the guidance and training of this boy. I adopt and follow the opinion of Lord Craighill in the case of M'Carroll, Outer-House, 15 S. L. R. 106."

attained the age of ten. The child will attain that age in a year and eight or nine months. The question therefore comes to be whether there is any ground for interfering with the judgment of both the Sheriffs. It would require very satisfactory arguments to induce me in a case of this kind to interfere with a judgment pronounced by both Sheriffs, and no such arguments have been adduced here.

I must confess, looking to the defender's circumstances, that his conduct in limiting his contribution for the maintenance of his child till it arrived at the age of seven to £4 per annum is not very satisfactory. I think it would have been more becoming on his part if he had been more liberal.

As regards the difference in the religious denomination of the father and the mother, I may say that that consideration does not influence my judgment in the case.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the evidence does not supply us with any good reason for interfering with the judgment of the Sheriffs, and that it ought to be affirmed, with expenses.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. There is a settled general rule that the father of an illegitimate son is not bound to pay aliment to the mother after the child has attained the age of seven years if he then makes a bona fide offer to receive the child into his home and to support him there. But there are exceptions to the rule, and the most forcible exception occurs where it is certain that such a change of circumstances would be detrimental to the child's health.

The first question in this case is, what is the best course to follow in the interests of this child, and I am of opinion that the result of the proof is that it would be detrimental to the child's health and welfare generally to remove it from its mother's care. The Sheriffs are agreed on this point, and in my opinion the evidence substantially supports their view.

For my part I am not moved by the consideration that the father proposed to bring up the child according to a different faith from that professed by the mother. Such a consideration I regard as hardly relevant to the question whether the custody of the child should be with the father.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree with the opinions expressed by your Lordships on the question of the defender's right to the custody of this child. The defender is only entitled to the custody of the child as a discharge of his obligation to contribute to his support, but this abstract right to discharge his obligation is qualified by the condition that his charge of the child shall not be detrimental to his (the child's) health. On this latter point proof was led, and it appears to me that the result is to disclose sufficient grounds for the belief that the removal of the child from his mother's house would be injurious to him. I think that three elements contribute to that result. First, there would be a change in the religious teaching of the child; second, his health would probably suffer; and third, the defender's establishment does not appear to offer a very desirable home and training for a child.

I do not think it is necessary to consider whether any one of these elements taken separately would be sufficient, for I am of opinion that taken together they form a sufficient ground of decision. Especially with regard to the first, I desire to reserve my opinion whether it would by itself form a sufficient ground for refusing to the reputed father the custody of an illegitimate child.

for proof, in which case an appeal under the 40th section of the Judicature Act would have been competent.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—There does not appear to be any reason why the interlocutor appealed from should not be construed according to its natural and legal import. So read, it sets forth a contract between the parties to the litigation as to the procedure to be followed. This becomes more clear when we attend to the state of the pleadings when the interlocutor was pronounced. The defenders had on record a plea to relevancy, and according to the ordinary course, the Sheriff would have had first of all to hear parties on this plea and then dispose of it. From the interlocutor it appears that the parties agreed that the facts should first be ascertained by way of proof before this plea was determined. The present appeal is intended to upset this arrangement, for the pursuer now asks us to settle an issue and send the case to a jury. I do not see how the defender could be allowed to appeal (as is sometimes done under the 40th section) in order to have the action thrown out on relevancy without a breach of the arrangement that the evidence should be led before this question was determined, and both parties must be free, or neither.

I hope I have made it plain that my judgment rests on the words in the interlocutor, "of consent, before answer." I am for dismissing the appeal.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—My first impression was that no apparent distinction could be taken between an interlocutor proceeding upon a consent and an interlocutor proceeding merely upon the motion of one of the parties. But your Lordship's opinion is clear to the effect which has been stated, and as this is merely a question of practice, I have not such confidence in my opinion as to lead me to dissent.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair.

On 20th March the pursuers reclaimed against this interlocutor.

The defenders objected to the competency of the reclaiming note, and argued;—An interlocutor modifying expenses—the cause having otherwise been disposed of previously—could only be reclaimed against within ten days.[1] The authority of Cowper was untouched by the recent case of Crellin's Trustee,[2] which only decided that a reclaiming note timeously lodged against an interlocutor modifying expenses brought prior interlocutors under the review of the Court.

she was only liable to account for the value of the estate of the deceased, including the goodwill of his business, as at the date of his death.

JOHN STEWART, wine and spirit-merchant, 34 Dalrymple Street, Greenock, died intestate on 5th December 1893. On 15th January 1894 his widow obtained from the Magistrates of Greenock a transfer of the certificate standing in John Stewart's name for the sale of exciseable liquors for the year from 15th May 1893 to 15th May 1894. On 2d February 1894 Mrs Stewart was appointed executrix-dative to her deceased husband. Mrs Stewart gave up an inventory of his estate, in which its value was stated at £70, including £50 for "goodwill, furniture, and fittings," and on 19th February she obtained confirmation. At the Licensing Courts in April 1894 and April 1895 Mrs Stewart obtained renewals of the certificate. She also obtained from the landlord of the premises at No. 34 Dalrymple Street a lease from Whitsunday 1894, at which date the lease granted to her deceased husband expired, to Whitsunday 1895, and at Whitsunday 1895 she obtained a lease for five years.

At the date of his death John Stewart was indebted to various creditors, and in March 1895 the creditors obtained sequestration of his estates.

In October 1895 John Berrie Brown, the trustee in the sequestration, brought an action against the widow of John Stewart, as his executrix, and as an individual, and against James Robertson, her second husband, concluding for declarator, inter alia, that the transfer of the certificate granted to Mrs Robertson had been granted to her solely as executrix of her deceased husband, or as intromitter with his estate, and that upon her appointment and confirmation as executrix-dative all right in the certificate, licence, licensed premises, goodwill, and other estate of John Stewart, had become vested in her solely as his executrix, and for behoof of all persons legally interested in his estate, and that all right in these subjects had passed to the pursuer upon his appointment as trustee in the sequestration. He further concluded for decree ordaining the defender Mrs Robertson (fifth) to remove from the licensed premises that he might enter thereto, (sixth) to deliver up the certificate, transfer, renewals, and licences, so far as not cancelled, and the whole stock in trade, and tenant's fittings, in the premises; (seventh) as alternative to the fifth and sixth conclusions, to realise the goodwill of the wine and spirit business, the right to occupy the licensed premises to the end of the term of possession contracted for by the defender, the stock in trade, and tenant's fittings, and whole estate of deceased, and pay the proceeds to the pursuer; (eighth) to account for the profits she had made by carrying on the business; and (ninth) or otherwise, as alternative to conclusions five to eight, to pay the pursuer £550 with interest from the date of John Stewart's death.

The pursuer averred:—(Cond. 1) At the date of his death John Stewart was in debt to the amount of about £650. His estate, if duly realised at his death, would not have sufficed to pay his creditors in full. (Cond. 3) The principal creditors agreed to allow the defender to carry on the business as executrix under an arrangement for the gradual liquidation of the debts, but she refused to sign the agreement. (Cond. 4) The magistrates granted the transfer of the certificate to Mrs Robertson on being informed that she was the widow and representative of John Stewart, and was applying for appointment as executrix. (Cond. 5) "Upon obtaining the transfer of said certificate and being confirmed as executrix, it became the duty of the said defender, Mrs Robertson, forthwith to realise the goodwill, stock in trade, and tenant's fittings pertaining to the said business, and generally her deceased husband's estate, for behoof of his creditors. In breach of her said duty she . . . deliberately failed to take any steps to effect such realisation. If then realised, the said goodwill and fittings would have produced a sum not less than £450, while the stock in trade and other estate would have produced not less than a further sum of £75. These sums would have sufficed to pay the creditors a substantial portion of their claims. The said defender, at her husband's death, took possession of the licensed premises, which had been held by her husband as a yearly tenant. She had no title to occupy them except as executrix foresaid. Notwithstanding this, she proceeded to carry on the business of a wine and spirit-merchant in said premises, and to appropriate the profits for her individual behoof and for the maintenance of herself and her family. The claims of her husband's creditors were entirely ignored by her." (Cond. 6) The fresh certificate granted to Mrs Robertson in 1894 was expressly granted to her in her capacity as executrix. Having obtained it, she "negotiated for a lease of the licensed premises, and carried on business therein by virtue of her title as executrix. She thus, instead of realising the executry estate, employed the same in trade, contrary to her trust duty. She similarly, in April 1895, obtained a renewal of the transferred certificate for the year from 15th May 1895 to 15th May 1896. About the same time, she, with the express object of endeavouring to defeat the creditors' rights, induced the landlord to grant her a five years' lease of the licensed premises, under which it is believed that assignees and subtenants are excluded. She continued, and still continues, to employ the executry estate in said business. The whole proceeds and profits of the business thus carried on by the said defender, after deduction of rent and expenses of management, belong, in the above-mentioned circumstances, to the deceased John Stewart's estate, and the present goodwill of the business, and the stock in trade and tenant's fittings now connected therewith, similarly form assets of the said John Stewart's estate. . . . ."

The defenders stated that the value of the goodwill, furniture, and fittings, had been entered in the inventory at £50, being the sum fixed by the valuator, but they denied that the goodwill itself was of any value, and denied that the transfer and renewal of the certificate had been granted to Mrs Robertson as executrix. They stated that Mrs Robertson had, prior to the sequestration, paid £83 to the creditors of John Stewart, and that she had since declared her willingness to pay £76 more, and that these two sums exceeded the value of the estate left by him.

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the declaratory conclusions, and also in terms of the conclusions for removing and delivery, in respect that—(1) The defender, Mrs Robertson, in breach of her duty as executrix of John Stewart, failed to realise the assets of his estate, and appropriated said assets and applied them in a hazardous trade; (2) The business carried on by said defender, by means of said assets, constitutes a trust in her person for behoof of those legally interested in John Stewart's estate; (3) The existing assets of the said business now belong to the pursuer, as trustee on John Stewart's sequestrated estates. 2. Alternatively, the said assets of John Stewart's estate, or the assets now coming in place thereof, being still realisable, the defender, Mrs Robertson, is bound forthwith to realise the same, and to account to the pursuer, as trustee foresaid, for the proceeds to be realised therefrom. 3. The said defender, Mrs Robertson, having, in breach of her duty as executrix of John Stewart, employed the assets of his executry estate in trade, is liable to account to the pursuer for the profits realised from the employment of said assets in such trade; and failing an accounting, decree should be pronounced in terms of the alternative conclusions thereanent. 4. In any view, the defender, Mrs Robertson, having, as executrix of John Stewart, failed to realise the assets of his estate, and having appropriated the said assets to herself as an individual, is personally liable to pay to the pursuer the value of said assets as at the date of John Stewart's death, with interest from that date, as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(6) The defender being only bound to account for the value of the estate of her late husband as at the date of his death, and she having been all along, and still being, willing so to account, and having so accounted, the action was unnecessary, and ought to be dismissed.

On 20th March the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) repelled the first and third pleas for the pursuer, and before further answer, allowed the parties a proof of their respective averments "as to the value and disposal of the deceased John Stewart's estate." *

* "OPINION.—The defender in this case is the widow of a public-house keeper in Greenock, who died in 1893. At his death the defender was appointed his executrix-dative and gave up an inventory, and obtained confirmation. The estate, as given up by her, amounted to only £70, including £50 for 'goodwill, furniture, and fittings.' The debts seem to have considerably exceeded the assets, but the creditors took no steps, and the widow continued the deceased's business. She obtained a transfer of the licence into her own name, and at the next and succeeding Licensing Courts she obtained renewals. She also made arrangements with the landlord, by which she continued in possession of the shop, and she ultimately obtained from him a five years' lease in her own favour. She is still in possession, and still carrying on the business. It is not alleged that any agreement was made between her and the creditors. She made some payments, but she has not hitherto been asked to account. In other words, she has been allowed, without any special arrangement, to continue in possession of what there is or was of her husband's estate.

"The creditors have now, however, moved apparently by the defender's success in the business, which, as I have said, she still conducts, taken steps to enforce payment of their debts. They have had the estate of the deceased debtor sequestrated, and the trustee in the sequestration now brings the present action against the defender. Had it been an ordinary action of accounting for the defender's intromissions with the executry estate, there could have been no doubt of its relevancy, although there might, in view of the defender's attitude, have been a question as to its necessity. But the question I have to decide is whether, taking the facts as I have stated them, and as set forth by the pursuer on record, there is any room for at all events the leading conclusions of the action.

"Having considered the argument which I lately heard in the Procedure Roll, I have come to the conclusion that in its leading conclusions the action cannot be supported. It proceeds, as it seems to me, on a view of the defender's position in relation to her husband's creditors which is not tenable in point of law. It assumes that the defender has all along Stewart's Trustee v. Stewart's Executrix.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—An executor was a trustee for the creditors of the executry estate, and it was his duty to realise the estate for their benefit.[1] His fiduciary position was exemplified by the fact that he was bound to communicate to one creditor the benefit of cases he had obtained from other creditors.[2] If the duty of realising the estate were not fulfilled, the unrealised subjects were held for behoof of the creditors,[3] for the executor, being a trustee, could not take benefit to himself from the administration of the trust-estate, his position in regard to the estate being analogous to that of a tutor in regard to the estate of his ward,[4] or a partner towards the estate of the copartnery.[5] The Lord Ordinary was mistaken in the view he took of the Globe Insurance Company's case.[6] That case did not decide that an executor was not a trustee for creditors, but only that he was not a trustee for rateable distribution, and therefore that an individual creditor could secure himself a preference by diligence. Further, that was a case of an executor-nominate, and an executrix-dative was in a somewhat different position. In the present case the goodwill of the deceased's business was a realisable asset,[7] which acted and carried on her business substantially as trustee for the creditors, that any profits made by her are theirs, and that the successive licences, as also the lease of the shop, have been obtained for their benefit. Accordingly, its conclusions are (1) for delivery of the licences; (2) for removal from the shop; and (3) for accounting for all profits made in the business. There is an alternative conclusion for payment of a certain sum as the alleged value of the deceased's estate at the time of his death, but on this matter there is no dispute. The defender denies the amount, but is quite willing that there should be inquiry.

"Now it is not, I think, necessary to consider what is the defender's position as executrix-dative with respect to her children—the next of kin. It may be that towards them she stands in a special position. I do not desire to express any opinion on that question. But towards the creditors of the deceased it appears to me that she is simply eadem persona cum defuncto, standing to the creditors in no other relation than the deceased stood, except that she is a debtor with limited liability, viz., a liability limited by the amount of the deceased's estate. An executor is not a trustee for the deceased's creditors. He is no more so than an heir entering cum beneficio inventarii. He is, in a question with creditors, the proprietor of the estate, under burden of payment of their debts. He is not a depositary. He is a debtor, and the equities which result from the position of a depositary,—that is to say, of a trustee,—are wholly inapplicable. The law on this subject is, I think I must hold, fixed by the opinions and judgment of this Court and of the House of Lords in the case of the Globe Insurance Company v. Mackenzie, 11 D. 618, 7 Bell's App. 296, where, although in a different connection, the rights and liabilities of executors were fully discussed and considered.

"On the whole matter, I consider that I must repel the pursuer's first and third pleas, and allow, unless parties can arrange for admissions or for a remit, a proof as to the value and disposal of the deceased's estate."

the widow ought to have realised for the creditors' behoof. She must accordingly be held to have carried on the business for the creditors' benefit, and was bound to deliver up the certificate and licence[1] as an accessory of the executry estate, and to account to the pursuer for the profits she made by use of the estate. The proof should therefore not be limited as it had been by the Lord Ordinary.

Counsel for the defender was not called upon.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is often a matter of discretion requiring much discrimination to determine in the Outer-House whether proof should be allowed upon the whole case before answer, subject to reconsideration as to the relevancy of part of the allegations, or whether proof should be limited to those averments which amount to a relevant statement of legal liability, to the exclusion of averments not of that character. Now, where the Lord Ordinary has been able to separate the relevant from the irrelevant averments, and to limit the proof to certain parts of the case, thereby carrying out his powers under the Court of Session Act, 1868, I think that, unless the principles of law on which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded can be shewn to be erroneous, we ought to adhere to his decision. I do not say that, if a proof at large had been allowed, we should have interfered, but we are dealing with a case as to which the Lord Ordinary has thought one part,—namely, the first and third pleas and relative averments,—clearly separable from the rest, and capable of being disposed of on the ground that no legal liability on the part of the defender is disclosed. Considering the case in this light, I am bound to say that I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary.

The material facts are, that the widow and executrix of a licensed victualler, who had carried on his business apparently on very slender means, entered into the management of her husband's business, and with the assistance of friends succeeded in carrying it on and making a living out of it. The creditors of the deceased, being unable to get payment of their debts from the executrix, have obtained sequestration, which, perhaps, they might have applied for with advantage at an earlier period. The trustee is by his appointment fully vested in everything which belonged to the deceased, and no legal process is necessary to make his right effectual unless the property is wilfully withheld. But the theory of this action is not that the estate is extant in such a form that it can be delivered to the trustee, but that the money which Mrs Stewart has made by carrying on the business of her deceased husband, and the existing stock and furniture of her business, are to be treated as a surrogatum for the goodwill, stock, and furniture left by her husband. I am unable to see how such a claim can be substantiated. It would be necessary to shew that an executor is a trustee for the creditors of the deceased, and is subject to all the equities to which a trustee is subject. It is not said that Mrs Stewart ever agreed to administer the executry estate for the creditors. They were anxious that she should come under some obligation to them, but it is conceded that she refused to enter into any contractual relation with her husband's creditors, and took up the estate for her own benefit, leaving the creditors to their legal remedies. Just as little should I be disposed to admit that the position of a trustee for creditors devolved upon the executrix by operation of law. If such were the position of an executor it would be difficult to see what advantage would accrue to creditors from using diligence or obtaining sequestration. It is just because an executor is not a trustee for creditors, and because creditors are at a disadvantage in obtaining payment through a person who does not hold for them, that the remedy of sequestration of a deceased debtor's estate was given them by the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. But it is needless to specify reasons for not accepting the opposite view, because I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the decision of the House of Lords in the case of the Globe Insurance Company v. Mackenzie[1] is a clear authority against it. No doubt the question in that case was whether an executor was justified, after the lapse of six months, in paying to a creditor who had used arrestments, but the ground on which the validity of the payment was disputed and a rateable distribution contended for was that an executor—it was an executor-nominate in that case, but there is no difference in this respect between an executor-nominate and executor-dative—was bound to deal with creditors precisely in the same manner as with beneficiaries, and if he was in doubt as to the rights of creditors, to bring a multiplepoinding. Now, the concurring judgments of the Court of Session and House of Lords negatived that proposition, and decided that each creditor acts for his own interest against the trust-estate. In coming to that conclusion Lord Brougham was explicit in stating that there is no fiduciary relation between an executor and a creditor, that the executor is in the shoes of the defunct and represents him and not the creditors at all, and I think that Lord Brougham is at pains to point out that the only expression of doubt in the Court of Session fell from Lord Jeffrey, and that this expression of doubt was eventually withdrawn by Lord Jeffrey, who expressed his formal concurrence in the judgment of the Court. The result is that an executor is not bound in any segregation of the executry estate for behoof of creditors. It is sufficient if he retain funds of the value of the defunct's estate at the date of his death, and is ready to pay claims to the extent of the value. If he is not bound to segregate the estate, he can incur no liability for the profits which he may make from the use of the estate.

My opinion then is, that while the inventory lodged by an executor is not a conclusive limitation of the executor's obligation, that obligation is limited to the value of the estate of the defunct as at the date of his death, and this is the view of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Adam.—I am of the same opinion. The pursuer claims that the executrix-dative is prima facie bound to pay the debts of her deceased husband. Her answer to this claim is that she is only statutorily liable to account for the value of the estate belonging to the deceased at his death. I agree that an executor, dative or nominate, is in one sense a trustee,—that is for beneficiaries,—but I am unable to see that he is so for creditors, who are in a totally different position with reference to the estate, and who should take their own measures to protect their interests. In this case the executrix is bound to produce or account for the value of the estate as at the death of her husband.

No. 147.

May 21, 1896. Stewart's Trustee v. Stewart's Executrix.

It is said, without being disputed, and I see no reason to dispute it, that part of that estate consists of the goodwill of the deceased's business, and, accordingly, I think that the pursuer may well be entitled, in order to ascertain the value of the estate, to inquire how the goodwill has been disposed of, and that we should follow the Lord Ordinary in allowing the pursuer a proof with that object in view.

But I agree with his Lordship that the pursuer is not entitled to anything more. It has been argued that where an executor does not pay creditors in full, and fails to account for particular assets, if such exist in forma specifica, the creditor is not bound to take the executor's account, but may follow up and vindicate them from him. I am not aware that the authorities go beyond this, but in any view there is no such case here.

The claim made is not for the value of the goodwill as it existed at the death of the deceased, but for a very different thing, viz., for the value of the profits of the business which has been carried on by the executrix.

I agree with your Lordship that the proof allowed by the Lord Ordinary is sufficient to enable the pursuer to get everything to which he is entitled.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree that there is no reason for interfering with the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

He has done no more than repel the first and third pleas in law for the pursuer, and allow the parties, before answer as to the remaining pleas, a limited proof. The pleas which have been repelled are intended to impose upon an executrix the equities and liabilities of a trustee, to make her responsible for the profits earned in a business which it is said she has carried on wrongfully, inasmuch as she has made use for that purpose of a part of the assets belonging to the deceased's estate. The pleas are based upon two propositions, that the executrix in breach of trust is using the assets of the deceased in carrying on a precarious business, and that having so used them she is bound, as a trustee in default, to account for the profits which she has made in that business. I agree that the propositions are untenable, unless we disregard the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of the Globe Insurance Company.[1]

But, having repelled these pleas, the Lord Ordinary has not gone on to dispose of the conclusions of the summons, even of those which Mr Campbell admits he would not now maintain, nor has he assoilzied the defender nor dismissed the action. He has allowed the parties "a proof of their respective averments as to the value and disposal of the deceased John Stewart's estate," and I agree that a proof in accordance with these terms will enable the pursuer to establish all the facts averred by him relating to the claims in his conclusions. The Lord Ordinary has allowed his second and fourth pleas to remain, which are sufficient to allow the pursuer to maintain any views which Mr Campbell indicated his intention of maintaining, except those touching the two pleas repelled.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

Crawford's Trustees v. Lennox.

Trade-mark—Hotel—Hotel Sign—"Golden Lion"—Interdict.—In January 1896 the proprietors of the Golden Lion Hotel, Stirling, raised an action against Lennox, the tenant of that hotel, and proprietor and occupant of the Station Hotel, Stirling, to interdict him "from using in any way upon or in connection with the Station Hotel a gilt figure or trade sign of a lion, or any painted or printed copy or facsimile thereof which has been used in connection with and recognised as the trade sign of the Golden Lion Hotel, Stirling." They averred that the defender, whose lease ended at Whitsunday 1896, had formed a scheme for ruining the business of the Golden Lion Hotel; that in July 1895 the defender, with the view of transferring the business of the Golden Lion Hotel to the Station Hotel, had removed the gilt figure of a lion which had for a long period been on the porch of that hotel to the roof of the Station Hotel for the purpose of misleading the public into the belief "that the Golden Lion had ceased to exist, and that the proprietor of the Station Hotel had acquired the right to use the golden lion, and so the right of the proprietors of the Golden Lion Hotel," and that the defender in his Station Hotel bills and cards used the figure of a lion. They averred that they had sustained loss, and would sustain further loss, by the defender's proceedings, but they did not allege that any person had in fact been misled by the defender. It was admitted that the gilt lion had been purchased by the defender from the previous tenant, and that the words "Station Hotel" were conspicuous on the front and side of that hotel.

Held that, having regard to the fact that the words "Station Hotel" were conspicuous on that hotel, the use of the gilt lion on the roof implied no representation that the business of the Golden Lion Hotel had been transferred to it, and did not tend to mislead the public, and that as the pursuer did not aver that any members of the public had in fact been misled, he was not entitled to prove that such was the fact.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Stirlingshire.

THOMAS WILSON AND OTHERS, testamentary trustees of the late William Crawford, Stirling, and proprietors of the Golden Lion Hotel there, raised this action in the Sheriff Court of Stirling against James Lennox, tenant of the Golden Lion Hotel, and prayed the Court "to interdict the defender from using in any way upon or in connection with the Station Hotel, Stirling, a gilt figure or trade sign of a lion, or any painted or printed copy or facsimile thereof which has been used in connection with and recognised as the trade sign of the Golden Lion Hotel, Stirling; to ordain the defender to remove the said figure of a lion placed by him upon the said Station Hotel; to declare that the defender has no right to use the said figure or trade sign of a lion, or any painted or printed copy or facsimile thereof, as a trade sign elsewhere than in connection with the said Golden Lion Hotel, with expenses."

The pursuers averred that the defender was tenant of the Golden Lion Hotel under a lease which expired at Whitsunday 1896. (Cond. 4) "For about thirty years a gilt figure of a lion of about life size has been placed and exhibited over the front door of the said premises." (Cond. 5) "About four years ago the defender purchased another hotel in Stirling situated in Murray Place and known as the Station Hotel, and since Whitsunday 1892 he has carried on business there as well as at the Golden Lion Hotel." (Cond. 6) "Since entering into occupation of the Station Hotel the defender has endeavoured in various ways to divert the business which he previously carried on at, and which legitimately belonged to, the Golden Lion Hotel to the Station Hotel. He has ceased to give frequenters of the Golden Lion Hotel the comfort and attention which they were accustomed to and entitled to expect in a first-class hotel like the Golden Lion Hotel. He has also removed from the Golden Lion Hotel to the Station Hotel almost every good article of furniture which he had in the Golden Lion Hotel, including the billiard table, all with the view of injuring the Golden Lion Hotel." (Cond. 7) "About the month of July 1895 the defender, with the view of further injuring the Golden Lion Hotel, and transferring its business to the Station Hotel, removed, without warning to the pursuers, the said gilt figure of a lion from its position above the door of the Golden Lion Hotel and placed it upon the Station Hotel." (Cond. 8) "It is believed and averred that the defender has formed a scheme for ruining the business of the Golden Lion Hotel. The removal of the gilt figure of the lion from the Golden Lion Hotel, with which it was used as a trade sign and has been associated for so many years, and the placing of it over the Station Hotel, was done solely for the purpose, amongst others, of misleading the public into believing that they were going to the Golden Lion Hotel, that the Golden Lion Hotel had ceased to exist, and that the proprietor of the Station Hotel had acquired the right to use the golden lion, and so the right of the proprietors of the Golden Lion Hotel. There is only one bus used for conveying travellers from the railway station to both hotels, and, after leaving the station, the bus is drawn up at the door of the Station Hotel, where the gilt figure of the lion may be seen, and travellers going to the Golden Lion Hotel, but who may be unacquainted with the outside appearance of the latter, alight, under the impression that it is the Golden Lion Hotel, this being heightened by the figure of the lion over the Station Hotel." (Cond. 9) "With the view of leading the public to believe that the Station Hotel has right to the business and trade sign of the Golden Lion Hotel, the defender has placed in all the rooms of the latter a ticket similar to the one produced herewith, and has circulated in Stirling and neighbourhood a list of charges for carriages from the Station Hotel, which list bears on one corner an impression of a lion. Further, the defender, in making up his bills for charges to frequenters of the Golden Lion Hotel and the Station Hotel, does so on forms with the name of the Station Hotel, and which forms have also an impression of a lion. Defender is called on to produce the form of bill which has been given lately to the frequenters of the Golden Lion and Station Hotels." (Cond. 10) "In consequence of defender's said actings of removing the figure of a lion from the Golden Lion Hotel to the Station Hotel, and the use of the sign of the lion elsewhere than in connection with the Golden Lion Hotel, the pursuers have sustained, and will still further sustain, considerable loss and damage by the depreciation in value both for letting and selling of the Golden Lion Hotel, and for which loss and damage they reserve their right of action against the defender."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The said gilt figure of a lion having been recognised as the trade sign of the Golden Lion Hotel, Stirling, the defender is not entitled to use it in connection with the Station Hotel or elsewhere than in connection with the Golden Lion Hotel, and interdict and declarator to that effect ought to be granted as craved. (2) The defender having improperly and without authority placed the said gilt figure of a lion over the Station Hotel, ought to be ordained to remove same as craved.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the prayer of the petition. (3) The figure of the lion in question being the property of the defender, and the pursuers never having had any right or property therein, or to the figure or sign of a lion in connection with their premises, the defender should be assoilzied from the petitory conclusions of the prayer. (4) The pursuers never having had any property or right in the trade sign of a lion in connection with their premises, interdict should be refused. (6) In any event, the pursuers not having any property in or exclusive right to the use of a figure of a lion in connection with their premises, the defender is entitled to absolvitor from the declaratory conclusion of the prayer of the petition. (7) The defender, being entitled to place the figure of a lion on his Station Hotel, and to apply it on tickets, lists, bill-forms, and other documents in connection therewith, should be assoilzied, with expenses.

It was admitted that the figure of the golden lion had been made about thirty years ago for a former tenant, who had paid for it, and sold it to the defender, to whom it now belonged. On the bills of charges used by the defender at both hotels the figure of the golden lion was printed. One bill was headed "Golden Lion Hotel, King Street, Stirling, James Lennox, Lessee," the other was headed "Station Hotel (late Hendry's), Stirling, James Lennox, Proprietor (late of Golden Lion Hotel)." The list of charges for carriages from the Station Hotel bore on its title-page the figure of the golden lion, with the words "Station Hotel, Stirling, James Lennox, Proprietor." Cards advertising the respective hotels each displayed the figure of a lion, but the figures were not identical.

The defender produced a photograph which shewed the figure of the golden lion on the roof of the Station Hotel, and on the front and side of the hotel, in large letters, the words "Lennox's Station Hotel."

On 7th March 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Buntine) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators, and made avizandum, for the reasons stated in the subjoined note, repels all the pleas stated for the defender, and interdicts, ordains, and declares, all in terms of the conclusions of the petition." *

* "NOTE.—The following facts are admitted on record. . . . For more than thirty years this hotel has gone by the name of the Golden Lion Hotel, and for the same period the gilded figure of a lion couchant, which has been recently removed by the defender, has been fixed over the front door.

"There can be little doubt that this long usage of name and trade sign created a property in the person of the owners of the hotel in both the name and trade sign, and that they have a right to interdict against any other person calling an hotel in Stirling by the same name, or placing over it the same trade sign—(Great North of Scotland Railway Company v. Mann, 19 R. 1035). . . .

"It is not material to the present case whether the defender is the owner of this gilded image or not. The Sheriff-substitute has come to the opinion that even if he was owner of it, and so entitled to remove it from its old place over the door where it had stood for so many years, he is not entitled to place it, or any figure resembling it, over the door of any hotel in Stir-

May 22, 1896. Crawford's Trustees v. Lennox.

The defender appealed to the Second Division of the Court of Session, and argued;—The pursuers' averments were irrelevant. It was not alleged that anyone had been misled by the defender's actings. This was essential.[1] The facts were sufficient to dispose of the case, for the hotel, which bore in conspicuous letters the title "Lennox's Station Hotel," could not be mistaken by reasonable persons for the "Golden Lion Hotel." The essential element of misrepresentation and misleading[2] was absent.

Argued for the pursuers;—The figure of the lion on the roof was much more important than the name on the side of the Station Hotel, for it had become identified with a particular house, and the natural conclusion to observers was that the house on which it stood was the Golden Lion Hotel. Thus the public might be misled, and the Great North of Scotland Railway Company v. Mann[1] was in point in favour of the pursuers. "Station Hotel" had been held to be not sufficiently distinctive.[3] The only object in using the figure of the lion was to induce the belief that the Station Hotel was the Golden Lion Hotel. The defender hoped to suggest this to the mind of the travelling public, and that was sufficient ground for interference. The pursuers were entitled to proof of their averments.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The facts of this case as practically agreed upon are these:—Mr Lennox, the appellant, who was for some time tenant of the Golden Lion Hotel in Stirling, became proprietor of the Station Hotel. When he entered the Golden Lion Hotel he bought the moveable articles of furniture, and he bought also the figure of the lion which stood on the top of the porch of the hotel. It appears that about 30 years ago that lion was placed over the door of the hotel by a former tenant, and shortly afterwards the house came to be known as the Golden Lion Hotel. As the end of his lease of the Golden Lion Hotel was approaching, the appellant began to remove his own possessions which he had purchased, including the lion, which he placed on the top of the Station Hotel in the position in which we see it in the photograph produced. It was not placed on the ling. It is certain that a large sign such as this would mislead the public, and this is made doubly certain when the actual image is itself appropriated, and that by the man who had formerly a right to use it as an hotel sign.

"The question in all such cases as the present depends upon whether or not the use complained of involves misrepresentation and consequent misleading of the public, and injury to the owner's interest.—See Lord Kyllachy's opinion in Cowan v. Miller, 28th June 1895, 22 R. 833.

"The Sheriff-substitute is of opinion that the use of this trade sign over the door of the Station Hotel is of necessity misleading, and thus injurious, or is likely to injure the pursuers by robbing them of custom which had been earned by the reputation of the house over which the sign had been placed in the past.

"Accordingly he is satisfied that the pursuers are entitled to the remedy they seek without any proof."

porch as it had been at the Golden Lion Hotel, but on the top of the building. It was also stated, and not denied, that in his Station Hotel bills and cards the appellant uses the figure of a lion.

Now, the question, I think, is stated very fairly by the Sheriff-substitute in his note when he says :—"The question in all such cases as the present depends upon whether or not the use complained of involves misrepresentation and consequent misleading of the public and injury to the owner's interest." We have here no case of that kind stated on record. There is no averment that any effect of that kind was produced by the lion being placed where it was. The averments on record rather point to this, that Mr Lennox had a purpose rather to disparage the Golden Lion Hotel as he was leaving it, and to give a high character to the Station Hotel to which he had gone, and which he intended to occupy as his sole hotel. There is no allegation on record that I can find to the effect that what has been done has caused anybody to make any mistake whatever. If there had been averments to the effect that people who wished to go to the Golden Lion Hotel had been misled, had been taken to the Station Hotel, and that the lion had been pointed to to make them believe that that hotel was the Golden Lion Hotel, I think there would be much to be said for allowing such facts, if averred, to be proved. But there are no such averments. What is averred is that the appellant endeavoured to disparage the old Golden Lion Hotel and to give it a bad name because he wished to improve his own prospects as the proprietor of the Station Hotel. Now, the photographs which were exhibited to us bring out very clearly that every person coming from the station, and every person coming down the street towards that hotel in other directions, must see the name of the "Station Hotel" on the house, because it is on the end of the house in large letters, and it is on the front of the house also in large letters. As regards the bills, the hotel is spoken of in them solely as the Station Hotel, and in one of them there is a statement, under the name of the proprietor of the Station Hotel, that he was "late of the Golden Lion Hotel."

I have been unable in those circumstances to come to the conclusion that the use of the figure placed upon the top of the house was a misrepresentation, and that as a consequence the public were misled, to the injury of the Golden Lion Hotel. I cannot see that there is any ground for coming to that conclusion. It is quite certain that the proprietor of the Golden Lion Hotel has no monopoly of the use of the figure of a lion, whether golden or of any other colour. He is entitled to have any figure he pleases, and probably he would prefer to have the figure of a golden lion, as his hotel has got that name. But I cannot assent to the proposition that he is entitled on that account to exclude everybody else from using a lion as a sort of ornament on any part of their premises. If a man uses what is his own in such a way as to misrepresent, and by the way he places it, the way he uses it, and the way his servants speak of it, to lead people to believe that they are going to a certain hotel when that is not the case, and if he in fact does lead people to such an erroneous belief, that is a thing which the law will always step in to prevent. In the case of The Great North of Scotland Railway Company v. Mann, 19 R. 1035, which was cited to us, there was a strong illustration of that doctrine. In that case the former occupant of an hotel in Aberdeen, which was called the Palace Hotel, having been deprived of the occupancy of that hotel and having set up another hotel in the immediate neighbourhood, called his new hotel "Mann's Palace Hotel," thereby as plainly as possible giving it the name of "Palace," and only indicating that it belonged to a person of the name of Mann. That was held by the Court to be a practical misrepresentation tending to mislead the public into thinking that his hotel was the Palace Hotel, whereas the fact was that the Palace Hotel was elsewhere. We have no such case here. I think the Sheriff-substitute has erred in the conclusion he has come to, and that the petition ought to be dismissed.

LORD YOUNG.—I have arrived at the same conclusion—that this case is irrelevant. Mr Guthrie very candidly said that he was aware of no case in which interdict and an order of the kind asked here had been pronounced without inquiry or proof, and his motion accordingly was, not that we should affirm the judgment, but that we should allow a proof, and in support of that motion he said he was informed that some people had been misled, and had gone to this hotel under misapprehension. There was no such deceit averred upon record, but if any case had been made for amending the record we could have done that. I inquired what the misapprehension was, and I got no more particular information.

One can hardly imagine anybody—in his senses and fit to go about alone—thinking because he saw a lion's figure upon a hotel, although there were on the side of it the words "Station Hotel," and also over the front door, very conspicuously, "Lennox's Station Hotel," and no other name—one can hardly listen to the statement that anybody thought when he was going into that hotel in Murray Place that he was going into the Golden Lion Hotel in King Street, or that wanting to go to the one he was misled into the other, or into believing that the proprietor of the Golden Lion Hotel in King Street was the proprietor of Lennox's Hotel in Murray Place. Such a statement as that is ridiculous and incredible on the face of it.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree. The fact that the golden lion is the appellant's property, and the fact that he does not call the Station Hotel the Golden Lion Hotel, are not conclusive in the appellant's favour, because it is conceivable that he might so use the sign as to deceive the public, as, for instance, by placing the lion over the door, or printing the words "Station Hotel" in so small characters that they would not be readily deciphered. But the photograph shews that not only is the lion not placed immediately above the door, but the words "Station Hotel" are in quite legible letters, and, further, that the words "Lennox's Station Hotel" appear in large letters on the side of the house. I am, therefore, unable to see that anything which the appellant has done would lead anyone to suppose that in entering the Station Hotel he was entering the Golden Lion Hotel.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the interlocutor appealed against, refused the interdict craved, and dismissed the petition, with expenses in the Court of Session and in the inferior Court.

M'Lachlan v. s.s. "Peveril" Co., Limited.

Reparation—Ship—Liability of shipowner to servant of stevedore for defect in ship's gear—Liability of stevedore to his servant for defect in ship's gear.—A labourer in the employment of stevedores brought actions for damages on account of personal injuries sustained by him through the fall of a stanchion when engaged in discharging the cargo of a ship (1) against the shipowners, and (2) against his own employers.

In the action against the shipowners the pursuer averred that the stanchion was supported mainly by bars of pig-lead being placed round it, its proper fastenings having become wholly insufficient, and that it had fallen down in consequence of having received "a slight concussion" through contact with a sling of ingots of lead which he was assisting to unload, and which was being dragged by a winch from under the combings of the hatch of the vessel in order to be raised out of the hold.

In the action against his employers, which was laid both at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, the pursuer made the same allegations regarding the condition of the stanchion, and averred that on the occasion in question he was working under the orders of the defenders' foreman, whose principal duty was one of supervision, and who was not ordinarily engaged in manual labour, and that the foreman knew, or ought to have known, that the stanchion was practically unfastened and unsupported, that it was the foreman's duty to have seen to the removal or to the proper fastening of the stanchion, and that he failed in this duty.

The defenders in each action pleaded that the action was irrelevant.

Held (1) that the action against the shipowners was relevant; but (2) (diss. Lord Young) that the action against the stevedores fell to be dismissed as irrelevant, in respect that the stevedores were under no duty of inspecting the vessel to see to its safety for their servants.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN February 1896 William M'Lachlan, quay-labourer, Glasgow, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against The Steamship "Peveril" Company, Limited, for damages on account of injuries sustained by him when engaged at the Queen's Dock, Glasgow, in the employment of Messrs James Macgregor & Ferguson, stevedores, in discharging the cargo of the "Peveril," belonging to the defenders.

The pursuer averred:—On 21st January 1896 the pursuer was engaged, as one of a squad of men in Messrs Macgregor & Ferguson's employment, in discharging ingots of lead in slings of about ten each at No. 2 hatch of the "Peveril." The pursuer's station was down in the hold near the square opening. At some distance under the combings of the hatch other men were engaged in fastening chains round the slings of ingots, and then attaching the fall of the winch to the chain in order that the sling might first be dragged along the floor of the hold until it was underneath the square of the hatch, and then hoisted up on to the deck. "The universal custom in discharging ingots of lead in the harbour of Glasgow is for the men to arrange the lead in slings in this way, and to have it dragged by the winch from whatever part of the hold it may have been slung to the square of the hatch, thereafter to have it slung on to the stage, and thereafter carried in trucks to the shore." (Cond. 3) While one of the slings "was proceeding along to the square of the hatch it slightly touched some lead near the stanchion of the vessel. Notwithstanding that the sling of lead only touched the lead near the stanchion in the very slightest way possible, the stanchion at once gave way and fell forward upon the pursuer, who was in front, striking him a full blow on the left leg and breaking it above the ankle. . . . It is explained that the said stanchion was surrounded, up to a certain height, by pieces of lead which kept it nearly upright, and, when this support was removed, it fell in the manner described, as there were no bolts in it to keep it in its place." (Cond. 4) "After the accident the pursuer's fellow-workmen at once examined the stanchion, and found that it had, when originally fixed, been secured by two bolts at the top and one at the bottom. Only one bolt was left in the stanchion in the hole next the keel, and after it fell this bolt was found in the hold. This bolt was old and worn, and had been cracked through the centre before the stanchion fell. The rust had eaten into it so thoroughly that all the strength had been taken out of it. The bolts at the top were evidently awanting, as they could not be discovered in the hold. At anyrate the nuts of the bolts were evidently not screwed on. It is explained that the stanchions of vessels are generally specially constructed of great strength to resist the concussion of cargo being moved and shifted about in the holds, and, if properly secured, they are quite strong enough to resist the force which can be put upon them by a winch of the description used in this vessel. It is explained that the full force of the aforesaid sling of lead did not come against the lead near the stanchion, and that it fell in a manner which shewed that it was not supported or secured in any reasonable way. Had it been so it could not have fallen with the slight concussion upon it which resulted from the contact between the sling of lead referred to and the lead near the stanchion, and, as a matter of fact, the sling of lead, when it stopped, had not gone past the place where the bottom of the stanchion was when it fell." (Cond. 5) "The pursuer has thus been injured through the gross and culpable negligence of the defenders or their servants, in respect of their having left the aforesaid stanchion in a dangerous and defective condition, and improperly secured both at the top and the bottom. It was the duty of the defenders, as the shipowners, to see that all the fittings, moveable and otherwise, of the vessel are properly and securely fixed, so as to enable the stevedores engaged to do their work in a safe and proper manner. It was also their duty, periodically, to examine and test the stanchion referred to, but they failed to do so, and the pursuer has become injured in consequence. . . ."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having been injured through the fault of the defenders in failing to keep and maintain the said fittings of their vessel in a condition of ordinary safety and security as above described, is entitled to decree as craved, with costs.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant. (4) Said accident having occurred through the dangerous manner in which the work was being done, and through the fault of the pursuer and his fellow-workmen, the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses.

Thereafter, the pursuer brought an action against Messrs Macgregor & Ferguson, his employers at the time of the accident, in which he prayed for damages at common law and under the Employers Liability Act on account of the same injuries.

The pursuer averred (cond. 2) that on the occasion in question he was working "under the orders and supervision of the defenders' foreman, John Cunningham, whose principal duty was one of supervision, and who was not ordinarily engaged in manual labour. The method adopted by the defenders' foreman for discharging the vessel was as follows." The pursuer then gave an account of the circumstances of the accident similar to that given in his former action, and further averred:—(Cond. 4) "It is believed and averred that it was the duty of the defenders and their foreman, in discharging the pig-lead above described, to see that such a system was adopted as would enable their men to work in safety. It was also the duty of the defenders' foreman to ascertain whether the stanchion above described was originally, and continued to be, properly and firmly secured during the progress of the discharge. . . . As a matter of fact, although the defenders' foreman knew, or ought to have known, that the stanchion above described was practically unfastened and unsupported, except by the pig-iron around it, which kept it in its place, and off the perpendicular, he took no steps either to inform the master or officers of the ship of the dangerous condition of the stanchion, or to have the stanchion removed from the place, or properly supported. He also failed to see that the loads being dragged from the hold were kept at sufficient distance from this unsupported stanchion, to prevent it or the pig-lead round it, from being touched. He gave no warning of any description to the pursuer or his fellow-workmen of the defective condition of the stanchion. It is further believed and averred that, if there was a danger of the stanchion being touched or injured by the loads being dragged out of the hold by the winch, it was the duty of the defenders and their foreman to have removed the stanchion from its place until the discharge had been completed. It is believed that this is customary amongst the stevedores of Glasgow. . . ." (Cond. 5) "The pursuer has thus been injured through the fault of the defenders and their foreman in failing to adopt the proper system of arranging the foresaid thwartship beam and hatches, so as to enable the cargo to be discharged in a safe way for the men, and also through the foreman's negligence in superintendence, through failure to ascertain and warn the captain of the defective condition of the aforesaid stanchion, or cause it to be properly supported himself. The defenders' foreman was also at fault in not causing the aforesaid defective stanchion to be altogether removed when he saw that there was danger of some of the loads coming near it so as to touch it, or the lead around it."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having been injured through the fault of a person in the service of the defenders, whose ordinary or principal duty was one of supervision, and who was not ordinarily engaged in manual labour, is entitled to decree as craved, with costs. (2) The pursuer having been injured as above described through the defenders' failure to supply good and sufficient ways and plant, is entitled to decree as craved, with costs. (3) Pursuer having been injured by reason of the aforesaid defective system adopted by the defenders in discharging said vessel, is entitled to decree as craved, with costs.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is irrelevant, and should be dismissed, with expenses to defenders. (4) The accident having been caused through a defect in the ship, for which defenders are not responsible, they should be absolved, with expenses.

The actions were conjoined ob contingentiam on 24th March 1896.

On 31st March the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) allowed a proof before answer.*

The pursuer appealed for jury trial.

The defenders in each action objected to the relevancy of the action.

Argued for the "Peveril" Company;—It was not disputed that they were responsible for the ship and its fittings, in so far as properly used by the pursuer and his fellow-servants, who were on board for a legitimate purpose. But on the pursuer's own shewing the stanchion was subjected to usage for which it was never intended. The action against these defenders therefore was irrelevant.

Argued for Macgregor & Ferguson;—They were not liable, as they were under no duty to inspect the ship and its fittings in order to see to the safety of their workmen.[1] The case was not one of a defect so obvious that anyone must have seen it, and even if it were, the utmost that these defenders could have done, if they noticed the

* "NOTE.—An action in the first place was raised by the pursuer against the owners of the steamship in which the accident happened. The defenders in that case lodged defences, inter alia, averring that the manner in which the discharge was carried on was reckless and obviously dangerous, and that the accident was due to this and the carelessness of pursuer and his fellow-workmen. This averment inferred fault on the part of the stevedore's foreman, and against the stevedore a second action was raised. The two actions were conjoined on the 24th March, and I have now heard a debate on the conjoined actions. I consider there is some misconception as to the effect of conjunction. It is simply in my opinion (and that of one of my colleagues with whom I spoke on the subject) entirely a matter which has to do with convenience as to procedure. If the actions are separately relevant, their relevancy is in no way affected by the fact that the actions have been conjoined, even although the statements in each are not consistent. The justification to pursuer for raising a supplementary action is found in the defenders' averments in the first case. I do not know that the averments in the second case are absolutely inconsistent with the averments in the first case, but even if they were, as I have already indicated, I do not think it affects the question quoad a case for proof.

"Substantially, on the case as presented, it pretty much comes to this—that it was the duty of the shipowners to see that the stanchions of the ship were in such a state that men employed in working in the hold should not be exposed to the risk of their falling from slight causes; and, in the second place, fault is averred against the stevedore's foreman in respect if he had taken the precaution of seeing that the stanchions were right, the one in question having patently something wrong with it, the accident would not have happened. Now, the agent for the shipowner argued that the proximate cause of the accident was the fault of the stevedore as averred. As I have already said, I think that each case must be taken by itself separately as regards relevancy. I am not, however, prepared to hold that shipowners could be absolved from blame as directly contributing to the accident, if it be proved that their stanchions were defective, and that it should have been known that they were defective if there had been proper supervision, merely because there should have been a further precaution taken by the stevedore or his foreman, which had been neglected. I think the proper course in this case is to have a proof before answer."

defect, would have been to complain to the shipowners. They would not have been entitled to remedy the defect at their own hands.

Argued for the pursuer;—According to the pursuer's averment the stanchion fell owing to its fastenings having become completely useless, which was a clear ground of action against the shipowners at the instance of the pursuer, who was on board on the invitation of the shipowners, and had not subjected the ship's fittings to any usage which they might not reasonably be expected to stand. The pursuer's own employers also were liable, as the defect was a patent defect, which they ought to have observed, and insisted on having removed for the safety of their workmen.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As regards the case against the owners of the "Peveril," as to which Mr Ure did not say anything in reply, I think it can hardly be maintained after what we have heard that there is not a case to go to proof. A stanchion which forms part of the supports of the deck near the hatchway is alleged to have been in such a condition that a very slight force coming against it would throw it down, and as there must be workmen working in the hold who have to pass that stanchion and be near it, time after time, in the course of the day, I think it cannot be held not to be a case for evidence, at least as to whether, that stanchion being in an utterly unsafe condition, the defenders are not to be held liable in respect of that unsafe condition, the result of a slight accident being that the stanchion gives way and injures one who is not in their employment, but who is on duty in the ship.

The case against the stevedore is quite different, and I must say that I am surprised, and I think it is a great pity, that a case against the stevedore was raised at all. I think the cases which have been cited shew that a stevedore is not called upon to look to the security of the fastenings on board a ship on which he has to work. Of course a stevedore who happened to notice anything which was seriously wrong should point it out, but he could not have any power in the management of the ship; and if the people on board the ship—the master or owner—to whom he made a complaint were to say to him, "Attend to your own business, we will attend to ours; we are quite satisfied with it," I do not think he could have refused to carry on his work to the best of his ability. It does not appear to me that there is any case stated against the stevedore different from what was stated in the other cases, in which it was held that there was no relevant case against the stevedore. My opinion is, therefore, that the case against the stevedore should be held to be irrelevant.

LORD YOUNG.—I have no doubt about the relevancy of the case against the shipowner, and it is probably matter of regret that, owing apparently—for I take the Sheriff's note as stating the truth—to the case maintained by the shipowners before him in debate, the second action was brought against the stevedore. I think it is probably unfortunate that that was done, although I take the Sheriff's explanation of it as quite intelligible, and really the explanation of why the pursuer, who is a labourer in the employment of the stevedore, brought the action.

What was maintained was that the stanchion was patently bad, so that any stevedore could see it, and he and his foreman, who was not a man engaged in manual labour, but a person employed to see that these things were all in order, ought certainly to have known of it and have seen to it, and that if he had done his duty there would have been no such accident as that which is the ground of action here, and therefore no claim of damages against the shipowners. That was the case maintained in argument by the agent for the ship. Then bringing this action against the stevedore the labourer in his employment says—(His Lordship read condescendence 4). Now, I think it very probable that this labourer may fail to establish that, but he has averred it, and I am not prepared to say that I think the Sheriff is wrong in the course which he has taken of sending the case against the stevedore also to proof before answer. He says, after stating that the agent for the shipowner argued that the proximate cause of the accident was the fault of the stevedore as averred (that is, in the averment which I have read)—"As I have already said, I think that each case must be taken by itself separately as regards relevancy. I am not, however, prepared to hold that the shipowners could be absolved from blame as directly contributing to the accident if it be proved that their stanchions were defective, and that it should have been known that they were defective if there had been proper supervision, merely because there should have been a further precaution taken by the stevedore or his foreman which had been neglected. I think the proper course in this case is to have a proof before answer." I think the Sheriff here indicates plainly enough that he reads the averments of the pursuer—and I am not disposed to differ from him—as amounting to this, that the things were defective, and that it must have been known to the stevedore. Indeed, he avers that it was known that they were defective, and certainly would have been known if there had been proper supervision.

Now, I am not aware of any authority for the proposition that a stevedore is not responsible for an accident to one of his men from a defect which he should have seen to, and would have discovered had he made proper supervision. I think there is authority to the effect that a very slight supervision will be sufficient on the part of the stevedore to exempt him from responsibility, and that he may assume that this, that, and the other thing are all right in a ship without making a special examination. But I cannot assent to the proposition that there would be no liability if things are wrong, which by proper supervision, without requiring anything out of the way on his part, he would have discovered so as to prevent his man going into that danger. If there is to be an inquiry before answer—a proof before answer—I think it is not judicious or in the legitimate interests of the parties that we should decide any question upon the relevancy here of the want of proper supervision on his part, whereby he would have discovered this defect before the risk was incurred or damage done. I should therefore, for my own part, be of opinion that the proper course is to affirm the judgment of the Sheriff, a jury trial not being insisted in, and send the case back to him that he may proceed with the proof before answer in both cases.

LORD TRAYNER.—The proximate cause of the injury for which damage is claimed in this case was insufficiency of one of the ship's stanchions. I think there is a case at least for inquiry as regards the liability of the shipowners upon that question. I think there is no relevant case stated for inquiry as against the stevedore. I think it is settled that a stevedore is not responsible for the insufficiency of the ship's fittings, and that he is not bound before he begins his duty of discharging or loading a ship to satisfy himself with regard to the ship's fittings whether they are sufficient or insufficient. I think, further, that if the pursuer has not averred a relevant case against the stevedore, it is the stevedore's right to ask that the action should be at once disposed of, and that he is not bound to wait the result of an inquiry re a claim against other persons with which he has no concern.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I think there is a case for inquiry as against the owners. I agree with your Lordship in the chair and Lord Trayner that no relevant case has been stated against the stevedore, because I am of opinion that there is no duty of inspection of a ship laid upon a stevedore, and that being so, I think the stevedore is entitled to absolvitor now.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, dismissed the action against the stevedores Macgregor & Ferguson, and decerned; and in the action against the s.s. "Peveril" Company, Limited, allowed the parties a proof of their averments before answer.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Mines and Minerals—Defect in road in mine—Knowledge of mine-owner—Liability at common law—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42), sec. 1, subsec. (1), sec. 2, subsec. (1), and sec. 8.—A miner was injured by the fall of two large stones from the roof of a roadway in the coal mine in which he was employed. In an action by him against his employers for damages, laid both at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, he averred that "the accident was caused through the fault and gross negligence of the defenders, their manager, oversman, and roadsman, in allowing said roof of said road to remain in such an exceedingly dangerous condition"; that "the road had not been properly inspected"; that "the wood supporting the roof and sides where the accident occurred was in a rotten state, and had been in this state for a considerable time before the accident, and contributed to the accident"; and that "this was well known to the defenders, their overseman and roadsman, but no steps were taken to have it remedied."

Held that these averments were relevant to infer liability under the Act, and further that the pursuer was entitled to an issue both at common law and under the Act.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN February 1896 Alexander M'Mullen, drawer, Forsyth's Land, Newarthill, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Hamilton, against the Newhouse Coal Company, near Holytown, and Hugh Crichton there, the only known partner of that company, praying for damages for personal injury sustained by the pursuer when in the employment of the defenders. The action was laid at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

The pursuer averred that when in the employment of the defenders as a drawer at Newhouse No. 1 pit, on 28th December 1895, as he was pushing a hutch along the main road of the pit from the lye to the face, he was injured by a fall of stone from the roof, one stone, weighing about three cwt., falling upon his back, and another falling upon his left hand. He further averred:—(Cond. 4) "The accident was caused through the fault and gross negligence of the defenders, their manager, oversman, and roadsman, in allowing said roof of said road to remain in such an exceedingly dangerous condition as to permit stones to fall down therefrom, to the peril and great danger of those workmen whose duty it was to pass up and down said main road during the entire day." (Cond. 5) "It was the duty of the defenders, and of their said manager, oversman, and roadsman, to have said road inspected regularly, and to have said roof so supported that no stones or other debris could fall therefrom, neither of which precautions were taken here. Said roof of said road had not been inspected for a considerable period prior to the date of said accident, and had been for a considerable time prior thereto in a very dilapidated and dangerous state, and was the cause of the accident. An ordinary inspection would have revealed the dangerous condition of the said roof of said road. The wood supporting the roof and sides where the accident occurred was in a rotten state, and had been in this state for a considerable time before the accident, and contributed to the accident. This was well known to the defenders, their oversman, and roadsman, but no steps were taken to have it remedied. Loose stones were hanging from the roof, and had been hanging for a considerable time in this dangerous state before the accident."*

M'Mullen v. Newhouse Coal Co.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant.

On 7th April 1896, the Sheriff-substitute (Davidson) sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and assoilzied them from the conclusions of the action.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The pursuer's case under the Act was clear. He averred a defect in the condition of the road, which brought him within sec. 1, subsec. 1,[1] and he averred that this defective condition had not been remedied owing to the negligence of the defenders or of their oversman and roadsman, which took him out of the exception contained in sec. 2, subsec. 1. The Sheriff-substitute was in error in thinking that the definition in sec. 8 applied to subsec. 1 of sec. 2; it applied only to subsec. 2 of sec. 1. (2) The case was also relevant at common law, the pursuer's averment being that the defenders were themselves aware of the defective condition of the road. The argument that the compulsory employment of certificated managers, under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, took the case of coal mines out of the ordinary rules of responsibility had been rejected.[2] At all events the case being relevant under the Act, the pursuer's record was sufficient to entitle him to go to trial also at common law.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The pursuer's case at common law was irrelevant. It was based entirely on the defenders' alleged personal knowledge of the defective condition of the road. Such knowledge was very improbable, and therefore, taking the case upon relevancy, the pursuer's averment ought to have been much more specific to entitle him to an issue at common law. The substance of the pursuer's averment was that the roof at the point in question had got into a bad condition. That was a defect of detail, and there was no averment that the defenders exercised any personal supervision over the working of the mine. The averment as to their knowledge therefore could mean only that they had knowledge in law through their servants. That was not sufficient at common law.[3] The cases of Macdonald[2] and Gibson[2] went to no more than this, that a mine-owner, in whose mine a defective system was in operation, was not relieved from responsibility for injuries resulting from that system, by the mere fact of there being a certificated manager; but the present case was not a case of defective system. The fault was the fault of the manager, who was a fellow-servant of the pursuer.[4] (2) No case

* "NOTE.—In the pursuer's pleadings I find no case at all at common law. His case under the Employers Liability Act is that the roadsman or some official in the pit failed in his duty to inspect the roof which fell. Now, it is the roadsman's duty to do this, and there is no averment that he was a person entrusted with superintendence, or that he was not engaged in manual labour. There is no averment that the defenders failed to appoint a proper manager or roadsman, and it does not avail the pursuer, in my opinion, to insert in his condescendence that it was the duty of the manager and oversman to inspect the working-places, and then to explain that if the roadsman fails these persons are in fault, because it is their business to see that he does his duty."

May 27, 1896. M'Mullen v. Newhouse Coal Co.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Sheriff-substitute has thrown out this action and held that the pursuer's averments are irrelevant. I am unable to concur in that result. As regards the case under the Employers Liability Act, the pursuer's averments amount to this, that the ways were in a dangerous and defective state. For that the Act gives the pursuer a remedy by section 1, subsection 1, unless the defender can bring himself within the exception stated in section 2, subsection 1, of the Act. I am of opinion that his averments are such as to entitle him to have his case sent to trial. It will be open to the defender at the trial to bring the case under the exception in section 2, subsection 1, of the Act.

The action is also laid at common law, and that raises a more difficult question. There is no doubt that an employer may be liable at common law for the defective condition of ways if he has personal knowledge that they are defective, and either fails or declines to have the defects remedied. Now, here we have an averment that "the wood supporting the roof and sides where the accident occurred was in a rotten state, and had been in this state for a considerable time before the accident, and contributed to the accident," and that "this was well known to the defenders." The pursuer undertakes to prove that, and whatever we may think about the probability of such a statement being proved, we cannot refuse to allow the case to go to trial at common law as well as under the statute.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of opinion that this case must be sent to trial. I think we could not do otherwise unless we were to hold that within the limits imposed by this record it would be impossible to establish facts inferring liability either at common law or under the Act. I consider the case first as laid under the Act. It is to be noted that the Act was passed for the purpose of modifying the hardship and injustice of the common law, which held that the workman should take the whole risk of the negligence of all his fellow-workmen. This Act was passed to modify that risk in certain special cases. One of these cases is "when personal injury is caused to a workman by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the employer." That is averred to have been the case here. At common law if any such defect remained unknown owing to the fault of a collaborateur the workman had to take the consequences. The statute altered that and made the employer liable in such circumstances. The statute provides that in such a case the workman is to "have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if he had not been a workman of, nor in the service of, the employer." It has been assumed throughout the argument that the subsection I have quoted applies to the condition of the roof in a mine. It is averred here that there was a defect in the roof. It is no answer under the statute that that defect was left unremedied or undiscovered through the fault of a collaborateur. But there is an exception to the exception introduced by the statute upon the common law rule—(His Lordship read section 2, subsection 1). Now, that puts it upon the pursuer to shew that the condition prescribed by the statute was fulfilled. If he fails to prove that, or, much more, if the employer proves the reverse, then there will be no liability. But I think the case must go to trial.

As to the case at common law, I agree that there is more difficulty, but I am not prepared to say that the pursuer cannot prove under this record facts inferring liability at common law, and I do not think the legitimate interests of the defenders, which we are bound to consider, require that we should refuse to send the case to trial at common law when we are of opinion that there is clearly a case to go to trial under the Act.

The Judge at the trial will tell the jury whether the evidence adduced will in law justify a verdict for the pursuer at common law, and I think this a sufficient protection for him. I think the case must go to trial without our making any separation of it as regards liability at common law and under the statute.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree that this case must go to trial, but I prefer at this stage to say nothing more than that I have great doubt as to the relevancy of the pursuer's averments in support of his claim at common law.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I think there is here clearly a case under the statute, but I have very great doubt whether there is a case at common law owing to the bareness of the averment as to the defenders' knowledge of the defective state in which the roof is alleged to have been. I think, however, that the case must go to trial both at common law and under the Act.

THE COURT approved an issue in common form for the trial of the cause by a jury, damages being claimed alternatively at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

HENRY GEORGE SEATON, Pursuer (Respondent).—W. Campbell—A. Orr Deas.

PARISH COUNCIL OF THE PARISH OF ARBROATH AND ST VIGEANS, Defenders (Appellants).—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Clyde.

Poor—Inspector of Poor—Union of parishes—Transfer of existing officers—Right of new Parish Council to refuse to employ one of two inspectors of former parishes—Order by Secretary for Scotland—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50), sec. 51—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 58), secs. 46 and 51.—By the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 51, the Secretary for Scotland may, by order, provide (d) for uniting several parishes into one parish, (f) for the proper adjustment and distribution of the powers, property, liabilities, debts, officers, and servants of any Local Authority, consequential on any consolidation.

By the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, sec. 46, it is enacted,—"An order of the Secretary for Scotland under section 51 of the principal [1889] Act . . . for uniting several parishes or parts of parishes into one parish by the creation of a new parish or otherwise . . . shall have effect for all purposes whether County Council, justice, Sheriff, militia, parochial board, parish council," &c. Sec. 50 enacts,—"All persons who on 15th May 1895 hold office as inspector of the poor, &c., shall thereafter become the officers and servants of the Parish Council." Sec. 51 enacts,—

No. 151.

May 28, 1896. Seaton v. Parish Council of Arbroath and St Vigeans.

(1) "The officers and servants of any authority who hold office at the passing of this Act, and who by or in pursuance of this Act become officers and servants of a Parish Council . . . shall hold their offices by the same tenure and upon the same terms and conditions as if this Act had not passed . . ."

By an order the Secretary for Scotland united the parishes of A. and V., and declared that the former parish councils should cease, and their whole powers, rights, duties, property, liabilities, debts, officers, and servants should be transferred to the parish council of the new parish.

The new Parish Council thereafter appointed Stuart, the former inspector of poor for V., to be inspector for the united parish, and refused to regard Seaton, the former inspector of A, as in their employment.

In an action against them at the instance of Seaton for payment of his salary as an inspector, they maintained (1) that the old parishes having been abolished, their officers had also ceased to exist; and (2) that the clause in the order transferring existing officers to the new Parish Council was invalid, in respect it did not provide for the adjustment and distribution of their duties. Held that the order was valid, and that the inspectors of the pre-existing parishes continued to hold office as servants of the new Parish Council.

1st Division. Sheriff of Forfarshire.

THIS was an action brought in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire at Arbroath by Henry George Seaton against the Parish Council of the parish of Arbroath and St Vigeans, concluding for payment of £35, as past due salary.

The following facts were not in dispute between the parties:—

In July 1889 the pursuer was elected by the Arbroath Parochial Board to the offices of inspector of the poor and collector of poor and school rates.

On 11th July 1895 the Secretary for Scotland issued an order uniting the parish of Arbroath and the parish of St Vigeans into one parish, to be called the parish of Arbroath and St Vigeans.*

The order contained the following clause:—"(2) The Parish Council of Arbroath and the Parish Council of the now existing

* The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. c. 50), enacts, sec. 51,—"On the representation of a County Council or of a Town-Council the Secretary for Scotland may . . . by order provide for all or any of the following things:—(d) for uniting several parishes or parts of parishes into one parish . . .

"(f) for the proper adjustment and distribution of the powers, property, liabilities, debts, officers, and servants of any Local Authority consequential on any consolidation or other act done in pursuance of this section; and

"(g) generally for doing any matter or thing whatever whether similar or not to those above mentioned, which may be required or be expedient for the proper carrying into effect the purposes of this Act, and the settlement of local differences."

The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. c. 58), enacts, sec. 46,—(as quoted in rubric).

Sec. 50.—"All persons who on 15th May 1895 hold office as inspector of the poor, &c., shall thereafter become the officers and servants of the Parish Council."

Sec. 51 (1).—"The officers and servants of any Authority who hold office at the passing of this Act, and who by or in pursuance of this Act become officers and servants of a Parish Council . . . shall hold their offices by the same tenure and upon the same terms and conditions as if this Act had not passed, and while performing the same duties shall receive not less salaries or remuneration, and be entitled to not less pensions (if any) than they would have received or been entitled to if this Act had not passed . . .

parish of St Vigeans shall cease and determine, and their whole powers, rights, duties, property, liabilities, debts, officers, and servants shall be transferred to the Parish Council of the parish constituted by this order."

Thereafter the defenders intimated to the pursuer that they had appointed Robert Stuart, the former inspector of poor for St Vigeans to be inspector for the united parish, and that the pursuer would thus be necessarily deprived of his offices. The pursuer, in reply, maintained that he still held his offices. The defenders then intimated to him the following excerpt from a minute of a special committee of the united Parish Council:—"The committee unanimously resolved to recommend that Mr Seaton be allowed his salary in full up to the 15th day of August curt., both as inspector of poor and collector of poor rates, and that a sum of £250 be paid to him in addition, as in full of compensation and all other claims, whether legal or equitable."

The pursuer declined to accept the compensation offered, and raised the present action. He pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having, as at the 15th day of May 1895, held office as inspector of poor for the parish of Arbroath and collector of poor and school rates, became by operation of section 50 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, an officer of the Parish Council of said parish. (2) Under section 51, subsection 1, the pursuer and others similarly placed are declared to hold their offices by the same tenure, and upon the same terms and conditions "as if this Act had not passed, and while performing the same duties shall receive not less salaries or remuneration, and be entitled to not less pensions (if any) than they would have received or been entitled to if this Act had not passed."

The defenders, inter alia, averred:—"The said order, which was duly published before coming into operation, had the effect of terminating the pursuer's contract of service, and of discontinuing the pursuer's appointment as inspector and collector for said parish of Arbroath, as also of terminating the said Robert Stuart's contract of service, and of discontinuing his appointment as inspector and collector for said parish of St Vigeans.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The pursuer's claim, if he any has, against the defenders, being one for compensation and not salary, the defenders should be assoilzied. (5) The pursuer's contract of service having been terminated by the combined operation of the said order and the Poor-Law Act, no salary is due to the pursuer.

On 22d January 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) found that the action of the Parish Council in depriving the pursuer of his office of inspector of poor of the parish of Arbroath was ultra vires and illegal, and decerned for the salary sued for.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—The order of the Secretary for Scotland under sec. 51, by creating a new parish, wiped out the two pre-existing parishes, and with them their respective offices. Sec. 51 (1) had no application to the substitution of one parish for two, but dealt only with the substitution of a parish council for a parochial board under the earlier Local Government Act. The order did not transfer the existing officers to the new council. It must be read in accordance with, and not as upsetting, the existing law, and that did not permit one parish to have two inspectors.[1] Besides, the clause transferring officers and servants was invalid. There was no warrant for it in the statute. It could not be said to be an adjustment and distribution of the offices, &c., and yet that was what the Secretary was authorised to do. But assuming that the effect of the order was to give the new Council two inspectors, they were quite entitled to dismiss one of them. That was practically what they had done. An inspector did not hold his office ad vitam aut culpam. The observations to the contrary in the Old Monkland case[1] were obiter, and not necessary for the decision of that case. Although the Board of Supervision had, under sec. 56 of the Poor-Law Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), power in certain circumstances to dismiss inspectors, there was nothing in the Act to disable the parochial board which made the appointment from dismissing. The view expressed by Lord Shand in Clark's case[2] was founded on the case of Dull,[3] but that case, when examined, was hardly an authority for what his Lordship said.

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It seems to me that the true ground of judgment in this case is to be found in the order by the Secretary for Scotland uniting the parishes of Arbroath and St Vigeans. I do not doubt that all that was done under this order, so far as it relates to the present question, was validly done, and within the powers of the Secretary for Scotland. The second head of the order in plain terms declares that the whole powers, &c., of the two Parish Councils shall be transferred to the Parish Council of the new parish. Now, applying those general words to the case of the person in question, it is past doubt that this gentleman was an officer and servant of the old parish of Arbroath, and if so he is transferred to the new parish, and becomes one of their servants. What duties then has he to perform, and what rights has he in that quality? They can be none other than those he was performing and enjoying under his former master, and section 51 of the Act of 1894 seems to me directly to apply, because, speaking distinctly and solely of those officers who held office at the time of the passing of the Act, it says,—"Nothing done by this Act," or done in pursuance of this Act, "shall alter the rights and duties of those officers." Accordingly, the order of the Secretary for Scotland, not in so many words, but in effect, did distribute the duties of the inspectors who were transferred to the new parish, because by transferring them and declaring them to be servants of the new board, it defined their duties by the necessary statutory effect of that clause. It defined their duties as being those which had been done before. There is nothing at all repugnant to that conclusion, because it is manifestly entirely inappropriate to say that there is an illegality in a parochial board having two inspectors of poor. All that the decisions which we were referred to say is, that it would be illegal for a parochial board administering the Act of 1845 to appoint two inspectors, except under the limitations stated under section 55; but that never did, and never possibly could, make it impossible for the Legislature to authorise a competent authority, charged with the duty of effecting a workable fusion of two parishes, to continue the services of two existing inspectors. That is what has been done here, and accordingly, in my opinion, the order of the Secretary for Scotland can be supported on the ground that it effects the distribution of the offices; but further, the very general words in the Act of 1889, which are incorporated and referred to in the subsequent statute, would support what has been done, apart from that precise definition of powers. Now, if I am right in this view, we are taken clean outside the question about the power of a parochial board to dismiss an inspector of poor on other grounds than his fault, and for this reason that we have not here any arrogation by the new board of such a power. They have not considered whether this person should be dismissed from the office he holds. On the contrary, they have assumed, contrary to the law of the case, that the office was abolished. All that they have done is to assume that the office he held had gone by the board, and that they were debarred from doing anything else than to appoint a sole inspector for the combined parishes. Therefore nothing which I have said can be founded upon as affecting one way or other the rights of a parochial board or a parish council in future in dealing with their inspectors of poor. I have no occasion to enter into the consideration of whether those officers hold office ad vitam aut culpam. The result is that the decision of the Sheriff should be affirmed.

LORD ADAM.—I agree.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. I see no reason to doubt that the order of the Secretary for Scotland is entirely in terms of and within the powers devolved upon that high officer by Parliament. Standing the order, it seems perfectly clear that the inspectors of poor of the pre-existing separate parishes were transferred, i.e., their contract of service was transferred to the united parish. It may be that it is within the power of the united parishes to effect some distribution of the services and duties of these officers. That may yet be arranged. I agree with your Lordship that there has been no attempt on the part of the new parish council to dismiss their officer. They do not claim to have dismissed him. In the record they express the opinion that his office had come to an end by force of the Act of Parliament in consequence of the union of the two parishes, and there could be no better proof that this was the view on which the Parish Council acted than this, that they made the pursuer an offer of £250 as compensation for the loss of his office. Such an offer would of course be an illegal application of the funds of the parish in the case of a person who had been lawfully dismissed. The case is really one of misapprehension of the true state of relations between the authorities of the new united parish and the officers of the pre-existing separate parishes.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur.

M'Killop v. North British Railway Co.

HENRY M'KILLOP, Pursuer (Appellant).—Ure—Dewar.
THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Asher—Grierson.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Railway—Responsibility of railway company for defective equipment of their line.—A railway company or other employer is not relieved, by the appointment of competent engineers and managers, from responsibility for injury arising to a servant from a defect in the construction of the works.

In an action for damages at common law and under the Employers Liability Act at the instance of the father of a railway servant, the pursuer averred that his son had been run over and killed by a train while acting as a flag-boy at a level crossing; that the train in question was being pushed by an engine behind on a line which formed a curve, close to the place of the accident, round a water-tank, and that the water-tank had been erected by the defenders in such a position as to make it impossible for those in charge of the engine to see whether the line was clear, or to receive signals. The defenders pleaded that there was no relevant case at common law, in respect that there was no averment that the engineers employed to lay out the station and to fix the site of the water-tank were not competent. Held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue at common law.

Observations (per Lord M'Laren) on the Bartonshill Coal Company v. M'Guire, June 17, 1858, 3 Macq. 300; Wilson v. Merry & Cunningham, May 31, 1867, 5 Macph. 807; and Wallace v. Culter Paper Mills Company, June 23, 1892, 19 R. 915.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

HENRY M'KILLOP, railway surfaceman, brought an action of damages in the Sheriff Court at Linlithgow against the North British Railway Company on account of the death of his son, William John M'Killop, while in the service of the defenders.

The action was laid both at common law and under the Employers Liability Act.

The pursuer averred that on 19th September 1895 his son, while acting as a "redcap" or flag-boy to a train approaching a level crossing at Bo'ness Dock, on the defenders' line, was run over by the train, and so severely injured that he died; that the train, consisting of twenty-nine loaded waggons, was being pushed by an engine behind from the east along the Bridgeness line; that the pursuer's son was informed that the train was to be shunted to a branch line B, the points being 56 feet east of a level crossing; that his son was sent forward to the level crossing to prevent obstruction; that a train of empty waggons was on an adjoining line C, waiting till the loaded train cleared the points so as to enable the empty train to proceed on the Bridgeness line; that his son, while standing on the C line facing this train was run over by the loaded train, which, by some defect in or mismanagement of the points, had come along the C line instead of the B line. "About 55 feet or thereby from the said points, and to the east thereof, there is an erection belonging to defenders known as the water-tank, round which the said Bridgeness line, on which the said train of waggons was being pushed, forms a curve. The said water-tank is a great source of danger to those whose duty necessitates their being upon the said line of rails at or about this point." (Cond. 7) "Neither the first guard nor second guard in charge of said loaded train were at their posts as they should have been, and the engineman in charge of said train proceeded without a signal or warrant to do so, and without blowing the engine whistle, or giving any warning of his approach, as he should have done." (Cond. 8) "Owing to the erection of said water-tank it was utterly impossible for the engineman or fireman in charge of said loaded train to see if the line was clear, to receive signals from any one in front of their train, or to discover that their train was proceeding on a wrong line of rails. Looking to the dangerous character of this part of the line the defenders were at fault in having such an erection which is so much calculated to increase the dangers of this dangerous place. The defenders were aware previous to the accident to the pursuer's son that said water-tank was a source of danger, and it is believed and averred that previous to the accident, as also subsequent thereto, they were requested by the Board of Trade to have same removed from its present position, or recommended to do so. Such request or recommendation they have so far failed to comply with. Had the defenders, or those for whom they are responsible, exercised reasonable care the said accident could not have happened."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The accident to the said William John M'Killop, from which he died, having been caused through the fault of the defenders as condescended upon, and the pursuer having in consequence suffered loss, injury, and damage, he is entitled to compensation.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of his petition. (4) The faults alleged by the pursuer being those of his deceased son's fellow-servants, the action is incompetent at common law.

On 31st January 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Melville), before answer, allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed to the First Division for jury trial, and proposed an issue in common form.

The defenders objected to the relevancy of the action as laid at common law. They argued;—It was not said that the defenders did not employ perfectly competent and qualified officials to select a position for and to erect the tank in question. If they did, and if they complied with all the requirements of these officials, and supplied them with all necessary materials—and it was not said that they had not—then in the absence of personal knowledge of the alleged defect and of direct interference with or control of the particular detail of the organisation, they should not be held responsible for what was a fault of construction or arrangement of ways and works.[1] It was not said here that the defenders were personally identified with the defect. The other fault alleged here was the neglect of a communication from the Board of Trade. Even assuming that the company might have been in fault if they had not passed on the communication to the proper official, it was not said that they had not duly considered it. Suppose—as no doubt was the case—they had remitted the matter to their engineer, and he had said it was impossible to remove the tank, then, if anyone were liable it would be the engineer. There was express provision made now for defective plant by the Employers Liability Act, and that shewed that there was no liability at common law. The cases cited for the pursuer shewed merely that the point now made for the defenders might have been taken but was not. The cases, moreover, did not in their facts bear out the pursuer's contention, e.g., in Mackinnon[1] the accident was due to the want of a bottomer, whom it was clearly the duty of the defenders to supply, and in Sharp[2] there was a breach of a statutory regulation.

Argued for the pursuer;—As regarded liability for fault, the case of a railway company was not different from that of any other employer. The employer might not be responsible when the fault had relation to temporary or transitory matters or details, or to a solitary instance of neglect of duty on the part of one of their servants, but everything connected with their system which was of a permanent or stationary and continuous nature fell within the range of their duty. In the latter case personal knowledge of the defect was not essential, and it did not free the employer from responsibility that he had delegated the duty of construction and supervision to a manager or official however competent and skilful. Here the danger arose directly from a defect in the permanent arrangements, viz., the misplacing of a tank so as to obstruct the view of engine-drivers at a critical part of the line. In such a case the responsibility of the employer to a servant was the same as to one of the public.[3] The earlier cases supported this view, that an employer was liable for a defective system, and they were expressly saved in the Bartonshill cases in the House of Lords.[4] The later cases were to the same effect, and it made no difference that the employers were not personally in fault.[5] The question, indeed, had in many cases not been discussed, the defenders not apparently disputing their liability on that head.

Lord M'Laren.—This is an action at the instance of the father of a railway servant who lost his life while engaged in the service of the company, and as the pursuer says through the company's fault. The defenders say that no relevant ground of liability is stated against them, and more generally they maintain the proposition that a railway company incorporated by Act of Parliament is indemnified against all responsibility under the common law for injury done to its servants by the mere fact of appointing a competent staff of officers and workmen, and giving them the necessary authority. I think that a very moderate study of the decisions might have sufficed to satisfy counsel of the unsoundness of the proposed criterion of responsibility. It was pointed out by Lord Chelmsford in one of the earliest cases that came before the House of Lords, the case of the Bartonshill Coal Company v. M'Guire,[1] that the general rule is that employers are responsible for injuries done to their servants through fault or negligence in the same degree as they would be responsible to outside persons, and that the only exception to this rule is the case where the fault is attributable to a fellow-servant. Where the injury is attributable to defective machinery or apparatus, the liability to an employee and the liability to one of the public are identical. This ground of liability is recognised in the two Bartonshill cases[2] by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Chelmsford, who indeed treat the principle as incontestible, and make use of it to explain and vindicate previous decisions of their Lordships' House and of the Court of Session.

In Wilson v. Merry & Cunningham,[3] which was a case of injury to a miner due to defective construction of scaffolding in the shaft of a coal mine, Lord President Inglis states as his opinion that because the scaffolding was constructed by the defenders' servants under the direction of the manager, and there being no question of the sufficiency of the timber, the fault was the fault of fellow-servants; but his Lordship is careful to distinguish this from the case of machinery or apparatus purchased by the master and which is of faulty construction, because if injury results, this he says is the fault of the master, whose business it is to provide the apparatus. It would be easy to multiply citations on this subject, but I will only add that the liability of the master to provide fit and sufficient machinery and apparatus constituted the sole ground of judgment in the case of Wallace v. Cutler Paper Mills, Limited,[4] where this Court held an employer responsible for injury resulting from the unfenced condition of a paper machine, rejecting the defence that the workman must be held to have taken the risk because he knew that the machine was not properly fenced.

Again, I must dissent entirely from the notion that railway companies enjoy any special immunity from claims of this kind because they delegate the greater part of the work of an employer of labour to managers and engineers. We should not hold that a private company or partnership was able to displace the responsibility for providing sufficient machinery and plant by delegating the duty of selection to a manager. In this question I conceive that the directors of a railway company are in the same position as managing partners, and that they cannot relieve themselves of the responsibility which rests on the employer or his institor, by leaving everything to the judgment of a salaried officer. The provisions of the Employers Liability Act relating to this kind of liability are no doubt to be considered in all such cases; but I do not read these provisions as if they were intended to come in place of the rule of liability of the common law, but rather as supplementary to it. They may be very useful in ambiguous cases, but only, as I think, by way of obviating a defence which might be otherwise available under the principle of common employment.

In the present case one of the grounds of action is that near a railway station where there are sidings and a level crossing and a dockyard, and where the sources of personal danger are such that it is necessary that the trains of waggons should be preceded by a flagman, a water-tank was placed in the bend of a curve so as to interrupt the view of the line by the guard and driver of the waggons. By this arrangement it is said the flagman was exposed to unnecessary, that is, to avoidable danger, in consequence whereof he, that is, the pursuer's son, lost his life.

We are not at present concerned with the truth of these allegations; it may be that, having regard to the requirements of the service at the station in question, no better position for the water-tank could be found. If this be so, a jury may justifiably come to the conclusion that the water-tank constituted an unavoidable danger; and that, as in other cases of hazardous employment, the risk was accepted by the company's servants. But if the allegations be true, I see no distinction in principle between the case alleged and the case of unfenced machinery. The water-tank is part of the permanent equipment of the station, and in the laying out of a station, just as in the construction and placing of stationary machinery, due regard must be had to the safety of those who are to be employed there on the business of the company, so that their lives may not be exposed to unnecessary and avoidable hazard. This, I think, is a duty incumbent on the employer whether he be an individual or a company acting through directors, and while the employer would of course be morally right in relying to a large extent on the judgment of engineers or practical men, he is not in my opinion relieved of his responsibility by the mere fact that he had appointed competent engineers and managers to whose judgment he trusts. I therefore think that the issue should be allowed.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties upon the relevancy of the action, sustain the relevancy: Approve of the issue," &c.

May 29, 1896. Welch's Executors v. Edinburgh Life Assurance Co.

A, who was personally liable under bonds affecting his heritable estate for payment of the sums thereby secured, died leaving a disposition and settlement, whereby he disponed his whole estate, real and personal, to B, whom he appointed his executor and universal legatee. Held that under the enactments above quoted the personal obligation contained in the bonds transmitted against B, but that his liability for the debts of the deceased (including the bonds) was limited to the value of the estate to which he succeeded.

1ST DIVISION.

CHARLES WELCH TENNENT died in 1884 leaving a disposition and settlement in the following terms:—"I, Charles Welch Tennent, of Rumgally and Pool, dispone and assign to my brother Ralph Dalyell Welch, merchant in Liverpool, my whole estate, real and personal, wheresoever situated, and I appoint him my sole executor and universal legatee, . . . I recall all former wills and settlements, and declare this to be my last will and testament."

The estate left by Charles Welch Tennent included the lands of Rumgally, in the county of Fife. These lands were subject to two bonds and dispositions in security, each for £10,000, granted by the deceased, to which at the date of his death the Edinburgh Life Assurance Company had right. By these bonds the granter bound himself, his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, to repay to the creditors the principal sums with interest and penalty.

After Charles Welch Tennent's death Ralph Dalyell Welch gave up an inventory of the moveable estate, and completed titles to the heritable estate, including the lands of Rumgally, by expeding notarial instruments in his favour in terms of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act of 1868. He also entered into possession of Rumgally, and continued to possess it until his death in 1895. He duly paid interest on the bonds as it fell due.

Ralph Dalyell Welch left a will in the English form, whereby he appointed his wife Mary Ann Emslie Welch and others his executors, and devised and bequeathed to them the whole residue of his real and personal estates upon the trusts therein declared.

In June 1895 the Edinburgh Life Assurance Company raised an action in the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster, on behalf of themselves and all other creditors of Ralph Dalyell Welch, against Mrs Welch and the other executors appointed by his will, praying for the administration of his estates.

The plaintiffs in this action contended that in the circumstances above stated Ralph Dalyell Welch had come under a personal obligation to pay them the sums due under the bonds, and that the defendants, as his executors, were liable to pay the same out of his estate. The defendants contended that Ralph Dalyell Welch had come under no personal obligation to pay any part of the sums due under the bonds.

As these contentions raised a question of Scots law, the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster, on the motion of the defendants, ordered that a case should be prepared for the opinion of the Court of Session. A case was accordingly prepared, setting forth the facts above narrated, and requesting the opinion of the Court of Session on the following question:—"Whether, in the events which have happened, as hereinbefore stated, the said Ralph Dalyell Welch became subject to the personal obligation to pay the principal moneys and interest secured by the said two bonds and dispositions in security, each for the sum of £10,000, or either of them, or any part thereof?"

The case was brought before the Court on the petition of the defendants under the Act 22 and 23 Vict. cap. 63.

Argued for the petitioners;—(1) Prior to 1874 Ralph Dalyell Welch would have been under no personal obligation to pay the amount of the bonds, as he had not granted bonds of corroboration. The extent of his liability now depended on the construction to be put upon the 47th section of the Conveyancing Act of 1874.[1] That section was not intended to increase the liability of a person taking under a mortis causa deed, but to do away with the necessity of bonds of corroboration. The disposition in Mr Welch's favour was a "conveyance" in the sense of the section, and the personal obligation of the granter accordingly did not transmit against him, as there was no agreement to that effect in gremio of the deed. "Conveyance" in the Act of 1874[2] had the meaning attached to it in sec. 3 of the Titles to Land Act of 1868, and as there interpreted it would include the disposition in question. The deed was not a "bequest" in the sense of section 47, that term being applicable to cases where a person did not take directly from the granter, but through the medium of trustees or executors. If, however, it were to be held that the disposition was a bequest, then the disponee was entitled to the limitation of liability provided for by section 12 of the Act of 1874. The benefit of that section extended to all persons taking by succession, and was not confined to heirs by law.

Argued for the respondents;—Section 47 dealt with two cases, (1) transmissions by lucrative title, "succession, gift, or bequest"; and (2) transmissions by onerous title, "conveyance."[3] Ralph Dalyell Welch took on a lucrative title, and the disposition in his favour was a "bequest" in the sense of the section, for the meaning of that term could not on a fair construction be confined to indirect gifts. It was open to him to have refused the bequest if he wished to be free from the burdens accompanying it, but on his taking it the personal obligations of the disponer under the bonds transmitted against him in terms of the section, and he was not entitled to the benefit of the limitation provided by section 12, that benefit being confined to "heirs," and the true meaning of "heir" being heir by law.[4]

THE COURT answered the question as follows:—"By the law of Scotland under the provisions of 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94, sections 12 and 47, the said Ralph Dalyell Welch became subject to the personal obligation to pay the principal moneys and interest secured by the said two bonds and dispositions in security, each for the sum of £10,000, subject always to this limitation, that the said Ralph Dalyell Welch could not be made liable for the debts of the deceased Charles Welch Tennent (including the sums secured by the said bonds and dispositions in security) beyond the value of the estate to which he succeeded by virtue of the disposition and settlement of the said Charles Welch Tennent."

Whittle v. Carruthers.

Trust—Removal of trustee—Tutor and Curator.—A petition at the instance of one of two testamentary trustees and executors, who were also tutors to the truster's pupil children, for the removal of the other trustee from these offices on the ground that his estates had been sequestrated, and that the trust had a claim against his estate, granted.

1st DIVISION.

JOHN WHITTLE, farmer, Dumfriesshire, died on 9th April 1896, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 28th January 1890, by which he conveyed his whole estates to Robert Whittle and Joseph Carruthers, solicitor, then at Sanquhar, and afterwards at Moffat and Dumfries, as trustees.

The trustees were directed, after payment of debts, &c., to hold the residue of the trust-estate for behoof of the truster's widow in liferent, and after her death to divide the fee among his children equally.

The trustees were appointed executors, and also tutors and curators to any of the beneficiaries who might be in pupillarity or minority at the date of the truster's death.

The truster was survived by his widow, and by three children who were in pupillarity.

Mr Robert Whittle and Mr Carruthers accepted office as trustees.

On 12th May 1896 Mr Robert Whittle presented a petition to the Court praying for the removal of Mr Carruthers from the office of trustee and executor, and of tutor and curator, and for an order ordaining him to deliver up the trust-disposition and settlement, and all other papers belonging to the deceased.

The petitioner averred that Mr Carruthers had lately been in financial difficulties, that his estates were sequestrated on 21st April 1896, and that a claim had been lodged in the sequestration by the petitioner on behalf of the trust-estate for the sum of £117, 4s., in respect of transactions between Mr Carruthers and the deceased. The petitioner further averred that he had presented a petition in the Sheriff Court to issue confirmation in his favour as executor-nominate of the truster, and to ordain Mr Carruthers to deliver up the trust-disposition and other papers. This Mr Carruthers had refused to do.

The widow of the truster concurred in the petition.

Mr Carruthers lodged answers, in which he admitted that his estates had been sequestrated, and that a claim for £117, 4s. had been lodged in the sequestration, but he stated that the claim was greatly overstated, and that he had counter claims which more than balanced it. He further averred that he had been the law-agent of the truster for years before his death, and enjoyed his confidence.

Argued for the petitioner;—The effect of sequestration was to render a trustee unsuitable for the office,[1] more especially when the trust-estate had a claim against him. There was nothing to call for or justify the appointment of a judicial factor. The estate consisted chiefly of a farm. The trust was likely to endure for some time, and it would be a great hardship if it were burdened with the cost of judicial management.

Whittle v. Carruthers.

Argued for the respondent;—The respondent was willing that the estate should be sequestrated and a factor appointed, but there was no occasion for an order of removal. No malversation or breach of duty was alleged against the respondent, and it was clear that the truster had confidence in him. Being sequestrated, the respondent had no personal interest in the claim against him. That was now entirely in the hands of his trustee.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think there is enough to render necessary the removal of this trustee.

It is quite clear that his position as a sequestrated bankrupt, alleged to be indebted to the trust-estate, makes him a very unsuitable person to act as one of two trustees managing that estate. I think it is to be regretted that the respondent did not solve the difficulty by retiring; as, however, he declines to do so, it appears to me that our clear course is to remove him. No more censure of him is implied by our doing so than is involved in his having rendered this course necessary by not himself taking the proper step of retiring from the trust. It is out of the question that a person in the respondent's position should be allowed, in order to save his dignity, to insist upon the appointment of a judicial factor,—that is, to mulct the estate in the expenses of judicial management in place of the present gratuitous administration.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT removed the respondent from the office of trustee and executor, and of tutor and curator, and ordained him to deliver up to the petitioner the trust-disposition and settlement, and all other papers and documents belonging to the deceased John Whittle.

The respondent, who admitted that he was proprietor of the solum on which the wall rested, alleged that the wall was the retaining wall of the street and the property of the Police Board, and pleaded that a question of heritable right having been raised the Dean of Guild had no jurisdiction. Greenock Police Board v. Shaw Stewart.

2D DIVISION.

Dean of Guild of Greenock.

In November 1895 a retaining wall which adjoined Cartsburn Street, Greenock, and separated the street from the Cartsburn stream where the level of the street was five feet nine inches above the bed of the stream, gave way and became dangerous. The Master of Works of the burgh served notice, under section 318 of the Greenock Police Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. c. cxciii.), to repair the wall (1) upon Sir Michael Robert Shaw Stewart of Greenock and Blackhall, Baronet, who was the owner of the solum on which stood the street and the wall, and whose property was bounded on the east by the medium filum of the Cartsburn stream, and (2) upon the trustees of the deceased Charles Paterson, tanner in Greenock, who were the owners of a tannery on the east side of the stream and whose property was bounded on the west by the medium filum of the stream.

As these notices were not attended to, the Board of Police and the Master of Works presented a petition under the Act against Sir Michael and Paterson's trustees to the Dean of Guild, craving him to grant warrant to the Board of Police and to authorise them to repair the wall at the expense of the respondents or such one of them as might be found by the Dean of Guild to be the owner or owners of the retaining wall and the adjoining stream.

The respondents objected to the competency of the petition, but these objections were repelled, and after a judicial inspection of the premises on 12th December by the Dean of Guild and his council, the Dean pronounced an interlocutor in which he authorised the petitioners, without prejudice to any of the parties, and under reservation of all questions of personal liability, to put the wall in proper repair.

The repairs were executed by the petitioners at a cost of £53, 13s. 9d.

On 30th January 1896 the Dean of Guild appointed a record to be made up to try the question as to who was liable for the cost of the repairs.

Sir Michael, while admitting that he was owner of the solum, denied that the wall was his. He averred that it belonged to the Board of Police, and had been constructed by their predecessors when the street was formed, and had been maintained by them as necessary for the proper support of the street.

The petitioners denied that the wall was erected by them. They averred that their only connection with the streets of the town was imposed upon them by statute, and while admitting that their predecessors had erected the parapet wall on the top of the retaining wall in order to prevent accidents, they explained that the latter was necessary to prevent the stream encroaching on the street and that it existed long prior to the erection of the parapet wall above it.

Paterson's trustees averred that they were owners neither of the wall nor of the ground upon which it was built.

Sir Michael Shaw Stewart pleaded;—(3) The Board of Police, being the owners of the retaining wall repaired by them, are bound to repair the same, and this action is unnecessary. (4) In any event the respondent the said Sir Michael Robert Shaw Stewart, not being the owner of said retaining wall, should be assoilzied, with expenses. (6) A question of disputed ownership and heritable title having arisen, no decision thereon can competently be pronounced by the Dean of Guild.

Paterson's trustees pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No jurisdiction.

On 15th April the Dean of Guild pronounced this interlocutor:—

No. 155.

June 4, 1896. Greenock Police Board v. Shaw Stewart.

"Before answer allows the respondent Sir Michael Robert Shaw Stewart a proof of his averments on record that the retaining wall on the west side of Cartsburn stream, Greenock, is the property of the petitioners, the Board of Police of Greenock, and that they have erected and maintained the walls and fences along the whole course of the Cartsburn stream within the burgh, so far as these adjoin the public roads and streets, and to the petitioners conjunct probation."

Sir Michael Shaw Stewart appealed, and argued;—(1) It was clear from the pleadings in the cause that the question raised before the Dean of Guild was one of disputed heritable title, and his jurisdiction was therefore excluded. (2) Even if the case went to proof it lay upon the petitioners to prove their averments.

Argued for Paterson's trustees, who had lodged no separate appeal;—The Dean could have no jurisdiction as against them, for the petitioners' averment was that Sir Michael, and not they, was owner of the solum and the wall.

Argued for the petitioners;—The Dean of Guild had jurisdiction here. No question of heritable right was involved in the case.[1] A mere averment of disputed ownership was not a sufficient ground for recalling the Dean of Guild's interlocutor. Sir Michael admitted that he was owner of the solum, and the sole question was whether the wall belonged to him as the boundary of the street or whether it had been put up by the petitioners' predecessors, and had been maintained by them in the public interest for the proper support of the street. That question was one in which the Dean could competently take proof, and the appeal was incompetent against his interlocutor allowing it. Sir Michael being proprietor of the solum, the onus lay upon him to prove that he was not the owner of the wall built upon it.

Lord Young.—There is no question that Cartsburn Street, which is situated alongside of the Cartsburn stream, is one of the old streets of Greenock, and that Sir Michael Shaw Stewart is proprietor of the solum of the street. In November 1895 the retaining wall at the edge of the street gave way where it abuts on the burn, and the public authority, acting for the interest of the public in maintaining a public street, sent to Paterson's trustees and to Sir Michael a notice requiring them as owners of the wall and the adjoining portion of the bed of the stream to repair the wall. They did this under clause 318 of the Greenock Police Act, 1877, in the view that this was a "building, wall, or structure which was dangerous to the occupiers thereof or of the neighbouring buildings or lands, or to the passengers along the street." Neither Paterson's trustees nor Sir Michael having complied with the notice, the Board of Police presented a petition to the Dean of Guild to authorise them to repair the wall at the expense of Paterson's trustees and Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, or such one or other of them as should be found to be the owner of the wall. After inspection the Dean of Guild authorised the petitioners to repair the wall, and this was done at a cost of £53, 13s. 9d. The question now arises as to the party liable for this expense.

Sir Michael declines to pay upon the ground that he is not the proprietor of the wall which is supporting the street, and which is necessary for its support. In his averments he has raised the question whether the wall was put up by him as proprietor of the solum of the street to protect his own property, or whether it was put up by the police authority as the Solicitor-General suggested, under clause 363 of the Act of Parliament, or before the Act was passed, or by the proper Local Authority, in the interest of the public using the street.

Now, that raises between the parties a question of fact about which they are disagreed, viz., did the proprietor of the solum put up the wall to protect his property and to prevent the street falling into it, or is it a part of the street put up, in order to make the street a safe one, by the public authority as guardians of the interests of the public using the street?

If it should turn out that the wall was erected by Sir Michael or his predecessors in the property for their own interests, just as in the case figured by your Lordships where walls are put up to protect cellars of houses built at the side of the street, it would, I think, prima facie—though I express no decided opinion upon the matter—be his duty to put it into repair at his own expense. On the other hand, if it was part of the street put up, or reasonably to be maintained, by those who used the street, then the claim against Sir Michael would fail.

But that is a question which is dependent on inquiry, or at least upon which it is reasonable that there should be inquiry before any decision is pronounced, and the Dean of Guild has accordingly allowed a proof of Sir Michael's averments, and it is this interlocutor allowing proof which is here challenged.

Now, Sir Michael challenges the interlocutor by disputing the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction, upon the ground that the case raises a question of heritable right. Paterson's trustees, the other parties called, also dispute the jurisdiction, upon the ground that as they are not alleged to have erected this wall, or to be owners of the solum on which it is built, they ought not to have been made parties to this action as coming within the scope of section 318 of the Act.

The Dean of Guild has repelled both pleas. As regards Paterson's trustees, I think his judgment is wrong, and that he has no jurisdiction against them. I think he has rightly repelled Sir Michael's plea to jurisdiction, because there is no question of heritable right as to the proprietorship of the street raised here at all. The question which is raised is whether what has been done for the repairing of the street ought to be paid for by the proprietor of the solum, or by those having the charge of the street as guardians of the public interest. There being no question, then, of heritable right in the case, and the Dean of Guild having allowed proof, I think this appeal is incompetent as far as Sir Michael Shaw Stewart is concerned. We cannot interpose at this stage, and the case must remain in the Dean of Guild's Court till it is concluded.

Under the old law of advocation, which is preserved in the law of appeal, an appeal was allowed with reference to jurisdiction. An appeal is allowed wherever an advocation was formerly allowed, and it is conceded that this appeal on the matter of jurisdiction is competent, just as an advocation would formerly have been. Therefore, dealing with the matter of jurisdiction, I would suggest that we should recall the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild in so far as it repels the plea of Paterson's trustees as to jurisdiction, by holding that he has no jurisdiction as against Paterson's trustees, and that we should sustain it in so far as it repels the plea against his jurisdiction by Sir Michael Shaw Stewart on the ground that it raises a question of heritable right.

The question still remains—it is a serious one, and I would suggest that the town authorities had better give it a little more attention than it has hitherto received—whether it is incumbent upon Sir Michael Shaw Stewart or upon them to do what is necessary upon his property to support the street. The case is, upon the mere statement of it, very distinguishable from that of a party having cellars at the side of a street which he uses as an access to his property. It is quite different from that. It is a case in which the public have—I assume with the consent of the proprietor—taken possession of, and have had possession of for a very long period, the banks of this stream, and the public authority have turned it into a more commodious street. The question arises—Is it not for them, and not for the proprietor of the solum, to do what is necessary to keep the protecting wall standing up and in good condition? That is a question which I think might be considered and settled to the avoidance of further litigation.

In the meantime, I think the case must be disposed of in accordance with the views which I have expressed, the practical result of which is that we should find that the Dean has no jurisdiction against Paterson's trustees, and that as regards Sir Michael Shaw Stewart the case should be remitted back to the Dean of Guild to hear proof.

Lord Trayner, Lord Moncreiff, and the Lord Justice-Clerk concurred.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the interlocutor appealed against: Sustain the first plea in law for the respondents the trustees of the deceased Charles Paterson, and dismiss the action so far as directed against them: Repel the sixth plea in law for the respondent Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, and remit the cause back to the said Dean of Guild to allow the petitioners and the respondent Sir Michael Michael Shaw Stewart a proof of their averments habili modo.

1st Division.

THE GOVERNORS OF BELL'S TRUST, Old Aberdeen, on 23d September 1895 presented a petition bearing to be with consent and concurrence of the Scotch Education Department, praying the Court, inter alia, to amend a scheme framed by the Educational Endowment Commissioners in 1890 for the administration of the charity.

Under that scheme the petitioners were bound to continue to maintain the Bell School in the parish of Old Machar, and to provide accommodation for not less than 284 children, charging fees not less than those paid in the Board Schools of the parish.

The petitioners stated, inter alia:—By the Aberdeen Corporation Act, 1891, the greater part of the district served by the school, including Old Aberdeen, in which the school was situated, had been added to the city of Aberdeen, and the administration of the School Board of Aberdeen had subsequently been extended to the annexed district. The funds of the endowment were inadequate for the proper maintenance of the school even in its present condition. The school buildings were not at present, nor could they, from their character and the nature of the site, be put into such a condition as to meet the requirements of the Scotch Education Department. The School Board of Aberdeen were at an early date to provide a new school for Old Aberdeen, which would adequately meet the requirements of the district, and the benefits arising to the inhabitants of the district from the carrying on of the endowed school would then disappear. The benefits of a similar endowment founded by Dr Bell for the benefit of New Aberdeen had been extended to Old Aberdeen by the Act extending the boundaries of the city.

The petitioners therefore craved the Court, inter alia, to amend the scheme of 1890 by providing for the application of the funds of the endowment to the establishment of bursaries for higher education of a certain yearly value, to be awarded by competitive examination among pupils below a certain age attending public or State-aided schools in the district at present administered by the School Board of Old Machar, or within the extended boundaries of Aberdeen, whose parents should, in the opinion of the Governors, require aid in giving them higher education; and to be tenable for a certain period at the Grammar School of Aberdeen in the case of boys, and at the High School for Girls, in Aberdeen, in the case of girls.

The Court remitted to Mr Bremner P. Lee, Advocate, to report.

In his report Mr Lee called the attention of the Court to the fact that while the petition bore to have been presented with the consent and concurrence of the Scotch Education Department, that consent had not been obtained until after the petition was in Court.* On the merits of the application Mr Lee reported in favour of the application of the funds of the endowment to the founding of bursaries, but expressed the view that the benefit of the bursaries should be restricted to children from the parish of Old Machar, to which the endowment belonged.†

LORD PRESIDENT.—Our attention has necessarily been called by the reporter to what is not only a grave difficulty in the way of granting the prayer of this petition, but also a reprehensible irregularity on the part of the petitioners. When this petition was presented, the petitioners had not obtained the consent of the Scotch Education Department to its presentation; and yet the petition purported to be presented with the consent of that Department, while, as if to emphasise the consent, the wholly inappropriate words "and concurrence" were added. No expectation of obtaining that consent could warrant the petitioners in making this statement. The consent of the Department is a pre-requisite to any such petition being presented; and we have occasion to know that the consent of the Scotch Education Department is not a formal, but a discriminating and highly intelligent act.

* By letter, dated 30th December 1895, the Education Department consented to allow the petition to proceed, but expressed strong disapprobation of the course followed in presenting the petition without their consent, and intimated that in similar circumstances they would make no such allowance.

† "REPORT.— . . . Were the future of the endowment to be determined on the footing that Dr Bell's two endowments were in reality one for the benefit of the city of Aberdeen and the parish of Old Machar, the present proposal would be open to the criticism that, while a part of Old Machar is still without the sphere of the Aberdeen School Board, and therefore receives no advantage from Dr Bell's Aberdeen endowment, it is not proposed to give that part any preference to the benefits of the Old Machar fund. But any attempt in this process to compensate the city of Aberdeen for the benefits which its extension has conferred upon its neighbours seems to be precluded by the legal position of the endowment now alone before the Court. The scheme which your Lordships are asked to alter has full operation and effect in the same manner as if it had been enacted in the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act of 1882 (section 32), and can only be altered in terms of the section of that Act under which this petition is presented (section 20), 'provided that such alteration shall not be contrary to anything contained in' the Act. Now section 7 provides, that 'subject to the provisions of this Act it shall be the duty of the commissioners, in reorganising as aforesaid educational endowments, to have special regard to making provision for secondary or higher or technical education in public schools or otherwise, in those localities to which the endowments severally belong, or in such manner as to secure to the inhabitants of those localities the benefit of such endowments. . . . Provided that nothing in this Act contained shall be taken to compel the commissioners to restrict any bursary, exhibition, scholarship, or other educational benefit attached to or tenable at any educational institution, to the children of persons resident in the locality where that institution exists.' There is nothing to suggest that the locality benefited by an endowment may be either extended or restricted by schemes framed under the Act,—the provision in this section apparently referring only to the case of bursaries already attached to a particular school, and allowing in such cases attendance instead of residence to remain the necessary qualification. . . ."

It is with some difficulty that I have come to the conclusion that, now that the Department have, pendente processu, consented to the petition going on, we may treat this as entitling us to consider the application as if its origin had been more legitimate.

On the merits, I am entirely satisfied with the recommendations of the reporter. Agreeing with him, I consider that we should not be warranted in extending to New Aberdeen benefits which, according to the directions of the testator, were destined to a different area. The recent changes in the administrative boundaries of Aberdeen, and the circumstance that the same testator had made another bequest which, owing to those changes, might now be held to compensate for such an extension, do not furnish any valid reason for the step which the petitioners ask us to take.

I am therefore for remitting to Mr Lee to adjust the scheme in accordance with his report.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Company—Voluntary winding-up—Petition for delivery of minute-book retained by secretary—Competency—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), secs. 100 and 138.—Held that a petition presented under sections 100 and 138 of the Companies Act, 1862, by the liquidator of a company which was being voluntarily wound up, to have the company's secretary ordained to deliver up its minute-book, was competent.

Retention—Lien—Minute-book of Company.—Held that a person who had been secretary of a company prior to its liquidation had no right of retention or lien over its minute-book for a debt due to him by the company.

1ST DIVISION.

ON 28th May 1896 Andrew Gladstone, who had been appointed liquidator in the voluntary winding-up of the Australian Land and Exploration Syndicate, Limited, presented a petition against William M'Callum, chartered accountant, Glasgow, and secretary of the company, under sections 100 and 138* of the Companies Act, 1862, craving the Court to ordain the respondent "to deliver forthwith to

* The Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), enacted, sec. 100,—"The Court may at any time after making an order for winding up a company require any . . . agent or officer of the company to deliver . . . forthwith, or within such time as the Court directs, into the hands of the official liquidator, any sum or balance, books, papers, estate, or effects which happen to be in his hands for the time being, and to which the company is prima facie entitled." Sec. 138 empowers the liquidator or contributories of a company which is being voluntarily wound up to apply to the Court "to determine any question arising in the matter of such winding-up, or to exercise as respects the enforcing of calls, or in respect of any other matter, all or any of the powers which the Court might exercise if the company were being wound up by the Court; and the Court . . . if satisfied the petitioner as liquidator foresaid the minute-book" of the company, "without prejudice to any lien competent to him."

The respondent lodged answers, in which he averred that he had acted as secretary to the company till the petitioner was appointed liquidator, and that there remained due to him the sum of £17, 11s. for services rendered by him to the company while their secretary. He offered to give up the minute-book on receiving payment of this sum, maintaining that he was entitled to retain the book until paid.

Argued for the petitioner;—(1) The application was competent under the sections of the Act founded upon. It had been decided[1] that the Court might interfere for such a purpose as this in a voluntary as well as in an official winding-up. (2) The minute-book could not be the subject of a lien.[2]

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The petition was not warranted by the sections founded on. Section 138 did not give the Court jurisdiction in a merely voluntary liquidation, in which creditors were unrepresented, to interpose between the company and the common law right of creditors to enforce payment of their debts.[3] Section 100 only related to books or papers to which the company was prima facie entitled, and did not extend to a case like the present, where the respondent was prima facie entitled to retain the minute-book. In any view the Court must be satisfied that it would be "just and beneficial" to grant the application, and should only do so subject to the rights of the respondent. (2) The minute-book had come into the respondent's hands lawfully in the course of his employment, and he was entitled to retain it until he was repaid for the time and trouble expended by him under the contract of employment.[4]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not see any objection to the liquidator of this company proceeding under section 138 of the Companies Act, 1862, but he is met by the pretension of the respondent that he has a lien over the minute-book of the company.

Now, the validity of the claim prima facie is to be judged by the statement of the respondent in the answers to the petition; and I do not discover more in his averments than that he was the secretary of the company, and performed the duties of the secretary until the liquidation. Now, has any law been shewn in support of the proposition that the secretary of a company, who has been employed to write up the minutes, has a right of lien over the minute-books? There are well-known and well-recognised liens applicable to a different relationship of the parties and to a different

I therefore think that we must grant the prayer of the petition.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree, and merely wish to add, that I think there is no foundation in the facts as stated for any claim either of retention or of lien. Retention, as I understand it, is the right of an owner of property to withhold delivery of it under an unexecuted contract of sale or agreement of a similar nature, until the price due to him has been paid, or the counter obligation fulfilled. Lien, again, is the right of a person who is not the owner of property but is in possession of it on a lawful title, and whose right of lien, if it is not a general one—of which class of liens there are not many examples—is a right to retain the property until he has been compensated for something which he has done to it. In this case there is no right of retention, because the books belong to the company, and there is no right of lien, because they are not in the possession of the respondent but of the company. Accordingly this case is in a different category from that of a claim by a writer who is lawfully in possession of his client's papers under a contract of agency.

Macpherson v. Largue.

HELEN TAYLOR MACPHERSON, Pursuer (Respondent).—W. Thomson.
JAMES LARGUE, Defender (Appellant).—M'Clure.

Parent and Child—Bastard—Filiation—Proof—Effect of defender's false denial of material circumstances.—Evidence in an action of filiation which was held sufficient to establish that the defender was the father of the pursuer's child.

Observed that the denial by the defender in an action of filiation of material facts and circumstances (although not believed) does not corroborate the pursuer's statement, but that if the pursuer is corroborated as to material statements made by her, and as to which she is contradicted by the defender, the defender's denial, if proved false or not credited, may give a complexion to the whole evidence adverse to him.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff.

HELEN MACPHERSON, Muir of Turtory, Rothiemay, Banffshire, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Banff against JAMES LARGUE, farm-servant, Lochagan, for aliment for a bastard child to which she gave birth on 31st August 1895, and of which she alleged the defender to be the father.

The pursuer averred that the defender had had carnal connection with her in or about the months of November and December 1894 at or near Turtory House.

The defender denied this averment, and averred that a man George Greig, who was a fellow-servant of the pursuer, was the father of her child.

June 16, 1896. Macpherson v. Largue.

At the proof the following evidence was led :—

The pursuer deponed,—"I am twenty-five years of age. Before Martinmas 1894 I was a servant at Turtory House with Dr Smith, and continued there until I left the day before the child's birth. I knew the defender when we were children; we were at school together. For some years we never met after going into service. I met him first upon the road-way after our separation; he was with his brother. It was in the afternoon, about four o'clock on a Sunday, I think, in the month of November 1894. It was before the Martinmas term, but not very long before. He was a servant then at Brownside, somewhere between Aberchirder and Turriff. I do not know when he went there. Turtory House, where I was, was on his way from Brownside to his own brother's house. I had no conversation with him that time. We met on the road. I did not ask him to call. He did not say he would call. Soon after that he called. It was on a Sunday in November, before the Martinmas term. He was still in the same place. He knocked at the door between five and six o'clock. I went to the door; he did not come in. I went outside with him, and walked about the walks in the grounds. He said he had called to see me. I was not very long in his company that afternoon, probably about a quarter of an hour. No improprieties took place between us then, nor did he profess any affection for me. He said he would call again. He came back again on the first Sunday of December between five and six o'clock. He came to the door, and I went out with him after answering it. He did not come in to the house. I went out with him. We went out past the front door, round about the grounds, and down at the back of the laundry, where we sat down. He had connection with me there. He told me that he loved me, and professed affection, and spoke about marrying me. He was scarcely an hour in my company that afternoon, then he left. . . . Cross.—At the first meeting we just spoke about the weather on that occasion, and that was all. There were only myself, the defender, and his brother present. We were just a few minutes standing together. . . . The next meeting was also in November, and before the term. The term I spoke of is the servant's term—the 28th. I never met him on the public road near Turtory House. . . . The second meeting he came and called at the house for me. He asked me if I would be his, and I said 'Yes,' and he said we might do worse. . . . He was about a quarter of an hour in my company at that time. We walked about the grounds at that time, but it was not for very long. . . . The first Sunday in December was the only occasion on which the defender had connection with me. The connection took place outside on the grass at the back of the laundry. The laundry is not far from the house, on the top of a brae looking down on the water, not far from the kitchen—a pretty steep brae, but not very long down to the water. There are trees on that brae, between the laundry and the water and between the laundry and the bridge. There are bushes growing besides trees. . . ."

The defender deponed to meeting the pursuer with his brother on a road near his brother's house, to another meeting with the pursuer on the road opposite Turtory House, and to a visit he paid to the pursuer at Turtory House on a Sunday. "I visited her on another occasion at Turtory House, also on a Sunday, about five o'clock in the afternoon. I knocked at the kitchen door, and she was in. I did not go inside, she came out to the door. She did not leave the house, and we stood talking at the door again. I was not ten minutes with her, and the whole time at the door. I did not tell the girl that I loved her on that occasion. I did not take her on my knee or kiss her at that time, nor did I give her a walk through the grounds at that time. I do not know where the laundry is situated at Turtory. I know where the milk-house is. I did not accompany her to the milk-house on that day. I did not sit down on the grass beside her at the laundry door. It was stormy. I never sat down with her there. I never sat down with her outside in the grounds of Turtory House. . . . I had not connection with her on any of these occasions, or ever had."

The defender led no evidence in support of his averment that George Greig was the father of the child, and Greig denied that any familiarities had ever passed between him and the pursuer.

Greig further deponed,—"The next time I saw him [the defender] near Turtory House was when he was standing about the laundry with the pursuer. That was also on a Sunday, about 1st December, five or six o'clock in the afternoon. I was upon the road and I chanced to be on the bridge, and I saw them. They were apparently sitting on a bank at the back of the laundry—the pursuer and defender. I just saw them, but I did not watch them."

It was proved that the child was born on the morning of 31st August 1895 at the house of the pursuer's grandfather, and that on that day the pursuer sent word to the defender to come to her, but it was not alleged or proved that she had informed him of her condition prior to that date. The defender went to see her at ten o'clock on the evening of the same day, accompanied by his cousin James D. Largue.

Alexander Macpherson, the pursuer's grandfather, deponed as to this visit, that the defender, his cousin, and the witness went into the room where the pursuer was lying. "The defender went to the pursuer's bed and asked what she wanted with him. She said, 'You know well enough what I am seeking you for.' He asked her then to swear that the child was his. I said nothing for a while, and then he was pressing her to swear, and said he would swear himself. I bade him stop that, knowing what state the house was in. I said she is not capable of taking your oath, and as little are you capable of taking hers; but if it come to that we will take it into a higher power. I said to the girl, if it is not James Largue say 'No,' and she did not speak to that; and if it be his all that you have to do is to say 'Aye,' and she said 'Yes.' He was for swearing again, and I would not allow any more of that. I said that was all that was to be required here. He told me that he could not think the child could be his, because he had not seen my granddaughter until a fortnight before the Whitsunday term. I told him that I knew that was a lie."

The pursuer deponed,—"Largue's first question when he came to my bedside on the day the child was born, was 'What did I want with him?' I told him at once it was the child. I spoke, I am sure, the very first time. The defender continued asking me to give him an answer, and I gave him an answer continually. I answered him every time he asked. My grandfather bade me answer him. It was not until the defender asked me to swear that my grandfather spoke. He said there was to be no swearing there. My grandfather told me to clear the man or charge him. That was after the bit about the swearing, but I had answered him before at the first.

The defender deponed,—"I said to the pursuer, 'What do you want with me?' she made no reply. I asked her several times what she wanted. When she refused to answer me I asked her if she charged me with being the father of her child, and again she made no reply. Her grandfather, when she would not reply, told me that the child was not mine; but that it did not look well. At last she spoke, and said to me, 'I dinna ken ony ither body.' That was an hour after I first asked her. I then said, 'Will you give your oath that the child was mine?' and she said, 'No, I am not seeking it'; she did not wish to make me the father. The grandfather interfered, and said that this was not the place for swearing. I agreed with him. The grandfather then asked the pursuer if she could not give me a better answer, and she never spoke. He asked her directly if I was the father of the child, and she gave no answer to that. I was more than an hour at the bedside. I did not get the child given to me then."

James D. Largue, the defender's cousin, gave evidence to the same effect as the defender.

On 11th February 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Grant) found in fact that the defender was the father of the child, and in law that he was bound to contribute to its support, and decerned against the defender.*

* "NOTE.—In this action of affiliation and aliment, the pursuer rests her whole case on a single act of connection on the first Sunday of December 1894.

"The criticisms of both parties at debate were mainly directed to diversities and discrepancies between the dates given in evidence on either side for the few meetings that undoubtedly took place between them.

"The exact dates are now matters of unaided memory, and do not strike me as material, with regard to credibility merely. It is of course incumbent on the pursuer to prove connection within the period specified on record.

"On consideration of the evidence, I am satisfied of the possibility of access during that period.

"The evidence that opportunity was taken advantage of is very meagre. We have the pursuer's oath to start with, of course, but there is no other evidence of indecent familiarity. In the circumstances, the defender's actings throw light on the probabilities of the case. In the first place, he makes a most unwarranted imputation on a married fellow-servant of the pursuer, which he is unable to support by any evidence whatever. That appears to me rather as if, having to manufacture a defence, he has fallen into the vulgar error of trying to make it more conclusive than he need.

"Then, again, we have the consistent action of the pursuer in immediately sending for the defender on the birth of her child. He came, but instead of accepting or denying the paternity outright, he remains by her bedside for about an hour striving to obtain an admission from the pursuer favourable to himself. I need hardly say that the admissions of a woman only a few hours delivered would not in any case have told hardly against her; but it appears to me, from the defender's own evidence, she told him not what he wanted certainly, but all he was entitled to, when she said that she had no one else to put the child to. . . .

"The pursuer's grandfather struck me as a truthful and honest witness, and his statement that the defender used expressions to imply that he had nothing to do with the pursuer until the May previous to the birth of the

On appeal the Sheriff (Crawford), on 16th March, adhered.*

The defender appealed, and argued;—The pursuer rested her case on one single act of connection, and her story was not corroborated. There was no evidence of suspicious conduct or indecent familiarities between the parties.[1] She had not accused the defender until after the child was born. Greig's evidence, while it corroborated her statement partially, really led to no conclusion adverse to the defender, because according to Greig the pursuer and defender were sitting on the bank on the Sunday in question in a perfectly innocent position. The defender's denial of a fact held by the Court to be proved was not corroboration of anything.[2] child strongly corroborates the view that the defender was anxious to evade a just obligation, for that story of his is obviously untrue.

"On the whole, therefore, I think the pursuer has proved her case."

* "NOTE.—This is a somewhat narrow case, but in my opinion the pursuer is entitled to succeed. Mere opportunity would not by itself supply sufficient corroboration, but there was what may be described as a flirtation between the parties. They renewed an old friendship dating from childhood. The pursuer was knitting a pair of socks for the defender, and he began to pay her visits. It cannot well be believed that these were so short as he represents. The parties were on a footing which might be innocent enough, but it implied a certain degree of intimacy and of mutual attraction, and when it is followed by the birth of a child, and the pursuer's oath as to its paternity, it must be taken into account. The pursuer has fixed a particular day as the date of the sole act of connection, and the defender was entitled to argue that it does not tally with the evidence as to the dates of their previous meetings. I do not see that there is any inconsistency in the pursuer's own evidence, and with regard to that of the other witnesses I agree with the Sheriff-substitute's remarks on the subject, and I do not discover any material contradiction. It may be said that Greig, after the accusation made by the defender against him, which it would be natural for him to resent, cannot be taken as an impartial witness. If he were, his evidence affords exceedingly strong corroboration of that of the pursuer—probably conclusive in the face of the defender's denial. The Sheriff-substitute has said nothing against his credibility. The defender's observation about the period of sunset would have had more force if it had been put to the witness. . . . I do not, however, lay great stress on Greig's evidence.

"On the supposition of the defender's innocence, his conduct in old Macpherson's house after the birth of the child is not easy to account for. His being sent for at all was of course notice that the girl charged him with the paternity. It is not easy to see what his motive was in torturing her with questions for more than an hour in the condition she was in. It looks as if he hoped to extract from her a withdrawal of the charge. But it appears to me rather to point to some unknown circumstance, such as a promise by the girl not to father the child upon him but upon some one else. It does not, in my view, point to the defender's innocence, but the contrary. Further, it is difficult to disbelieve the evidence that he falsely stated on that occasion that he had not met the pursuer till the previous Whitsunday.

"The circumstance in the case which is most unfavourable to the pursuer is that there is no evidence, and it is not alleged, that she acquainted the defender with her condition and his responsibility till the birth of the child, but taken along with the other evidence, that is not sufficient to turn the scale against her."

Argued for the pursuer;—The Sheriffs had believed the pursuer's evidence, and it was corroborated by Greig as to material facts and circumstances. The defender's denial of these was false, and if the Court believed the pursuer and Greig were speaking the truth, then the defender's denial gave a complexion to his evidence which led to the inference that he was concealing something, and that the pursuer's statement as to the essential facts was true. This might be a narrow case, but M'Bayne v. Davidson[1] was narrower.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—No one can read the evidence in this case without seeing that it is a very narrow case indeed. But in such a case as this I should have extreme difficulty in altering the judgment of the Judge who has seen and heard the witnesses. If the Sheriff-substitute had seen the least ground for doubting the truthfulness of the pursuer and the witness Greig that would have appeared from his note, but he, having seen and heard them, has believed that they were speaking the truth. The evidence of these witnesses proves that a meeting took place between the pursuer and the defender on a certain night in December, behind the laundry, and that the pursuer and defender were alone together, and were sitting side by side on a bank. The question is whether that meeting resulted in the defender having connection with the pursuer. It cannot be expected that there should be direct evidence of eyewitnesses to corroborate the pursuer's statement on this point, and, indeed, in cases where such evidence has been brought, it has been often regarded with considerable suspicion. But the defender gives evidence which contradicts statements of fact which are proved by the pursuer and Greig, witnesses whom the Sheriff-substitute heard and believed. I agree that no corroboration can be derived from evidence of the defender which shews he is not speaking the truth. If his evidence is not to be believed it must be taken out of the case altogether, and the case must be treated as if he had not been examined. In that view we have the evidence of the pursuer and of Greig that the pursuer and the defender were together on a certain occasion in circumstances which might not in themselves be sufficient to imply that carnal intercourse took place as an absolute certainty. But if these facts were capable of leading to a certain inference, and if the defender made no answer when that inference was suggested, it is then that that absence of explanation by the defender's evidence would come to be of importance, and in the same way his denial of these facts, which are held to be proved, is significant, as it gives a complexion to them which they might not otherwise bear if explained. I think we ought not to interfere with the judgments of the Sheriffs. I cannot say that there was not evidence before the Sheriff-substitute to entitle him to come to the conclusion at which he has arrived, and I am of opinion that that judgment, upheld as it was by the Sheriff, should not be altered by this Court.

LORD TRAYNER.—It is important in this case to observe that both the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff have decided in favour of the pursuer.

Macpherson v. Largue.

That being so, we would not be justified in interfering with their judgments except upon clear and strong grounds. I agree that in this case there are not sufficient grounds for such a course. I adhere to all that I said in the case of M'Kinven,[1] but applying the rule which I laid down there, not on my own authority, but on the authority of the late Lord President, I think that that rule has been satisfied in this case. In cases of this kind you cannot as a rule have direct independent evidence (that is, evidence by witnesses other than the parties themselves) of the most material fact involved. But even in such cases the evidence of the pursuer by itself is not enough. It must be corroborated as regards one or more of the essential particulars of the case.

On the other hand, the denial by the defender of material facts or circumstances (although not believed) does not corroborate the pursuer's statement. A false statement, or a statement not believed, by whomsoever made, is not corroboration of anything else. But if the pursuer is corroborated as to material statements made by her, and as to which she is contradicted by the defender, his denial, if proved false, or not believed, may give a complexion to the whole evidence, adverse to the defender, different from what it would have borne had his denial not been disbelieved or shewn to be false. Now, I think the pursuer is corroborated in what she says as to certain material circumstances. She says that she and the defender on a certain occasion sat down behind the laundry, on a certain bank, at a place partly surrounded by bushes, and that connection then took place. The defender says he was never there, and never sat down beside the pursuer. But the witness Greig, whose evidence was believed by the Sheriff-substitute (and I see no reason for doubting it) says that he saw the pursuer and the defender sitting together on the bank about the time to which the pursuer speaks. Greig's evidence agrees entirely with that of the pursuer. Now, as I have said, the defender denies all that, and when that denial is believed to be false it tends to shew that there was something about that meeting which the defender wishes to conceal, and that something was done then which he does not want disclosed. But even if that element had been absent in this case I should have regarded the evidence of Greig as sufficient corroboration of the pursuer's statement. I admit that the case is a very narrow one, but nevertheless I am of opinion that we have no ground for altering the judgments appealed against.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. The Sheriff-substitute, who saw and heard the witnesses, believed the pursuer and the witness Greig, and did not believe the defender. I think we have sufficient corroboration of the pursuer's statements to warrant us in finding in her favour. I concur in the reasons for that decision which have been stated by your Lordships.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

Lease—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 7—Compensation for improvements—Notice—Determination of tenancy.—The Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, sec. 7, provides that "a tenant shall not be entitled to compensation under this Act unless four months at least before the determination of the tenancy he gives notice in writing to the landlord of his intention to make a claim for compensation under this Act."

A farm was let for a term of years "with entry at Martinmas 1885," subject to the condition that the tenant should only get possession of the threshing-mill "after the landlord shall have done with using the same in threshing out last year's crop." The conditions of lease provided that no turnips growing on the farm should be sold, but that the whole should be consumed and made down into dung and regularly applied to the lands. It was further provided that the tenant should have right to the barn, threshing-mill, and barnyard, till the "term of Whitsunday, after the termination of the lease, for the purpose of stacking and threshing his way-going crop."

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Low) that "the determination of the tenancy" was at Martinmas, although the tenant was entitled under the lease to remain in occupation of the land under turnips, and to a limited use of the barn and barnyard and threshing-mill after that date, and that notice of a claim for compensation fell to be given by the tenant four months before Martinmas.

1st DIVISION. Lord Low.

THE farm of Gattonside Mains, part of the estate of Gattonside, in the county of Roxburgh, was let to John Waldie in 1885 for nineteen years.

The "conditions of lease" provided, "First, The lease of the farm to be for such number of years as may be agreed upon, with entry at Martinmas 1885. . . . Sixth, The rent which may be agreed on shall be paid in money to the proprietor and his heirs, half-yearly by equal portions at Whitsunday and Martinmas in each year, the first half-yearly payment to be made at Whitsunday 1886, and the second at Martinmas 1886, in full of the first year's rent for possession from Martinmas 1885 to Martinmas 1886. . . . Tenth, The whole lands shall be cultivated, and manured, and cropped in accordance with the rules of good husbandry, under a five-course shift or rotation of crops,—that is to say, he shall have in each year of the lease one-fifth of the lands in oats, after grass; one-fifth of bare fallow, turnips, or potatoes, after oats. . . . Further, no hay, straw, fodder, or turnips growing on the farm shall be sold, but the whole thereof shall be consumed and made down into dung and regularly applied to the lands; declaring, however, that the tenant shall have liberty to sell the rye-grass hay. . . . And the tenant shall be bound to leave to the landlord or incoming tenant the whole straw of his waygoing crop as steelbow, and without payment therefor, the tenant having right to the barn, and threshing-mill, and barnyard till the term of Whitsunday after the termination of the lease for the purpose of stacking and threshing his crop; which crop shall be threshed out in such way, from time to time, as shall at all times afford a sufficient supply of fodder for the stocking of the next tenant. Eleventh, The tenant on getting possession of the threshing-mill, which shall not be until after the landlord shall have done with using the same in threshing out last year's crop, shall be bound to accept of the same as in good and sufficient going order and repair, and shall be bound constantly to keep and, at the expiration of the lease, to leave the same in the like good order and condition. . . . Thirteenth, The tenant and his foresaids shall be bound to flit and remove themselves, their servants, goods, and gear from the houses and lands at the termination of the lease, without any warning or process of removing to that effect."

It was agreed that there should be a break in the lease, on the part of either landlord or tenant, "at the term of Martinmas 1895," provided either party should give written notice to the other of their wish to take advantage of such break "on or before the term of Whitsunday 1895."

In 1887 the proprietor agreed to modify the conditions of the lease to the following effect:—"The tenant shall be at liberty, notwithstanding the conditions of the lease, to sell the turnips growing on the farm at the termination thereof, which turnips shall in the option of the tenant be consumed elsewhere than on the farm."

On 14th May 1895 John Waldie intimated in writing to Henry Mungall, then proprietor of Gattonside, that it was his intention to take advantage of the break at the term of Martinmas 1895. On 26th July Waldie gave notice in writing to Mungall that it was his intention to claim compensation for improvements under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883. Mungall repudiated the claim, on the ground that it had not been intimated four months before the determination of the tenancy, as required by section 7 of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883.

Waldie thereupon raised an action against Mungall, concluding, inter alia, for declarator (2) that the determination of his tenancy, within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, did not take place sooner than the separation from the ground of the turnip and other green crop, in due course of good husbandry, or otherwise sooner than the term of Candlemas 1896; and (3) that the notice given by him of his intention to claim compensation had been duly given four months at least before the determination of the tenancy, and was effectual.

The pursuer averred, inter alia;—"In accordance with the rules of husbandry observed on the Gattonside estate, and according to the practice on similar farms in the district where said farm is situated, the turnip crop of each year is not separated from the ground until a period subsequent to the term of Martinmas. In all cases where, as under the said conditions of lease, the turnip crop falls to be entirely consumed on the farm, the practice is to put sheep, which are being wintered, into the fields laid down with turnips when the turnips have reached maturity, subsequent to Martinmas, and to winter the sheep upon the turnips. Under this practice the consumption of the turnips on the farm extends at least until Candlemas (2d February) subsequent to the Martinmas term, and frequently continues as late as the month of April. Although under said conditions of lease the pursuer's entry to the farm was nominally at Martinmas 1885, the pursuer did not at that date obtain entry to or possession of the land under turnip crop. On 20th November 1885 the proprietors, who, as aforesaid, had at that time the farm in their natural possession, exposed, inter alia, part of the turnip crop to sale by auction, and the remainder of said crop was sold privately by the said proprietors to an adjoining farmer. The conditions of roup for said sale provided that 'the turnips must all be removed on or before the 1st day of February 1886.' This condition was inserted because, according to the rules of husbandry and practice above condescended on, the proprietors, as waygoing tenants, were entitled to retain possession of the land under turnips until Candlemas 1886, and were consequently entitled to transfer their right of occupancy of said land to the parties to whom they sold their turnip crop. These parties occupied the turnip fields during the whole period until Candlemas, and in the case of one field the turnips were not entirely consumed or removed by the purchasers until the end of March 1886, and it was not until that month that the pursuer obtained complete possession of the lands. The pursuer did not obtain possession of the barn, threshing-mill, and barnyard until Whitsunday 1886."

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The determination of the pursuer's tenancy not being until Whitsunday 1896, or at least until Candlemas 1896, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the other (i.e. 2d and 3d) declaratory conclusions. (3) In any view, by virtue of the Removal Terms (Scotland) Act, 1886, the pursuer's tenancy did not determine until 28th November 1895.

The defender pleaded;—(3) The notice of claim for compensation, under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, given by the pursuer to the defender not having been timeous . . . the defender should be assoilzied from the other conclusions of the summons.

On 20th February 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer's notice in writing given to the defender, and dated 26th July 1895, of his, the pursuer's, intention to make a claim for compensation under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act of 1883, referred to in the third conclusion of the summons, was not timeously given, in terms of the said Agricultural Holdings Act, and therefore dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—The question in this case is whether, where there is only one ish in the lease of a farm for all the subjects let, the right of the outgoing tenant at common law to reap the crop on the ground after the termination of the lease is to be regarded as a right to possession of the holding as tenant, to the effect of rendering a claim for compensation for improvements under the Agricultural Holdings Act timeous, although it is not given four months prior to the ish.

"In the pursuer's lease there was only one term of entry, namely, Martinmas, and therefore only one ish. It was argued that there was a separate ish as regarded the barn, barnyard, and threshing-mill, but that is not the case. The right or privilege which the tenant was given to use the barn, barnyard, and threshing-mill is expressed to be 'after the termination of the lease.'

"This case therefore is clearly distinguished from Clay v. Black (21 R. 41, H. L. 72), where three separate periods of entry were specified, and the

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—By section 7 of the Agricultural Holdings Act notice of an intention to claim compensation required to be given four months before the "determination of the tenancy," and that expression was interpreted by section 42 to mean the termination of the lease by reason of the effluxion of time, or any other cause. The question was, When did this lease terminate? According to the criterion adopted by Lord Watson in Black v. Clay,[1] a lease terminated when a tenant finally gave up possession of the subjects which the statute described as his holding. Now, at the beginning of the lease, the pursuer did not obtain possession of the land under turnips until Candlemas 1886, and his right of occupation as regarded the land under turnips in the last year of the lease continued until the crop was consumed. His right was more than a limited privilege to enter on the ground for the purpose of removing the crop, for he could introduce stock to consume the crop on the land, and was entitled to use the land in every way as he had used the land under turnips in the previous years of the lease. For the purposes of the present question Candlemas might be taken as the lease was for nineteen years 'from these periods respectively.' The lease here is also different from that which was construed in Wight v. Earl of Hopetoun (1 Macph. 1097, 2 Macph. (H. L.) 35), which was for nineteen years from the entry, which was 'declared to have been begun as to the grass and houses att Whitsunday 1747, and to the arable land att the separation of the current crop 1747 from the ground.'

"In the latter case a certain notice which had to be given 'at least twelve months before the expiry of the above term of nineteen years,' was held to be too late when given in the month of August preceding the Whitsunday at which the tenant fell to remove from the grass and houses. The true ground of judgment in that case must now be taken (in view of the observations upon it in Clay v. Black) to have been that the terms of the lease when read in the light of the purpose for which the notice was to be given shewed that the parties must have had the earlier term of removal in view in stipulating that twelve months' previous notice must be given. But the majority of the Judges in the Court of Session (led by Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis), and at all events Lord Chancellor Westbury in the House of Lords held it to be a sufficient ground of judgment, that the stipulation that the entry to the arable lands (and consequently the ish) should be at the separation of the crop was no more than a statement of the common law right of an outgoing tenant to reap the crop which he had sown, and that therefore the entry and ish as to all the lands was at Whitsunday, the outgoing tenant having only a limited right of entry and occupation of the land under crop for the purpose of reaping it.

"The soundness of that view was more than doubted by the House of Lords in the case of Clay v. Black. The view taken by the noble and learned Lords in the latter case appears to me to have been this. If a lease bears to be for a period of years from Whitsunday as to grass and houses, and from separation of the crop as to the arable lands, the tenant continues, after the expiry of the lease as regards grass and houses, to possess the arable lands as tenant under the lease, and not merely as the sower of the crop who has a limited right or privilege of entry upon the lands after they have been leased to another for the purpose of reaping the crop.

"The judgment in Clay v. Black was that, in a lease with entries at Whitsunday and separation, the tenant does not require to give notice of a claim under the Agricultural Holdings Act four months before Whitsunday, period at which this right expired, just as in Black v. Clay Martinmas was held to be equivalent to "separation of the crop."[1] The pursuer had right also to another and important part of his holding up to Whitsunday 1896, namely, the barn, barnyard, and threshing-mill. His rights were in fact greater than those of the tenant in Black v. Clay,[1] and fully satisfied the test applied by Lord Watson in that case. Until they ceased the tenancy could not be held to have terminated. The English case of Paul[2] was closely analogous to the present, and the observations of the learned Judges in that case were in point. Wight's[3] case was totally irrelevant in a question of the construction of the statute, for it decided only the construction of a particular clause in a particular contract, and further the views expressed in that case by Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis and Lord Westbury as to the character of the right of an outgoing tenant to reap the crop which he had sown could no longer be considered as sound.

Argued for the defender;—The case was quite distinct from Black v. Clay.[1] There the lease specified three separate terms of entry, and ran "from these periods respectively." Here there was only one term but is in time if he gives the notice four months before Martinmas, which was held to be the term contemplated by the phrase 'separation of the crop.'

"But what of the case of there being only a Whitsunday entry? In that case also the outgoing tenant would be entitled to reap the crop which he had sown. But would he be entitled to reap the crop as tenant? He would not be so if the view taken by the Judges of the Court of Session, and by Lord Westbury, in Wight's case, as to the nature of the right of an outgoing tenant at common law to a waygoing crop is sound. And I do not understand that the soundness of that view was challenged in Clay v. Black. What was challenged was the view that there was no difference between the case of a lease with entry to houses and grass only at Whitsunday, and to the arable lands at separation, and a lease which gives entry to the whole lands at Whitsunday, and leaves the outgoing tenant's right to a waygoing crop to be regulated by the common law. The difference between these two cases I take to be that in the first, the tenant, after removing from the grass and houses, continues in possession of the arable lands, and reaps the crop, under and by virtue of the lease and as tenant; while, in the second case, the lease terminates at Whitsunday, and after that term the outgoing tenant has no possession under the lease or as tenant, but has only a right to reap the crop which he has sown, in accordance with the maxim messis sementem sequitur.

"The case of Clay v. Black did not determine that in the case of a lease, in which there is only one term of entry to all the subjects, a notice by the tenant may be good although it is not given four months prior to that term, and that is a question which must be decided upon a construction of the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, when read in the light of the right of an outgoing tenant at common law to reap the waygoing crop.

"The 7th section of the Agricultural Holdings Act enacts that a tenant shall not be entitled to compensation unless four months 'before the determination of the tenancy' he gives notice to the landlord. The phrase 'determination of the tenancy' is defined to mean 'the termination of the lease by reason of effluxion of time, or from any other cause.'

"Now, if the view taken in the case of Wight as to the nature of the right of a tenant to reap a crop after the ish of the lease is sound, I think that it of entry, Martinmas 1885, and therefore only one date of expiration, Martinmas 1895. The rights of the pursuer after that date to consume the turnips on the land, and to use the barn, barnyard, and threshing-mill, were mere limited rights of occupation not inconsistent with the tenancy terminating at Martinmas.[1] The former right, which was the most important, was merely an application of the common law rule messis sementem sequitur. The soundness of the opinions expressed by Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis and Lord Westbury in Wight[1] as to the character of such a right, after the expiry of a lease, was not questioned in Black v. Clay.[2] Further, in Black's[2] case the tenant continued in possession for the purpose of reaping the corn crop, which was a more important right than that of consuming the turnip crop. Lastly, a lease must have a definite ish. This condition was satisfied in Black's[2] case, for there was authority for the view there adopted that "separation of the crop" signified Martinmas; but there was no authority for holding that the period for consuming the turnip crop expired at Candlemas. The case of Paul[3] was rightly distinguished by the Lord Ordinary.

is plain that where there is only a Whitsunday ish, the lease terminates at that term, which is also the date of the determination of the tenancy. I say that that is the result if the views in Wight's case are sound, because it was argued on the authority of the English case In re Paul (24 Q. B. D. 247) that the common law right of a tenant to reap a waygoing crop must be read into and held as part of the lease. That, however, would not avail, if, as was held in Wight's case, the outgoing tenant's right to reap the crop is only (to use Lord Westbury's words) 'a limited right of entry and occupation for that purpose . . . which is perfectly consistent with the lease commencing as to all the lands at Whitsunday.'

"Further, in the case of a tenant who has only the common law right to enter upon the lands for the purpose of reaping his crop, it seems to me that if the Whitsunday term is disregarded, it is impossible to fix any punctum temporis with reference to which the four months are to be calculated. Where, by express stipulation, the tenant is entitled to possess the arable land until the separation of the crop, that is held to be equivalent to a continuation of the lease until Martinmas, but there is no reason in my opinion for holding that the common law right of an outgoing tenant to reap his crop is practically an extension of his tenancy until Martinmas. Apart from stipulation in the lease, an outgoing tenant has, in my opinion, only such right of entry and possession as is necessary to enable him to ingather his crop. After the crop is ingathered in ordinary course, he has no right whatever in or upon the lands.

"There are two sentences in Lord Watson's judgment in Clay v. Black upon which the pursuer founded as being in his favour. His Lordship said,—'I have come to the conclusion that the "determination of a tenancy," as the expression occurs in sections 2 and 7 of the statute, refers to the time when the tenant finally gives up possession of the subjects which in the statute are described as his "holding." Section 2 is framed upon the assumption that his quittance of his holding, and the determination of his tenancy, are to be in point of time coincident.'

"The pursuer argued that a tenant who has a crop on the ground at the end of the lease does not give up possession until he has reaped the crop,

LORD M'LAREN.—This case raises a question as to the sufficiency of a notice of a claim for improvements under the Agricultural Holdings Act, but under conditions which distinguish the case from Clay v. Black.[1]

The pursuer is tenant of the farm of Gattonside Mains under an informal lease for the period of nineteen years, afterwards reduced to ten years. The missives bear reference to a statement of conditions issued by the proprietor, and the first of these conditions is that the lease shall be for such number of years as may be agreed on, with entry at Martinmas 1885. Unless it can be shewn that this condition is altered or extended by the effect of other conditions agreed on, it would follow that as there is only one term of entry to the farm, there is also one ish, or period of "determination of the tenancy," and that notice of claim ought to be given four months before Martinmas of the last year of possession.

Under the sixth condition the rent is made payable, as is usual in such holdings, in equal moieties at Whitsunday and Martinmas. The tenth con-and that until he has done so, there is, according to Lord Watson's view, no determination of the tenancy.

"Now, what Lord Watson says is, that there is no determination of the tenancy until the tenant gives up possession of his 'holding.' But the word 'holding,' which Lord Watson quotes from the statute, is defined as 'any piece of land held by a tenant.' There is, therefore, no 'holding' in the sense of the statute, unless the person claiming compensation holds a piece of land as tenant. According to the opinions in Wight's case, however, the right of an outgoing tenant to reap a waygoing crop after the ish is not a right to hold a piece of land as tenant, but a right to enter for the sole purpose of reaping a crop upon land which is held by another person as tenant.

"I am therefore of opinion that where a lease comes to an end as regards the whole subjects at Whitsunday, the outgoing tenant must give notice of a claim under the Act at least four months before that term, even although he will have right to enter upon the farm after that term for the purpose of reaping the crop.

"I have been dealing with the case of a Whitsunday ish and the right of an outgoing tenant to reap the corn crop thereafter. I have done so because a Whitsunday ish was the one considered in the leading cases to which I have referred, and also because when the Court have dealt with a tenant's right to reap a crop after the ish it has always been in regard to a corn crop.

"In this case the ish was at Martinmas, and the crop was the turnip crop. I do not, however, think that that makes any difference in the principle applicable. The lease contains the quite common clause prohibiting the sale of turnips off the farm. That clause was altered by the letter of the landlord's agents of 12th May 1887, quoted in the condescendence, by which the pursuer was given the option of selling the turnips off the farm at the termination of the lease. The pursuer, however, was not bound to sell the turnips, but was entitled to exercise his rights in regard to that crop.

"The pursuer avers that the practice in such cases is for the outgoing tenant to consume the turnips upon the land after Martinmas, the understanding being that he has at least until Candlemas to do so. I assume for the purposes of this case that the practice is correctly stated by the purdition contains a provision on which the pursuer founds, viz., that no hay, straw, fodder, or turnips growing on the farm shall be sold, but the whole thereof shall be consumed and made into dung, and regularly applied to the lands. It is not disputed that this provision makes necessary the continued occupation of so much of the farm as was under turnip crop during the last year of the lease, in order that the turnips should be consumed on the farm during the winter months following Martinmas 1885. It is proper to notice that during the currency of the lease the proprietor gave written permission to the tenant to do certain things, and, inter alia, to sell the turnips which should be growing on the farm at the termination of the lease, which turnips should, in the option of the tenant, be consumed elsewhere than on the farm. But this was only a permission, and a mere permission to dispose of the turnips would, of course, not affect the tenant's right to consume the turnips on the land if he pleased.

An argument was also founded on the concluding part of the 10th condition taken in connection with the 11th condition, where it is provided, first, that the outgoing tenant shall have right to the barn and threshingsuer. But it amounts to no more than this, that by custom a tenant under a lease with a Martinmas ish is recognised to have the same right to reap his turnip crop after the ish which a tenant leaving a farm at Whitsunday has to reap his corn crop after that term. The only difference is that, as it is usual to prohibit the sale of turnips off the farm, the only way of reaping the crop (if it is not sold to the incoming tenant) is to eat it with sheep upon the ground. That, however, is a matter of detail, and does not, in my opinion, alter the character of the outgoing tenant's right. He reaps the turnip crop just as a tenant with a Whitsunday ish reaps the corn crop, because he has sown the crop and not because he continues to be tenant under the expired lease.

"Further, in this case, as in the case of a corn crop, the difficulty is to find a punctum temporis prior to which the notice must be given. The pursuer says that Candlemas should be taken. But, upon his own shewing, I do not think that any warrant for fixing upon that term can be found in the statute. The custom which he avers is that 'the consumption of the turnips upon the farm extends at least until Candlemas (2d February) subsequent to the Martinmas term, and frequently continues as late as the month of April.' The custom upon which the pursuer relies, therefore, is for the outgoing tenant to continue possession for a period varying according to circumstances. He is entitled to possess 'at least' until Candlemas, but he may continue until April.

"The English case (In re Paul) to which I have referred was strongly founded on by the pursuer. There a lease expired on the 11th October, but by a custom of the country the tenant was entitled to hold over the possession of the meadow land until the 11th day of the following February. The Court held that the determination of the tenancy did not occur until the latter date. The ground of judgment as stated by Lord Coleridge, C. J., was that the custom must be held to have been incorporated into the lease, and he referred to the custom as one 'by virtue of which the termination of the tenancy might be postponed for a period after the expiration of the notices to quit.'

"Now, if the result of reading the custom into the lease was that the tenant continued to possess a substantial part of his holding as tenant under the lease until a definite and fixed date, the ground of judgment is very clear. But if I am right in the view which I have taken as to the nature of a Scottish tenant's right to reap his crop after the ish, he has, after that mill and barnyard till the term of Whitsunday after the termination of the lease for the purpose of stacking and threshing his crop, and also (art. 11) that the tenant, i.e., the pursuer, shall only get possession of the threshing-mill "after the landlord shall have done with using the same in threshing out last year's crop."

The 13th condition is to the effect that the tenant shall be bound to remove "from the houses and lands" at the termination of the lease without warning or process of removing.

Now, the pursuer has claimed the right of feeding stock on the turnip-fields during the winter months following Martinmas, and it is conceded that if his tenancy was not determined until the turnips were eaten, the notice is sufficient in point of time. And of course if the tenancy is to be taken as prolonged to Whitsunday 1896, when the tenant's right to the use of the barn, threshing-mill, and barnyard came to an end, the notice would be sufficient. But, again, if we are to take it that the tenant obtained entry to the entire and undivided subject at Martinmas 1885, it would follow that his tenancy came to an end at Martinmas 1895, because the lease was only for ten complete years. On this point it is not unimportant to notice that in the letter reducing the duration of the lease to ten years, the expression used is "I agree to there being a break on the part of landlord and tenant in the lease of Gattonside Mains at the term of Martinmas 1895."

We know that where a farm is in part pastoral and in part arable the lease usually specifies two terms of entry, applicable to the respective subjects. In Clay v. Black,[1] where the lease gave entry to the houses and grass lands at Whitsunday, and to the arable lands at the separation of the crop from the ground, your Lordships decided that notice under the Act of Parliament was to be reckoned with reference to the later term of entry and ish, and this decision was affirmed on appeal. In some cases, especially where the farm is chiefly pastoral, the term of entry is Whitsunday, and in such cases it is recognised that as the outgoing tenant is entitled to reap his crop, he has a qualified right of entry on the lands for the purpose. But I am not aware that in such a case it ever has been held that the right of removing the crop has the effect of extending the period of the tenancy until Martinmas. On the contrary, I apprehend that the real right of the incoming tenant with a Whitsunday entry is perfected and completed as to the entire farm when he takes such possession at Whitsunday as the nature date, no possession as tenant; and, according to the pursuer's own averment there is no fixed period within which the reaping or consumption of the crop must be completed. The ground of judgment therefore in Paul's case is not applicable.

"The pursuer also founded upon the Removal Terms (Scotland) Act, 1886. Under that Act, when the term of a tenant's removal is Martinmas, he does not remove from the dwelling-house on the farm until the 28th of November. The date of the term as regards the lands, however, is not altered, and I am of opinion that the fact that under the Act the pursuer was entitled to hold the farmhouse until 28th November did not prevent his tenancy of his holding, within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, coming to an end at the ordinary date."

of the subjects admits of. The outgoing tenant has access to the fields which he has sown for all necessary agricultural operations, but if he entered for any other purpose he would be a trespasser. This, I think, is the import of the judgment of the Court in the case of Gatherer v. Cumming's Executors,[1] and is clearly expressed in the opinion of the Lord President, 8 Macph. 381. I grant that there may not be much practical difference between the use which the outgoing tenant has in such a case as proprietor of the growing crop and the use which a tenant of similar lands may have under his real right where there is a double entry entitling the tenant to retain possession of the fields until Martinmas. But in such cases I think form is substance, and where landlord and tenant have agreed on a certain term of entry with a correlative ish, I know of no legal principle that should persuade a Court of law to prescribe a period of determination of the tenancy different from the period which the parties have prescribed for themselves, or to hold that the limited right of occupation to which I have referred is equivalent to a prolongation of the real right.

Passing from the case which I have used for illustration to the actual case, I see still greater difficulty in accepting the pursuer's proposition that his tenancy was in existence after the term of Martinmas. A lease must come to an end at a definite time, and I do not see how a use of feeding stock on the turnip fields can be taken as a measure of time. The turnips might be consumed within a few weeks after Martinmas, and then the right of occupation would cease, or the feeding might extend to the end of the year, or as suggested in argument until Candlemas. The use of the barn, barnyard for stacking, and threshing-mill is equally indefinite in point of time, with this difference, that Whitsunday is given as the extreme limit of the right of occupation. Then one is impressed with the argument that these are rights of very secondary importance in comparison with the general right of a tenant of arable lands to have his crop retained on the lands until it is ripe for removal, and I do not think that the existence of such limited uses can displace the plain condition of the lease, which provides that the entry shall be at Martinmas.

I have thus been led to adopt the conclusions and the reasoning of the Lord Ordinary, and were it not that our decision may regulate the matter of giving notice under other leases where the term of entry is the same, I should not have thought it necessary to consider the question so minutely. There is one other topic referred to by his Lordship which I must notice—I mean the bearing on this case of the English case of Paul.[2] I agree in the Lord Ordinary's interpretation of that decision that it proceeded on the ground that by custom a tenant might continue to hold a substantial part of his holding for a definite and fixed period after the expiration of the notice to quit. But it is never very safe in a question of real property law to rely on precedents established with reference to a different system of law. I doubt whether we should be able to give such an effect to custom under our law of landlord and tenant even if the custom were proved, because in Scotland the real right of the tenant is measured by the terms of his lease. But if we apply to these conditions the principle that was applied to the local custom in the case of Paul,[1] then I think the pursuer's case fails, because there is no postponement of possession to a definite time. I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

SIR CHARLES HENRY AUGUSTUS FREDERICK LOCKHART ROSS, Pursuer (Respondent).—W. Campbell—Pitman.

DAME REBECCA SOPHIA BARNES OR ROSS, Defender (Reclaimer).—Clyde.

Parent and Child—Legitim—Interest.—Where a son raised an action for payment of legitim thirteen years after his father's death, and election could not, owing to the son's minority, have been made at an earlier date, the Court (diss. Lord Adam) held that the father's executrix was only liable in interest on the son's legitim at the rate which the money would have earned under prudent administration, and found her liable in interest at the rate of 4 per cent, that being the rate which the estate was admitted to have earned.

Bishop's Trustees v. Bishop, March 17, 1894, 21 R. 728, and M'Murray v. M'Murray's Trustees, July 17, 1852, 14 D. 1048, commented on.

Opinion reserved by Lord M'Laren as to the rate of interest chargeable where the right of legitim can be immediately determined, but where the claim is allowed to lie over without fault on either side.

Observed by Lord M'Laren,—"There is at present no statutory rate of legal interest; 5 per cent was only a maximum rate, and there is no statutory rule obliging the Court to award 5 per cent in perpetuity. It may not be beyond the powers of the Court to reduce the rate usually awarded in case of a permanent fall in the rate of interest obtainable in this country."

1ST DIVISION. LdStormonth-Darling.

ON 15th January 1894 Sir Charles Ross, of Balnagown, who had attained majority in the preceding April, brought an action against his mother, Lady Ross, as sole executrix and universal intromitter with the moveable estate of his father, for payment of the amount due to him as legitim, with legal interest from 26th July 1883, the date of his father's death.

The parties by joint minute concurred in admitting that the nett value of the personal estate left by the late Sir Charles Ross was £32,537, and the only question in dispute between them was as to the rate of interest to which the pursuer was entitled on the legitim due to him. The facts bearing on that question are stated by Lord M'Laren in the second paragraph of his opinion (infra, p. 804).

On 19th November 1895, the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Decerns against the defender for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £16,268 sterling, in full of the petitory conclusion of the summons, with interest thereon as concluded for: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.*

[1] L. R., 24 Q. B. D. 247.

* "NOTE.—I feel bound by practice and decision to give decree for interest at 5 per cent from the date of death, but my own view is very strongly in favour of reducing the rate of interest in cases like this where it is impossible that anything approaching 5 per cent can have been earned, and where the facts do not raise a plea of mora. Such a departure from practice, however, is rather for the Inner than for the Outer-House."

Ross v. Ross.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—It was admitted that legitim was a claim of debt, and that interest was due upon it. Ex lege there was an implied obligation to pay interest on money received in loan,[1] and the foundation of the claim for interest in the present case was the same as in loan. There was, however, no fixed rule that interest at the rate of 5 per cent was due either on claims of legitim or on other debts. The last case in regard to legitim was that of Bishop's Trustees,[2] in which 5 per cent was allowed, but in that case the question of interest was of little importance, as the claim was made soon after the father's death, and the Court proceeded entirely upon the supposed authority of the case of M'Murray.[3] In M'Murray[3] there was no reference to the rate of interest, except in the interlocutor where the phrase "legal interest" was used, the question of the rate of interest was not discussed, and the fund had been invested in trade, and had earned more than 5 per cent. The only other decision in regard to a claim for legitim was a decision by Lord Fraser,[4] who allowed interest at the rate of 5 per cent, but on the express ground that there had been delay in making payment. In analogous cases the rate of interest allowed varied. Thus in claims by a wife's representatives for a share of the goods in communion 5 per cent from the wife's death had been allowed in one case,[5] while in another interest had only been allowed from the date when the claim was made.[6] Again in the case of a claim for jus relictæ only interest at the rate earned had been given.[7] So also in the case of legacies there was no fixed rule that 5 per cent must be allowed.[8] Nor was interest at that rate necessarily given in all cases of debt.[9] Indeed, in some cases no interest was due until a claim was made.[10] The cases in regard to claims analogous to claims for legitim shewed that when there had been no delay in making payment only such rate would be allowed as had actually been earned. In the present case every consideration of equity was in favour of not mulcting the executrix in a larger amount of interest than the funds had earned in her hands. She was willing that the rate of interest so earned should be taken to be 4 per cent, although that rate exceeded the actual return. Assuming that there had in the past been a rule to the effect that 5 per cent interest was exigible on claims of legitim, it was within the power of the Court to take into account the great fall which had taken place in the general rate of interest, and to alter the rule so as to bring it into conformity with the changed circumstances of the present day.

Ross v. Ross.

Argued for the pursuer;—Legitim was a claim of debt, and there was a fixed rule, from which the Court would not depart, that interest at the rate of 5 per cent was due upon such a claim from the date when it became due, the funds having in the meantime been used, and, it might be, put in peril by the debtor.[1] There were no particular circumstances to take this case out of the general rule, If the executrix had set apart and earmarked her son's legitim, perhaps the case would have been different.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—In this action the pursuer claims legitim with the legal interest thereof from 26th July 1883, being the date of his father's death. I am not sure whether this is an irrevocable election on his part to take legitim in preference to the heritable estate; but in any view it is proper that the value of the legitim should be judicially ascertained, so that the pursuer may be in a position to consider his course, if it is still open to him to do so. The Lord Ordinary has decerned in his favour for the principal sum of £16,268, 18s. 9d., with interest at the rate of five per cent as concluded for—that is for a period of nearly thirteen years reckoned from the father's death. This interest would amount to about sixty-five per cent, or very nearly two-thirds of the principal sum sued for. His Lordship, in a brief note, gives the weight of his opinion in favour of applying a lower rate of interest to such cases, but states that, sitting alone, he feels bound by practice to allow interest at five per cent.

The facts which raise this question may be stated in a sentence. Sir Charles Ross's father left his unentailed lands to his son, burdened with a liferent in favour of his widow, and he left all his personal estate to his widow, who was also, in the events which happened, sole trustee and guardian of her pupil son. It could not be known at the time of the father's death whether after the son should come of age it would be more for his advantage to take the heritable estate or the legitim. The result might depend on whether Lady Ross was alive at her son's majority, and on her expectation of life at that time. Even if a good actuarial estimate could have been made, Lady Ross had not the power to elect for her son, and the son had not the power to elect for himself effectually until he became of full age, because the election to take legitim involved the alienation of the heritable estate, and such an election might have been reduced on the ground of minority and lesion.

In such circumstances all that could be done by Lady Ross for the conservation of her son's rights was to keep the personal estate, or at least one moiety of it, safely invested for his benefit should he choose to claim it at the proper time. This has been done, and on the mere statement of the facts it is evident that Lady Ross was in the position of a depositary of this fund, having no duty in relation to it except that of the safe keeping of the principal sum, and of such interest as it might produce when safely invested If it could be shewn that the fruits of the personal estate amounted to five per cent per annum, or sixty-five per cent in the period of thirteen years, I see no reason to doubt that the pursuer would be entitled to what he claims. But his case is that he is entitled to receive five per cent as on a debt, while Lady Ross contends that she is only liable for such interest as the legitim fund, if safely invested, could produce. It is assumed that four per cent may be taken as representing on a fair estimate the actual income or produce of the fund.

Now, it is undoubtedly the fact that interest at five per cent has been generally allowed on claims of legitim and on claims by a wife's representatives to a share of goods in communion under a law which is now repealed. The case of a claim by a wife's representatives for a share of goods in communion could not raise a question of election, and is not very much in point. But when the decisions are examined with reference to interest on legitim claims, it will be found that they are no more conclusive than cases of the other class, because, with the exception of the recent case of Bishop's Trustees v. Bishop,[1] they are all cases where there was either no election or where the election might have been made at the opening of the succession.

Now, it may very well be that if a son or daughter is disinherited and has no claim except under the law of legitim, the testamentary representatives ought to be treated as in mora for not immediately settling the claim. In such a case interest would be due as in any other case of the withholding payment of a just debt. The same principle may be held, but I think with less reason, to apply to a case where there is an election between legal and testamentary provisions, but the claimant is of age and may be called on to declare his election.

In the case of Bishop,[1] the vesting of the rights under the father's will was suspended for the period of one year after the father's death, and the action was heard in Court in the following year. The question of the rate of interest was very unimportant, because it was only the interest of one year, and the Court simply followed the case of M'Murray,[2] without, as far as we can judge from the report, having its attention drawn to the peculiarity of the case, where the action of the trustees is suspended and the election cannot be immediately made. But in M'Murray's[2] case the question was whether the child claiming legitim was entitled to profits which it was assumed would exceed five per cent per annum. The question was not raised whether the liability of the persons administering the legitim fund might be limited to the interest obtained from a safe investment, and this question could not well be raised, because the facts were that the money had been invested in trade and had produced more than five per cent. It therefore appears to me that we are in a position to consider the question I have stated without being bound by authorities, although of course the decisions referred to may be very good authority for giving five per cent in a case where legitim is withheld from a child who is entitled to it.

It has often been said, and I think it is a rule of law, that interest is only due where there is either a contract to pay interest or a duty to invest, or in respect of morata solutio. The present case in my opinion falls under the second category, and the defender is only accountable for such interest or income as the money would have produced if safely invested. I should also wish to reserve my opinion as to the rate of interest chargeable where the right to legitim can be immediately determined but where the claim is allowed to lie over without fault on either side. After all, there is at present no statutory rate of legal interest; five per cent was only a maximum rate, and there is no statutory rule obliging the Court to award five per cent in perpetuity. It may not be beyond the powers of the Court to reduce the rate usually awarded in case of a permanent fall in the rate of interest obtainable in this country.

LORD ADAM.—It is admitted in this case that legitim is one of that class of debts which bears interest, and the only question before us is, what is the amount of interest which should be allowed. For myself I am of opinion that we ought to adhere to what is the customary rate of interest for a debt. I do not think that it is relevant to inquire in such a case what the party who is debtor has done, or might have done, with the same. I therefore differ in opinion from Lord M'Laren, and think that we ought to adhere to the customary amount of interest payable on this debt—that being 5 per cent.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have come to the same conclusion as Lord M'Laren, and for substantially the same reasons. I do not dispute that legitim is a debt which bears interest, and that an executor therefore is not exactly in the position of a trustee holding money of the child, but is liable in the deceased's place to satisfy the child's claim for legitim. But then it does not appear to me that any question of interest can be safely or equitably decided without reference to the circumstances in which it is raised. It appears in this case that the executrix has been for thirteen years in the possession of the entire personal estate of the deceased, and that she has had every reason to believe it her own, if not from the first, at least for many years. The son has nevertheless the right to make the claim now, and the executrix is bound to have funds to meet it. But the debt was not payable until the pursuer had made his election between his legal rights and his rights under the will. The executrix therefore was not in mora, and it is not suggested that in the reasonable administration, I do not say of a trust-estate, but of her own affairs, she would have earned 5 per cent interest, and therefore a decision which should have the result, as Lord M'Laren has said, of compelling her to pay a sum equal to two-thirds of the entire sum claimed in addition to the amount of the claim itself, would, in my opinion, be in the highest degree inequitable. It would really be imposing a penalty upon her for an administration of the estate which she had no power to prevent. She had no power to accelerate the election, or in the meantime to earn interest at the rate of 5 per cent, and I see no reason why the pursuer should benefit at the expense of the executrix by reason of his own delay. It is enough that he should not be prejudiced. I think it would not be according to justice to compel her to pay in name of interest a larger sum than she might reasonably have obtained from a prudent administration of the estate.

I agree with Lord Adam that we should not, in matters of this kind, depart from the fixed rules of practice, but I also agree, from the examination of the cases which Lord M'Laren has made, that there is no fixed rule as to the interest due on claims of legitim to prevent us from giving effect to equitable considerations in exceptional circumstances. No. 160. June 16, 1896. Ross v. Ross.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred with LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR.

THE COURT altered the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and found the defender liable in interest at the rate of 4 per cent.

No. 161. June 16, 1896.* Shirrefs v. Shirrefs.

Husband and Wife—Aliment—Process—Competency of decerning for aliment in pending action of separation and aliment after decree of divorce at instance of wife.—A wife, after obtaining an interim award of aliment in an action of separation and aliment against her husband, raised an action of divorce against him, and obtained decree therein. She then, in the action of separation and aliment, moved for decree for a further sum in name of aliment. Except the sum paid under the interim award she had received nothing from her husband in name of aliment pending the actions, and she alleged that she had been alimented by third parties.

The Court refused the motion as incompetent, in respect that there could be no decerniture for aliment in an action of separation and aliment after the parties had been divorced, an action of separation and aliment proceeding on the assumption that the parties were husband and wife.

ON 29th November 1895 Mrs Elizabeth Taylor Cree or Shirrefs raised an action of separation and aliment against her husband, John Gordon Lumsden Shirrefs, of Knowsie, Aberdeenshire. 2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

In this action, on 7th January 1896, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) decerned against the defender for payment of £20 in name of aliment, and of £20 in name of expenses.

Thereafter Mrs Shirrefs raised an action for divorce against her husband, and on 27th February 1896 the diet of proof in the action of separation was discharged.

On 24th March 1896 decree of divorce was pronounced.

On 12th May Mrs Shirrefs moved in the action of separation and aliment for decree for payment of a further sum in name of aliment. There had been no decree for aliment in her favour, either in the action of separation and aliment or in the action of divorce, since the decree of 7th January, and no procedure had taken place in the former action since the interlocutor of 27th February discharging the diet of proof.

On the same day the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel on the pursuer's motion for payment of an additional sum in name of aliment, refuses the motion, and in respect of the decree of divorce in the action between the parties, dismisses this action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses, under deduction of the expenses already allowed," &c.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The defender's obligation to aliment his wife during the dependence of the actions was clear, and it was equally clear that payment of £20 was not complete implement of that obligation. The action of divorce was now at an end, and no further step consequently could be taken in it; but the action of separation and aliment was still in Court, and although decree of separation would now be inept—decree of divorce having been pronounced—there was nothing incompetent in granting decree for a further sum in name of aliment. The decree of divorce had been pronounced in vacation, and the pursuer had taken the earliest opportunity thereafter of moving for decree for aliment. This was not a demand for arrears of aliment, as was the case in Macmillan v. Macmillan,[1] nor was it an attempt to continue the husband's liability for aliment after decree of divorce had been pronounced as in Donald v. Donald.[2] The pursuer having been alimented by third parties, the defender was liable in repayment in some form of process, and it avoided multiplicity of action to proceed in the action of separation and aliment.

Argued for the defender;—On the decree of divorce being pronounced the pursuer's right to payment of aliment from the defender terminated. The present motion would have been plainly out of the question in the action of divorce, that action being at an end. Technically the action of separation and aliment was still in Court, but decree of separation could not now be pronounced, the parties having been divorced, and that being so, the conclusion for aliment fell equally, being ancillary to the conclusion for separation. If the defender was liable to third parties for sums advanced on account of the aliment of the pursuer, it was for these parties to bring forward their claims.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is in rather a curious position. The pursuer raised an action of separation against the defender. While she was pursuing that action, she discovered that she had grounds for an action of divorce. Accordingly she brought an action of divorce, and in that action she has obtained decree against the defender, and the action is now finally disposed of, and is out of Court. But she now appears in the action of separation to ask for aliment. In the course of that action, on 7th January 1896, she obtained a decree for £20 in name of aliment. But since that date she has got no further decree for aliment, either in this action or in the action of divorce. Having given the case the best consideration I can, I have come to the conclusion that there is no ground for altering the Lord Ordinary's judgment. If, as we are informed, this lady received any necessary supplies during the litigation, the persons who supplied her necessities have means for recovering their outlay from the defender. But such persons are not entitled to be aided in recovering their advances by decree in an action which assumes, as the essential condition of its competency, that the pursuer and defender are married persons, at a time when they have ceased to be married to one another.

LORD YOUNG, LORD TRAYNER, and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

Entail—Direction to entail—Succession—Condition—Direction to entail "on my heirs so long as the estate of C. is theirs"—Clause of devolution.—Robert Moubray died in 1875, leaving a holograph will, by which he directed his trustees to accumulate the income of his estate until it reached £41,000, and with the accumulated sum to purchase lands "as near to the estate of Cockairnie as possible, and as strictly as the law of Scotland will allow to entail such lands purchased as above on my heirs direct or collateral so long as the estate of Cockairnie is theirs."

At the date of this will the estate of Cockairnie belonged in fee-simple to William Moubray, the immediate younger brother of the testator.

William Moubray died in 1885, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated in 1879, by which he directed his trustees to hold the estate of Cockairnie for the use and behoof of Captain Moubray, his eldest son, and the heirs of Captain Moubray's body, whom failing of his second and other sons in their order respectively, and the heirs of their bodies respectively, subject to the condition, inter alia, that in respect that he, William Moubray, was next heir to the estates of Upwood and Woodwalton in England, and that it was his wish that the heir who should succeed after him to these estates should not also take the estate of Cockairnie, his trustees were to convey Cockairnie to the child who might be entitled thereto other than the heir who should succeed to Upwood and Woodwalton.

At the adjustment of a deed of entail after the £41,000 had been accumulated, the younger brother of Captain Moubray, and the first substitute under the Cockairnie trust, contended that—having regard (1) to Robert Moubray's clearly expressed intention that the lands to be purchased should be possessed along with the lands of Cockairnie, and (2) to the fact that Cockairnie was held upon a title which provided for a devolution of that estate from the heir in possession to the next heir in the event of the former succeeding to the estates of Upwood and Woodwalton—the trustees in framing a deed of entail of the estates to be purchased were bound to insert a clause of devolution to the same effect to secure that the lands to be purchased should be possessed along with Cockairnie. Held that no clause of devolution fell to be inserted.

Res Judicata—Opinion of Court on point not debated or determined by interlocutor.—The opinion of the Court, expressed at advising, on a question not argued by the parties, and not referred to in the interlocutor of the Court, held not to foreclose the parties from subsequently raising the question for judgment.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

Robert Frederick North Bickerton Moubray, who resided at Cockairnie, Fife, an estate belonging to his younger brother, William Hobson Moubray, of Otterston and Cockairnie, died without issue, on 31st March 1875, leaving certain testamentary writings.

By the first of these writings, which bore date 10th June 1867, Mr Moubray, inter alia, directed his estate to be accumulated until it amounted to £40,000, when the trustees were directed to "buy lands in Fife in the western district, or as near the estate of Cockairny as may be, and entail said lands on my nearest of kin in the strictest way admissible by the law of Scotland."

Another writing bore dates 18th November 1867 and 18th November 1868, and was in these terms:—"Should the estate of Cockairny be no longer in the possession of my relatives by blood in regular succession when the forty or forty-five thousand pounds have accumulated, I desire that sum may be devoted to the purchase of land as near to the estate of Upwood, Hunts, as may be, and such lands to be strictly entailed on the possessor of the lands of Upwood and Wood Walton in the same manner according to the law of England, as correspondingly it would have been if invested in lands adjacent to Cockairny, Fife, as above."

A third writing was dated 30th April 1868, and ran thus:—"This is my last will and testament. I beg Messrs Coutts & Co., London, will continue to reinvest twice a-year any balance in their hands on the conditions if necessary of keeping ten pounds at the disposal of my trustees in their hands; and when the sum invested, always investing in the security on which the dividend is about to be paid, shall be sufficient to realise forty-one thousand pounds, my trustees shall have power to realise through Messrs Coutts & Co. that sum, and to take a present opportunity of investing that sum in lands in the county of Fife, as near to the estate of Cockairny as possible, and as strictly as the law of Scotland will allow to entail such lands purchased as above on my heirs direct or collateral, so long as the estate of Cockairny is theirs. When it is not any longer in the possession of the Moubrays, the estate, purchased as above, may become the hereditament of the Hussey family of Woodwalton, Herts, always provided the family of Moubray of Cockairny no longer exists in Scotland, having become extinct, and the name in this latter case to be adopted by Hussey shall as regards the lands to be acquired as above be 'Hussey Moubray.' My trustees shall be my three nearest relatives, the youngest to be umpire. I name my nearest male relative my heir, and bequeath to him as heirlooms the gold chain given by my grandfather," &c.

The testator left moveable estate amounting to about £20,000, but no heritage.

On 14th February 1894 an action of multiplepoinding, which had been raised by the trustees under the foregoing settlement for the determination of conflicting claims to the estate, but which had been allowed to fall asleep in consequence of an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) to the effect that it was premature to determine the questions raised until the expiration of twenty-one years from the death of the testator, or until the accumulated fund amounted to £41,000, was wakened, the sum of £41,637 having been accumulated, and condescendences and claims were lodged of new, the fund in medio being the sum of £41,637, with interest thereafter accruing.

The leading question raised was whether the testamentary papers above quoted contained an effectual direction to entail.

From a joint minute of admissions lodged in the Inner-House after the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 30th October 1894 after mentioned, the following facts appeared bearing on that question and on the subsequent question now reported:—

"The lands of Cockairnie in the west of Fife form the ancient family estate of the Moubrays of Cockairnie. They were possessed at the commencement of this century by Sir Robert Moubray, who in 1814 acquired the adjacent lands of Otterston, and thereafter possessed Cockairnie and Otterston as one estate. There is a mansion-house upon each. He died on 10th October 1848.

"Sir Robert's younger brother, Richard Hussey Moubray succeeded to the lands of Upwood and Woodwalton, in the county of Huntingdon, and took the name of Hussey Hussey, and as Sir Richard Hussey Hussey he possessed them under an English entail until his death in 1842, when he was succeeded by his son Richard Hussey Hussey, now the heir in possession. The present proprietor of the English estates was thus the nephew of Sir Robert Moubray and first cousin of the testator Robert Frederick North Bickerton Moubray (who was Sir Robert's eldest son), and he was in possession of Upwood and Woodwalton when the testator wrote his testamentary deeds. Under the English entail it is understood that, failing issue of Mr Richard Hussey Hussey (who is unmarried, and is believed to be about eighty years of age), the testator would have succeeded to the English estates if he had survived.

"On the death of Sir Robert Moubray in 1848, it was found that he had left the estate of Cockairnie and Otterston, which he held in fee-simple, to trustees, with directions to secure to his wife, and after her death to his unmarried daughters, the liferent of the mansion-house of Cockairnie, and to convey his estates (passing over his eldest son, the testator, for whom he provided otherwise) to his second son, William Hobson Moubray, and the lawful issue of his body; whom failing, to his youngest son and daughters in their order. He directed that, in the event of the estate of Woodwalton devolving upon his son William Hobson Moubray, his lands of Cockairnie and Otterston should go to his youngest son, it being his wish that his estates in Fife should not be united with the estate of Woodwalton. His trustees in 1851 conveyed the estates to his son William Hobson Moubray accordingly with this destination and direction. In 1867 William Hobson Moubray conveyed the estates to himself, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, free of any condition relating to the devolution of the estates. He was thus fee-simple proprietor of the Scotch estate when the testator (his elder brother) wrote his testamentary deeds.

"William Hobson Moubray was in possession of the estates when the present action was raised, and died in 1885, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement," dated 4th July 1879. "In terms of article 7 thereof his trustees now hold the estates of Otterston and Cockairnie for the use and behoof of his eldest son, Captain William Henry Hallowell Carew Moubray, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, of his second or other sons in their order respectively, and the heirs-male of their bodies respectively, subject to the liferent use by the sole surviving daughter of Sir Robert Moubray of the mansion-house of Cockairnie, and to the liferent use by the widow of William Hobson Moubray of the mansion-house of Otterston, and also subject to the condition that in respect that William Hobson Moubray was the next heir to the estates of Upwood and Woodwalton, and that it was his wish that the heir who should succeed after him to these estates should not also take the estates of Otterston and Cockairnie, his trustees are to convey Otterston and Cockairnie to the child who may be entitled thereto, other than the heir who shall succeed to Upwood and Woodwalton."

Captain William H. H. C. Moubray "is married. There are six younger sons of William Hobson Moubray surviving.

"William Hobson Moubray would, it is understood, have succeeded to the English estates had he survived Mr Richard Hussey Hussey, his first cousin, and" Captain William H. H. C. Moubray "is now believed to be the next heir entitled to succeed."

Captain William H. H. C. Moubray lodged a claim in which he maintained that the testamentary papers now in question contained no effectual direction to entail, and as heir-at-law of the testator he claimed payment of the fund in medio.

Arthur Moubray, William Hobson Moubray's second surviving son, on the other hand, maintained primo loco that the direction to entail was valid and effectual, and claimed "that the fund in medio shall be invested by the trustees in the purchase of lands as directed by the truster's settlement, and that the said lands should be settled by deed of entail at the sight of the Court upon Captain William Henry Hallowell Carew Moubray and the heirs of his body, whom failing, the present claimant and the heirs of his body, whom failing, the nearest in kindred of the truster, in terms of the directions of the truster, or at all events that the said lands should be so settled as to be beyond the disposal of the said Captain William Henry Hallowell Carew Moubray."

On 30th October 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, finds (1) that the late Robert Frederick North Bickerton Moubray by his testamentary writings, whereof No. 13 of process is an official copy or extract, directed that his funds should be accumulated until they reached the sum of £41,000, and that the accumulated sum should be invested in the purchase of lands in the county of Fife, as near the estate of Cockairnie as possible, and that such lands should be entailed: (2) That the said funds have now reached the said sum, and that the time for purchasing said lands and executing said entail has arrived: (3) That the said testamentary writings import a direction to entail the lands when purchased on the heirs in heritage of the testator, being the heirs of his blood in the order of heritable succession: (4) That the destination so directed is a valid and effectual tailzied destination: (5) That the deed of entail falls to be executed in favour of the claimant Captain William Henry Hallowell Carew Moubray, as institute, and the heirs of his body, whom failing, in favour of the claimant Arthur Moubray, and the heirs of his body, whom failing as may be hereafter determined: Therefore repels (1) the claim for the said Captain William Henry Hallowell Carew Moubray," and certain other claims: "Sustains the principal claim for the said Arthur Moubray, No. 28 of process, so far as consistent with the foresaid findings: Appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure: Grants leave to reclaim."

In his opinion the Lord Ordinary expressed the view that in the deed of entail to be executed there should be no clause of devolution founded on the words "so long as the estate of Cockairnie is theirs" in the paper of 30th April 1868.

Captain Moubray reclaimed.

On 26th June 1895 the Court pronounced an interlocutor, which simply refused the reclaiming note, adhered to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed therein as accorded; but the opinion of Lord Rutherfurd Clark, which (in his Lordship's absence) was read by the Lord Justice-Clerk as the opinion of the Court, concluded with the following paragraph:—"Of course the entail will contain a clause of devolution, by which, in the event of the heir in possession succeeding to the English estates, the estate shall devolve on the next heir who takes the estate of Cockairny."

Thereafter the trustees lodged a draft of a proposed deed of entail containing, inter alia, the following clause:—"But providing and declaring always that whereas it was the wish and intention of the said Robert Frederick North Bickerton Moubray that the lands directed by him to be purchased and entailed as aforesaid should be permanently held and enjoyed along with the estate of Cockairnie in the county of Fife so long as the latter estate should be in the possession of any member of the Moubray family. And whereas the said deceased William Hobson Moubray was the last heir in possession of the said estate of Cockairnie, and the same is now held by the trustees acting under his settlement for behoof of his eldest son and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing of his second or other sons in their order respectively, and the heirs-male of their bodies respectively, but subject to this direction, that upon the succession opening to the estates of Upwood and Woodwalton, in the county of Huntingdon, to which he, the said William Hobson Moubray, was the next heir of entail, his trustees should convey his estates of Otterston and Cockairnie to the child who should be entitled thereto under the destination contained in his said settlement, and above narrated, other than the heir who should succeed to the said estates of Upwood and Woodwalton, and to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of such child. Therefore in case the institute or any one of the heirs of entail called to the succession of the lands and estate hereby conveyed by virtue hereof shall succeed to the said lands and estates of Upwood and Woodwalton upon the failure of Richard Hussey Hussey, the present proprietor thereof, and any son or sons he may leave, then and in that case the said lands and estate hereby conveyed shall immediately descend to and devolve upon the person who being an heir called to succeed thereto under the destination before written shall also be the person to whom the said estates of Otterston and Cockairnie are to be conveyed under the settlement of the said William Hobson Moubray, and the institute or heir of entail so succeeding to the lands and estates of Upwood and Woodwalton shall be bound immediately upon so succeeding to denude and divest himself or herself of the said lands and estates hereby conveyed in favour of the person entitled thereto as above mentioned. But the said institute or heir of entail shall have the same power or right of election (if any) between the said estates of Upwood and Woodwalton and the lands and estate hereby conveyed as may be competent to him with regard to the said estates of Otterston and Cockairnie."

Captain Moubray objected to any clause of devolution being inserted.

Arthur Moubray maintained that for the words printed in italics the following should be substituted:—"Therefore in terms of the direction contained in the testamentary writings of the said Robert Frederick North Bickerton Moubray, and his intention that the lands and estate above disponed shall be held along with the estate of Cockairnie and Otterston, it is hereby provided and declared that in case the institute or any one of the heirs of entail called to the succession of the lands and estate hereby conveyed by virtue of these presents, who would have been the heir entitled to a conveyance of the said estates of Cockairnie and Otterston from the trustees of the said William Hobson Moubray, shall succeed to the said lands of Upwood and Woodwalton and be thereby debarred from demanding a conveyance of the said estates of Cockairnie and Otterston, then and in that case the heir so succeeding shall, for himself and the heirs of his body, forfeit all right to the lands hereby conveyed, and the said lands and estate hereby conveyed shall immediately descend to and devolve upon the person who being an heir called to succeed thereto under the destination before written shall also be the person to whom the said estates of Cockairnie and Otterston shall fall to be conveyed, in the same manner as if the heir succeeding to Upwood and Woodwalton as aforesaid, and the heirs of his body, had all deceased, and the institute or heir of entail so succeeding to the said lands and estate of Upwood and Woodwalton shall be bound immediately upon so succeeding to denude and divest himself or herself of the said lands and estate hereby conveyed in favour of the heir of entail of the lands and estate hereby disponed, who shall then be entitled to receive the conveyance of the said estates of Cockairnie and Otterston from the trustees of the said William Hobson Moubray."

On 4th December 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the arguments for the parties in the Procedure-roll with reference to the terms of the proposed deed of entail No. 44 of process, submitted by the pursuers, and of which No. 45 of process is a print, and the alterations suggested by Captain Moubray and by Arthur Moubray respectively, as shewn on No. 46 of process, finds (1) that the clause of devolution inserted in said form falls to be deleted," as also certain other clauses, "and, subject to these corrections, approves of said form as the form of the deed to be executed by the pursuers in fulfilment of the direction given by the deceased Robert Frederick North Bickerton Moubray in his testamentary writing dated 30th April 1868, and referred to in the interlocutors pronounced in the cause of dates 30th October 1894 and 26th June 1895: Appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure: Grants leave to reclaim." *

* "OPINION.—In this case, by interlocutor of 30th October 1894, I found that Robert Moubray, who resided at Cockairny, Fifeshire, and who died on 31st March 1875, had directed that certain funds should be invested in the purchase of lands as near the estate of Cockairny as possible, and that his testamentary writings imported a direction to entail the lands when purchased 'on the heirs in heritage of the testator, being the heirs of his blood in the order of heritable succession.' I reached the conclusion that that was the destination directed on a construction of the whole of Mr Moubray's testamentary writings, all of which had, by a previous interlocutor pronounced by Lord M'Laren on 13th July 1883, been decided to be his 'testamentary acts.'

"My interlocutor was taken to review, and the opinion of the Court was delivered by Lord Rutherfurd Clark, who reached the same conclusion, but proceeded on only one of the testamentary writings, that dated 30th April 1868, which his Lordship conceived to be 'the only existing will.' But Lord M'Laren's judgment was not altered, and my interlocutor was affirmed simpliciter.

"The case has been enrolled for the adjustment of the deed of entail to be executed by Mr Robert Moubray's trustees. No estate has been purchased, and it is possible that no suitable estate may be in the market for some time—it may be for some years. But it was represented that the terms of the deed of entail directed ought now to be adjusted, because of the provisions of the 27th section of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848, to the effect that money vested in trust for the purchase of land to be entailed may be disentailed. The institute, Captain Moubray, maintains that he is entitled to be put in a position which will, he says, enable him, if he thinks proper, to acquire the money, or part of it, in fee-simple, and that he cannot do so until the terms of the deed of entail to be granted, and in particular of the destination, are adjusted. It appears to me that the contention

Arthur Moubray reclaimed, and argued;—The question was practically settled by the judgment of the Court of 26th June 1895, although technically it might not be res judicata. But even considering the question de novo the result was the same. What the testator intended was that the lands which he directed to be purchased and entailed should belong to Moubray of Cockairnie in perpetuity so long as there was a Moubray of Cockairnie; and a clause of devolution was necessary to secure that result. The testator had not in terms directed that such a clause should be inserted, but if his intention was clear the trustees were entitled and bound to insert the necessary clauses.

Argued for Captain Moubray;—Notwithstanding the former judgment of the Court, the Lord Ordinary had rightly regarded the question as still open; and further, his interlocutor now before the Court was well founded. If the words "so long as the estate of Cockairnie is theirs" imported a continuing condition at all, they meant that if Cockairnie ceased to belong to the Moubray family through any cause, the estate was to pass to the family of Hussey of Woodwalton.

thus stated by Captain Moubray is well founded, and that it is proper that the deed be now adjusted, notwithstanding that no lands have been purchased to which it can be applied.

"The trustees have lodged a draft of the deed which they suggest. Since the debate that draft deed has been printed, and I have also been furnished by the parties with a print of it, on which are shewn the modifications suggested on the one part by Captain Moubray, the institute, and on the other part by Arthur Moubray, who is at present the first substitute. The parties have not expressed a desire to be reheard on these prints, and, as the deed must doubtless be ultimately adjusted in the Inner-House, I think it unnecessary to order such a rehearing.

"The main question relates to a suggested clause of devolution. By the testamentary writing dated 30th April 1868 Mr Robert Moubray directed his trustees to execute a deed of entail of the lands to be purchased on his heirs, direct or collateral, 'so long as the estate of Cockairny is theirs'; and when the case was debated before me at first the question was raised, whether, in order to give effect to that qualification a clause of devolution or other conditional clause should be inserted. There appeared to me to be great difficulty in inserting such a clause. I came to think that the clause ought to be read as referring to the point of time when the deed fell to be executed, and as practically meaning—if the estate of Cockairny is theirs. I thought that construction justified by the testamentary writings read together, and I therefore expressed the opinion that the deed of entail should not contain any clause of devolution. But the interlocutor which was affirmed does not decide that point. Lord Rutherfurd Clark, however, at the close of his opinion, says,—'Of course the entail will contain a clause of devolution, by which, in the event of the heir in possession succeeding to the English estates, the estate shall devolve on the next heir who takes the estate of Cockairny.'

"The trustees now represent that in the draft deed submitted by them they have inserted a clause of devolution in accordance with this opinion. But it is contended on behalf of Captain Moubray, the institute, that there should be no clause of devolution, and this is the main question now between the parties. Its practical importance as between Captain Moubray and Arthur Moubray is great, because of the advanced age of the proprietor of the English estates alluded to.

"I was informed that at the debate in the Inner-House a clause of devolution was not so much as alluded to, and it was maintained that it is still competent to decide that there should be no such clause, and that against

June 16, 1896. Moubray's Trustees v. Moubray.

But that construction, which plainly would not help the reclaimer, was not the construction for which he contended. The effect of the clause of devolution which he proposed would be that in the event of the respondent succeeding to Upwood and Woodwalton, and thus under William Hobson Moubray's trust ceasing to have any interest in Cockairnie, the estate to be entailed would pass to the reclaimer. That was virtually to read into Robert Moubray's will the provisions of a deed which did not come into existence until ten years after his death. The sound construction of Robert Moubray's will was that if at the time when the entail came to be executed Cockairnie should no longer belong to the Moubrays, the entail should be executed in favour of the Husseys of Woodwalton. There was nothing in Robert Moubray's will to shew that he objected to Cockairnie, the new estate, and the English estates belonging to the same person, or that he wished virtually to entail Cockairnie by making it an accessory of the new estate.

such a decision there is no judgment of the Court, but only an opinion on a question which was never debated at the bar, although an opinion no doubt of great weight and importance, but yet an opinion for which no reasons are assigned. In that position of matters I apprehend that I cannot with propriety avoid the duty of deciding the question according to my own opinion, and I remain of opinion—although, of course, with no confidence—that there should be no clause of devolution, and that the contention of Captain Moubray to that effect should be sustained.

"I suppose that the ground and reason for such a clause must be found in the testamentary writings of Robert Moubray, and in the testamentary writing dated 30th April 1868, if that be held (as was the opinion of the Court) to be Mr Robert Moubray's 'sole testamentary deed.' There are no words in that writing which suggest such a clause, except the words, 'so long as the estate of Cockairny is theirs.' Now, if these words import the desire of Mr Robert Moubray that there should be a clause of devolution in the deed of entail, it must be a clause expressing that whenever the heir in possession of the lands directed to be entailed shall cease to be proprietor of the lands of Cockairny, he shall forfeit the lands directed to be entailed. The words do not indicate the person on whom these entailed lands shall in that event devolve. Now, the lands of Cockairny might cease to belong to their owner in more ways than one. They might be adjudged by his creditors, or he might sell them, seeing they are not entailed, or he might forfeit them by succession to the English estates, or they might descend to different persons by reason of the difference in the destinations of Cockairny and of the lands to be entailed. Such a clause of forfeiture might be at once extinguished by anyone who came to be the uncontrolled proprietor of Cockairny, and I do not consider that such a clause was contemplated.

"Nobody has contended that there should be a clause of devolution to that effect. Lord Rutherfurd Clark's opinion indicates a clause of a totally different character. It indicates a clause forfeiting the estates to be entailed on the succession of any heir of entail in possession to the English estates,—that is to say, Upwood and Woodwalton,—and in that event only, and a devolution to the heir next in the tailzied destination if he should be the heir (as might or might not be) to the estate of Cockairny. The clause suggested does not appear to indicate one single forfeiture to occur on the first opening of the succession to the English estates, but a clause qualifying the right of all the heirs of entail so long as the entail should endure.

"Captain Moubray submits that there is no suggestion of such a clause as this in Robert Moubray's testamentary writings, and I cannot find any such suggestion. It is maintained that, in order to find any warrant for such a clause of devolution, it is necessary to go to the title-deeds of

June 16, 1896. Moubray's Trustees v. Moubray.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK read the following as the opinion of the Court, consisting of himself, LORD YOUNG, and LORD TRAYNER.—We think that consideration of the question raised by the present reclaiming note is not foreclosed by the judgment pronounced in this case on 27th June last, nor by the sentence in the opinion then delivered which the Lord Ordinary quotes. Having considered that question with the argument addressed to us thereon, we are of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right and should be affirmed.

Cockairny, and Captain Moubray maintains that it is illegitimate to refer to these title-deeds in order to construe Robert Moubray's testamentary writings. I confess I am somewhat at a loss to know what the deed is in which the suggestion is to be sought for. It can hardly be the trust-disposition of William Hobson Moubray, who was proprietor of Cockairny, although Robert Moubray resided there, and that for the apparently unanswerable reason that Robert Moubray was dead before that deed was executed. It is apparently necessary to go back to the trust-disposition of Sir Robert Moubray, which has not been printed or produced, but is described in the joint minute of admissions. I understand it to be averred that he there expressed his wish that his estates in Fife should not be united with the estate of Woodwalton. But in the same minute of admissions it is stated that in 1867 William Hobson Moubray conveyed the estates to himself free of any condition relating to the devolution of his estates. In these circumstances I confess that I find it impossible—whether it be legitimate or not—to interpret Mr Robert Moubray's testamentary writings by a reference to any other title-deeds.

"I may only further notice (although perhaps this may hardly be relevant) that it appears to me that William Hobson Moubray did not by his trust-disposition and settlement declare that there should be any recurring forfeiture of Cockairny by reason of succession to Upwood and Woodwalton, but only directed his trustees to hold the estate of Cockairny until the succession to Woodwalton should open, and then to convey it to the heir next in the destination of Cockairny to whom the English estates did not descend. But of course it is impossible that this condition—imposed after Robert Moubray's death—could have any bearing on his testamentary writings, or on the entail directed by him. It may have been the wish of Robert Moubray that the estate of Cockairny and the estates to be purchased and entailed should always belong to the same proprietor, but I think he has taken no adequate means to secure that object.

"On the whole, I feel compelled to adhere to my original opinion, and to adjust the deed of entail in the manner for which the institute, Captain Moubray, contends,—that is, by deleting the clause of devolution. . . ."

Statute—Construction—Assessment—County Council—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50), secs. 11, 26, and 27.—The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 11, enacts, that "subject to the provisions of this Act there shall be transferred to and vested in the council of each county," inter alia, "the whole powers and duties of the commissioners of supply," and that "the provisions of any Act of Parliament conferring, imposing, or regulating the powers and duties by this Act transferred, or regulating the proceedings under any such Act, shall remain in full force and effect, except in so far as they are repealed by or are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act."

Secs. 26 and 27 empower county councils to impose rates within the county to meet the deficiency in the county fund in respect of each branch of expenditure, declaring that "the rate in respect of each branch of expenditure for which provision is made under an Act of Parliament in force at the passing of this Act shall be deemed to be imposed under the powers and subject to the provisions of that Act, except in so far as these are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act," the sum of such rates to be the "consolidated rates."

Sec. 105 defines "county," where not inconsistent with the context, to mean county exclusive of any burgh, and "burgh" to mean any royal or parliamentary burgh.

In an action brought by a parliamentary burgh against a county council for declarator that the defenders were not entitled to assess the pursuers' lands within the burgh for county general assessment under the County General Assessment Act, 1868, held (1) that by secs. 26 and 27 of the Local Government Act, 1889, the whole assessing powers derived by a county council from prior Acts were merged in the power given to assess for consolidated rates, and that a county council had no other power to assess; and (2) that a county council's power to assess being limited to lands and heritages within the county as defined by the Act, they were not entitled to assess lands or heritages within a royal or parliamentary burgh.

Police Commissioners of Oban v. County Council of Argyllshire, March 9, 1894, 21 R. 644, commented on.

1st DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. ON 18th November 1895 the Corporation of the Burgh of Galashiels raised this action against the County Council of the County of Selkirk, of which the leading conclusion was for declarator "that the defenders are not entitled to levy county general assessment on lands and heritages belonging to the pursuers lying within the boundaries of the said burgh of Galashiels."

The pursuers averred, and it was admitted, that the burgh of Galashiels had in October 1850 adopted the Police Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. c. 33), and become a burgh for police purposes, maintaining an establishment of police under the provisions of the Act. It became in 1868 a parliamentary burgh, and had a population of 18,000.

The pursuers' case was (1) that the power to assess given to county councils by section 27 of the Local Government Act, 1889, did not extend to parliamentary burghs; and (2) that if the County Council had under section 11 * the power formerly possessed by the Commis-

The pursuers pleaded;—In respect the lands and heritages belonging to the pursuers within the burgh of Galashiels do not form part of the assessable area from which the defenders are empowered to levy county general assessment, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator as concluded for.

transferred to and vested in the council of each county, on and after the appointed day, or at such times as are in this Act in that behalf respectively specified:—(1) The whole powers and duties of the commissioners of supply save as hereinafter mentioned. . . . The provisions of any Act of Parliament conferring, imposing, or regulating the powers and duties by this Act transferred, or regulating the proceedings under any such Act, shall remain in full force and effect, except in so far as they are repealed by, or are inconsistent with, the provisions of this Act."

Section 26, subsection 4.—"If the county fund is insufficient to meet the expenditure, rates (in this Act referred to as the owner's consolidated rate, and the occupier's consolidated rate, and together as the consolidated rates) may be levied to meet such deficiency for general county purposes upon all rateable property in the county, or, in the case of expenditure for the management and maintenance of highways, the administration of the laws relating to public health, or other special purpose as hereinbefore mentioned, upon all rateable property within the several districts or parishes of the county as the case may be, in the manner and subject to the conditions in this Act provided."

Section 27, subsection 1,—"The County Council shall annually fix the rate in the pound of the rateable property which will be necessary to meet the deficiency in the county fund in respect of each branch of expenditure subject to its control, or for which it is responsible in whole or in part, and such rate shall be imposed upon all lands and heritages within the county, except that the rate for the management and maintenance of highways, the administration of the laws relating to public health, and any other special purpose as hereinbefore mentioned, shall be imposed upon all lands and heritages within each division, or district, or parish, as the case may be. The rate in respect of each branch of expenditure, for which provision is made under an Act of Parliament in force at the passing of this Act, shall be deemed to be imposed under the powers, and subject to the provisions of that Act, except in so far as these are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act. The rate necessary in respect of any branch or branches of expenditure for which no provision is made, as last mentioned, shall be imposed as a general purposes rate under this Act. (2) Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, the rates shall be equally divided between owners and occupiers, and the sum of all the rates so fixed and divided shall, as affecting owners and occupiers respectively, constitute the owner's consolidated rate and the occupier's consolidated rate, as the case may be, in respect of the lands and heritages situated therein; . . . (4) Where, at the passing of this Act, any rate leviable by the commissioners of supply in respect of any such branch of expenditure is payable by owners only without relief to the extent of one-half against the occupiers, the following provisions shall have effect, —that is to say,—1. [Sheriff to fix average rate.] . . . 3. [Where rate fixed to meet deficiency does not exceed average rate, rate to be included in the owner's consolidated rate. But where, &c.]."

Section 105.—"In this Act, if not inconsistent with the context, the following terms have the meanings hereinafter respectively assigned to them, —that is to say, the expression 'county' means a county exclusive of any burgh wholly or partly situate therein, and does not include a county of a city. The expression 'burgh' means any royal or parliamentary burgh."

No. 163.

June 18, 1896. Corporation of Galashiels v. County Council of Selkirk.

The defenders stated,—"Explained that by section 11 of said Act, the whole powers and duties of the Commissioners of Supply of each county are transferred to and vested in the county council of each county, and under said section it is also enacted 'that the provisions of any Act of Parliament conferring, imposing, or regulating the powers and duties by this Act conferred, or regulating the proceedings under any such Act, shall remain in full force and effect, except in so far as they are repealed by or are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.' By section 12, subsection (1) of said Act, it is further provided that 'the County General Assessment (Scotland) Act, 1868, shall be repealed after the words "such assessment is imposed" in the 4th section thereof to the end of section 9 of the Act.' The assessment clauses of the County General Assessment Act are, however, not repealed. Explained also that the average rate affecting owners in the county of Selkirk was fixed in terms of subsection 4 of section 27 of said Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, on the basis of the continuation of liability for said assessment by the burgh of Galashiels, and without objection by the burgh of Galashiels. The present assessment is the exact amount of the said average rate."

On 11th March 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) granted decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—This is an action by the Corporation of the Burgh of Galashiels against the County Council of the County of Selkirk, in which Galashiels is situated, and the question raised is whether the County Council is entitled to levy the tax known as county general assessment on lands within the burgh; this particular case relating of course directly only to subjects belonging to the burgh.

"The question has already been decided in favour of Galashiels in an action raised before Lord Low. Lord Low's judgment is dated 23d February 1892. It was not taken to review, and is not reported in the ordinary reports. I was furnished with a print of his judgment, and referred to a report of the case in the Poor-Law Magazine for 1892, p. 204.

"A similar question has since been raised between the Police Commissioners of Oban and the County Council of Argyllshire, in a case also called before Lord Low, who decided that the county general assessment for Argyllshire was not leviable on lands in the burgh of Oban. But that interlocutor was recalled by the Second Division, and the case was decided in favour of the County Council—reported 9th March 1894, 21 R. 644, and more fully in 31 S. L. R. 510. I am bound to follow that judgment, and to hold it as correcting Lord Low's interlocutor in the Oban case. It has been maintained by the County Council of Selkirk that that judgment overrules the judgment of Lord Low in the action between the present parties; and that, in respect of it, judgment should be given in favour of the defenders, the County Council of Selkirk. Res judicata is not pleaded.

"It is certainly true that Lord Low's grounds of judgment in the Galashiels case were, to a certain extent, the same as his grounds of judgment in the Oban case, with which the Second Division did not concur. Such grounds of judgment were no doubt applicable to both cases. And, as I am precluded from founding on those grounds of judgment which were common to both cases, the argument was stated on the footing that these grounds for a judgment in favour of Galashiels could not be re-opened before me, and they were not argued; the pursuers of course reserving right to re-open them, if the case should go further.

"I am, however, of opinion that the case of Oban differs in an essential particular from this case, a difference clearly expressed in the judgment in the Inner-House; and that Lord Low's judgment in the previous case was well founded, and may be supported in complete consistency with the judgment

No. 163.

June 18, 1896.

Corporation of Galashiels v. County Council of Selkirk.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary did not deal with the Local Government Act, 1889, because he rightly interpreted the judgment in the Oban[1] case as deciding the present question. The Local Government Act, 1889, was not intended to relieve, and did not relieve, burghs of county general assessment. In 1868 the Commissioners of Supply were bound to levy county general assessment, which came in place of rogue money, on lands and heritages within the whole county. The 11th section of the Local Government Act, 1889, transferred their powers and duties to the County Council, and by that transference the pursuers became bound to levy the assessment. There was no section in the Act of 1889 which expressly exempted burghs from the assessment, and the Court would be slow to recognise an exemption by implication. The 27th section imposed certain rates upon the whole county, and these, in the words of the section, were "to be deemed to be imposed" under the older Act. The assessable area was not limited by the definition clause (section 105) of the Act, for the definition was to apply only "if not inconsistent with the context."

in the Oban case. That essential difference is, that Galashiels is a police burgh under a Police Act, which maintains a police of its own out of a burgh police assessment, which was not the case with Oban. The facts that the population of Galashiels is above 7000 and of Oban under 7000 are of importance in regard to certain provisions in the Local Government Act. The ground on which I reach a conclusion in favour of Galashiels may be narrow, but I think the point reasonably clear.

"The powers of assessment of the County Council depend, of course, primarily on the Local Government Act, 1889, 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50. By section 27 of that Act, the County Council is empowered to fix the rate of assessment in respect of each branch of expenditure, and to impose the rate upon 'all lands and heritages within the county,' with certain exceptions which do not affect this case. By section 105, the expression county is defined to mean 'a county exclusive of any burgh,' and the term burgh is defined to mean any royal or parliamentary burgh, which interpretation of the word 'burgh' comprehends Galashiels, being a police burgh. Hence it appears to be clear enough that section 27 of the Local Government Act does not authorise the assessment in question on property within the burgh of Galashiels. I do not pursue this point further, because I did not understand that the defenders maintained that they could rest their power to assess on that section, or on any new powers of assessment conferred by the Local Government Act. They rested their case on section 11 of the Act, whereby the powers of the Commissioners of Supply are transferred to the County Council, and whereby it is declared that 'the provisions of any Act of Parliament conferring, imposing, or regulating the powers and duties transferred shall remain in full force and effect so far as not repealed by or inconsistent with' the Act.

"That clause they say carries the question back to the County General Assessment Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 82, whereby the Commissioners of Supply are empowered to impose the county general assessment, which is the assessment now in question. That statute is in part repealed by section 12 of the Local Government Act, but the assessing clauses are not repealed. The defenders therefore, as I understand, maintain that the question depends on the County General Assessment Act; and in any case I am of opinion that it does.

"That statute abolishes 'rogue money,' and imposes the county general

Argued for the pursuers;—The Lord Ordinary was right in holding that in 1868 the Commissioners of Supply had no power to levy county general assessment in a burgh like Galashiels which was a burgh for police purposes under the Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1850, and that consequently the defenders as coming in their place were not entitled to levy the assessment. But further, having regard to the clear and express terms of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, the same conclusion must be reached; and it was impossible to believe that the assessing clauses of that Act were brought before the notice of the Second Division when the Court pronounced judgment in the Oban case. The sole assessing clauses in the Act were sections 26, subsection 4, section 27, subsection 1, and these fell to be read along with the interpretation clause, section 105. It was clear that under them the County Council were authorised to levy a consolidated rate upon all rateable property in the county excluding royal and parliamentary burghs. They were not entitled to break up the rate as they proposed to do, and levy one portion upon the county and another upon the burgh.

assessment 'in lieu thereof,' and it provides (section 10) that 'nothing herein contained shall confer on the commissioners of supply of any county the right to levy assessments under this Act on any lands or heritages upon which it is not now competent for the commissioners of supply to levy rogue money.'

"It is therefore perfectly plain that if in 1868 the Commissioners of Supply were not entitled to levy rogue money on lands within the burgh of Galashiels, then they were not empowered, and are not now entitled, to levy county general assessment on lands within the burgh; and the converse is also obvious, that if they were entitled to levy rogue money on the lands in the burgh, then they were authorised to levy county general assessment. I do not know that the pursuers would admit that, even if that power was conferred on the Commissioners of Supply, it is now resident in the County Council. My impression is that it would be; but I do not require to determine that question, because I am of opinion that in 1868 the Commissioners of Supply were not entitled to levy rogue money within the burgh.

"Liability to be assessed for rogue money thus becomes the test of liability for the general county assessment, and it is therefore necessary to consider the statute in regard to rogue money.

"Rogue money was first imposed by the Disarming Act, 11 George I., cap. 26, by which the freeholders of 'every shire, county, or district,' were empowered to assess the several shires and stewartries, where their estates lay, in sums to be applied in defraying the charges attending the apprehension, subsistence, and prosecution of criminals. I do not know when this assessment first received the name of rogue money, but the power to levy it was transferred under that name from the freeholders to the commissioners of supply in 1832, by the Reform Act, 2 and 3 Wm. IV. cap. 65, sec. 44.

"The first General Police Act for burghs was 3 and 4 Wm. IV. cap. 46, 1833, but it contains no reference to rogue money or county police assessment.

"The Act 2 and 3 Vict. cap. 65, 1839, proceeds on a narrative of the Disarming Act, 11 George I. cap. 26, and of the Reform Act, and sets forth that the rogue money had hitherto been raised by assessment on the valued rent, and that it was expedient to authorise the commissioners of supply, if they thought fit, to extend the purposes of that assessment, and to adopt other modes of assessment. The Act therefore empowered the commissioners of supply to make an additional assessment 'for establishing and Corporation of Galashiels v. County Council of Selkirk.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this case is whether the County Council of Selkirk are entitled to levy certain rates on lands and heritages situated within the burgh of Galashiels. The first plea for the pursuers is as follows:—"In respect the lands and heritages belonging to the pursuers within the burgh of Galashiels do not form part of the assessable area from which the defenders are empowered to levy county general assessment, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator as concluded for." And the decree of declarator sought is "that the defenders are not entitled to levy county general assessment on lands and heritages belonging to the pursuers lying within the boundaries of the said burgh of Galashiels."

Now, the question is thus of the right of this County Council to levy assessment within the burgh of Galashiels; and primarily, that question undoubtedly must be determined by a reference to the assessing powers of the County Council. Now, those are contained in the Local Government Act of 1889, and in particular in sections 26 and 27. Up to this point in that statute your Lordships will have observed that what has in the main maintaining an efficient constabulary and police force,' and for other purposes; and the Act declared that this additional assessment should be deemed and taken to be and should be levied and collected as part of the rogue money. It was further provided that 'the rogue money and additional assessments to be so assessed and collected shall be applied for the purposes of the said herein recited Act of His Majesty King George the First, and of this Act, and to no other purposes.' It is to be noticed that the Act does not only provide that the additional assessment should be levied and collected with the rogue money, but that it should be taken to be part of the rogue money, and that the rogue money and additional assessment—or rather the whole rogue money—should be applied to the same purposes; and these, if not wholly, yet in part, were undoubtedly police purposes. There were not two taxes levied under this Act, but only one, namely, the augmented rogue money, which thus became the county police assessment.

"It was provided by section 3 that 'the said Commissioners shall not be entitled, for the purposes of this Act, to assess any lands, houses, or other heritages situated within the boundaries of any royal burgh, or to assess any lands, houses, or other heritages within the boundaries of any burgh or town which either has a Police Act, or which has taken the benefit of' the Act 3 and 4 Wm. IV. cap. 46.

"The General Police Act, 1850, 13 and 14 Vict. cap. 33, section 376, provides 'that no burgh in which a police is maintained by assessment upon such burgh under the provisions of this Act shall be liable for any assessment for the police purposes of the county in which such burgh is situated, anything in any Act or Acts of Parliament to the contrary notwithstanding.'

"Now it is averred and admitted that in 1850 Galashiels adopted this Police Act, and has since maintained a police within the burgh.

"At that time Galashiels was situated partly in Selkirk and partly in Roxburgh; and it is clear that at that date it became exempt from any assessment for the police purposes of either of these counties. What then was the assessment for police purposes in counties at that date? It could be nothing but the augmented rogue money. It is not said that there was any other county police assessment, or any county police assessment which was not rogue money. If that be true, the important conclusion is reached, by inferences, which seem otherwise inevitable, that no rogue money was leviable on land in the burgh of Galashiels, after it had adopted the Police Act of 1850, and undertaken the provision of its own police.

"By the County Police Act of 1857, 20 and 21 Vict. cap. 72, the Act 2 been done is that the powers and duties generally of the various county bodies are now gathered together and placed in the sole hands of the county council, and the county council in the appropriately ample terms of transference have a title fortified by the assertion that they are to enjoy all the rights and be subject to all the duties of their predecessors.

Had matters rested upon these words of the transfer, conjecture might have arisen as to the mode in which the massed powers of assessment would be exercised. The Legislature, however, leaves in no haze or doubt what the powers of assessment are to be, because in the 26th section and in subsection 4, they state expressly what, and what alone, is to be legal:—"If the county fund is insufficient to meet the expenditure, rates (in this Act referred to as the owner's consolidated rate and the occupier's consolidated rate, and together as the consolidated rates) may be levied to meet such deficiency for general county purposes upon all rateable property in the county." Then in the more executive clause, section 27, it is provided that "the county council shall annually fix the rate in the pound of the rateable property which will be necessary to meet the deficiency"; "and such rate shall be imposed upon all lands and heritages within the county." There are various provisions made as to the mode and form in which this is to be done, but those sections constitute the sole right of the County Council to levy rates at all.

Now, you have observed that there is an express provision not merely as to the rate which is to be levied, but also as to the assessable area. The property to be rated is all lands and heritages within the county. When we turn to section 105 we find, in perfectly unambiguous terms, the interpretaand 3 Vict. cap. 65, was repealed, and, as a consequence, the additional assessment thereby authorised necessarily fell. But the whole of the rogue money was not thereby abolished, but only a part of it. The rest of it—that is to say the original rogue money—remained, as is clear, could there be any doubt about it, from section 32. It may be that thereafter the rogue money could only be applied to the purposes specified in the Disarming Act, but there certainly is nothing in this County Police Act which can be supposed to reimpose it on a police burgh with a police of its own. The 29th section authorises an assessment on heritages within a county. But it appears from the interpretation clause that a burgh such as Galashiels was certainly not included in the word 'county' as used in the County Police Act.

"The Police Act of 1850 was repealed by the Act 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101, section 1; but burghs which had adopted the Act were excepted from the operation of this repeal. That Act, so far as regarded Galashiels, stood operative and unrepealed in 1868, when the General County Assessment Act was passed, and therefore at that date rogue money was not leviable out of land in the burgh of Galashiels; and therefore the general county assessment was not imposed on it.

"Other arguments were stated on behalf of the burgh of Galashiels; such as, that, as it was not represented in the County Council, it was presumably not subject to their power of assessment; and that the opposite view involved a double assessment of the lands in the burgh. It appears to me, however, simpler and safer to proceed on the plain words of the various statutes than on presumptions and inferential arguments; and, so far as I am able to see, they determine the question very clearly in favour of the pursuers. I am therefore of opinion that decree must be pronounced as concluded for."

tion of the word "county." "The expression 'county' means a county exclusive of any burgh wholly or partly situate therein." And the next interpretation is—"The expression 'burgh' means any royal or parliamentary burgh." Now, putting these two things together, it seems to me as clear as anything can be that the County Council of Selkirk has a power of levying a consolidated rate upon all the county, excluding the parliamentary burgh of Galashiels. If you put the two things together there is no escape from that conclusion; and accordingly I asked—"How can this assessment be justified? Is it not open to the objection that it is an assessment upon lands and heritages which do not form part of the assessable area?"

The argument in support of this power is presented in a somewhat singular form. If you turn to those sections authorising assessments you find that all that the County Council can do is to impose a consolidated rate. They are, it is true, to inform their constituents, the ratepayers, of the details of the purposes which require that aggregate amount, and that is to be set out in the notice paper. But not the less for that is the assessing power to be found in the 26th and 27th sections of the Act of 1889, and not in the assessing clauses of the old statutes which gave the transferred powers to the predecessors of the County Council.

A sharp test of the validity of the defenders' contention is afforded by this question—"What rate do you propose to impose upon the lands and heritages within the burgh of Galashiels?" They could not face up to the proposition that they were going to impose all their county rates upon the burgh of Galashiels in the form of the consolidated rate; and if not, that must mean that they are going to lay a part upon it.

I find from the frame of the summons and the expression of the plea, that the threat which is made by the defenders in this action is to impose a county general assessment. In their resolution I see they resolve, having regard to a certain judgment to which I shall presently refer, that "a county general assessment" be levied from the burgh of Galashiels as part of the county. That means that they are going to exercise, not their own powers of assessment, but the powers of assessment which existed in their deceased predecessors. In short, they are going to revive a power which existed in certain persons who exercised some of their powers, and they are going—under pretence, observe, of their authority as a county council—to levy a rate which is entirely unsupported by any clause of the Local Government Act.

Now, that threat or resolution seems to have governed the expression of the summons, and accordingly the proposition we are asked to affirm is that the defenders are not entitled to levy county general assessments on lands and heritages belonging to the pursuers lying within the burgh of Galashiels. I am quite prepared to affirm that proposition. But I would have gone further, because I would have been prepared to affirm that they are not entitled to levy any assessment on lands and heritages within the burgh of Galashiels. But the limitation in the summons brings to light one of the salient fallacies of the defenders' position, and discloses the double illegality of the proposed rate—it would be levied outwith the assessable area, and the rate itself would be illegal even within it.

I have treated the matter upon one ground, and one only. I am prepared to sustain the definite and sharp rule of law which is put forward in the first plea of the pursuers, that they are not within the assessable area.

But we have been told that to adopt that ground of judgment would be to go against a decision by the Second Division of this Court in the case of Oban.[1] It is quite true that in that case the Second Division held that lands within the burgh of Oban were liable to the assessments of the County Council. But when that case is cited it must be as an authority on the proposition of law on which we were asked to give judgment. Now, I cannot find in the reported opinions of the learned Judges any reference at all to the assessing sections (26 and 27) of the Local Government Act, 1889, or to a comparison with them of the interpretation of the word "county" contained in section 105. A number of other topics are discussed, none of which seem to me to be necessary for our present decision, and accordingly on the expressed opinions of the Judges I am saying nothing which is in the least degree adverse to them. It is true that the Lord Justice-Clerk remarks that he has been unable to find in the Local Government Act anything to alter the situation from what it was under the Act of 1868; but then I do not think that his Lordship is considering this salient and preliminary question upon which my judgment is based, because if it had been under his observation he would most certainly have discussed and disposed of it. Therefore while feeling myself entirely free from authority upon this subject, and considering the question to be a very sharp and very plain one, I am in favour of affirming the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

I desire to express no opinion at all on any of the grounds of judgment which his Lordship has adopted, but I may remark that I think he has been led into those circuitous methods of dealing with the case by some apprehension as to how far he was bound by the decision in the Oban case.

LORD ADAM.—I concur. For my part I think this case is quite clear upon the point of law on which your Lordship proposes to decide it. I think it is clear from the Act of 1889 that the area within which alone this assessment can be levied is the county excluding the burgh of Galashiels. The next point I think is equally clear, that the only assessment is for consolidated rate and for nothing else. There is no authority that I can see to assess for anything but the whole consolidated rate, and that is not what is proposed to be done. The County Council here are seeking to impose a special assessment upon the burgh of Galashiels. I agree with your Lordship that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be affirmed.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think it is demonstratively clear that the county councils constituted by the Local Government Act of 1889 have no authority to impose assessments or rates within any royal or parliamentary burgh in Scotland.

Were it not that there has been some contrariety of opinion in the construction of these assessing clauses, I should have been content to express my concurrence in the grounds of judgment expressed by your Lordships. I do not know that I can add anything, but my opinion is rested mainly on this, that I hold that all the powers of assessment which were vested in the county authorities prior to 1889 came to an end on the passing of the Local Government Act of that year. The powers have necessarily ceased because the assessing authorities no longer exist; and it follows that rates authorised to be levied by Act of Parliament previous to 1889 only exist in so far as the rating powers are continued or are incorporated by reference under the provisions of the Local Government Act. Now, the most important provision as to rating is the 27th section, which authorises the imposition of a consolidated rate upon owners and a consolidated rate on occupiers. In giving this power reference is made to previous legislation on the subject of county finance as the measure of the powers of the county council in regard to all partial rates or elements of the consolidated rate which are not specially regulated by the Local Government Act itself. The county council at the same time is empowered to include in the consolidated rate an allowance for general purposes. Now, it appears to me that no authority is given to a county council for levying anything but a consolidated rate, and that rate must be the same rate for every part of the county, except in so far as district taxation is authorised by Act of Parliament.

[1] Police Commissioners of Oban v. County Council of Argyllshire, March 9, 1894, 21 R. 644.

Corporation of Galashiels v. County Council of Selkirk.

As regards those subjects of county taxation which apply equally to all parts of the county, this part of the consolidated rate would, of course, be the same throughout the county. But it is recognised that, with reference to roads and public health and other purposes of a more local character, the consolidated rate may vary for different districts of the county, because it is to include such assessments for those more limited purposes as were authorised by existing legislation.

When we come to consider what is the area of taxation, the answer is given by the 26th section, that the rate is limited in amount to what is necessary to make up the deficiency in the county fund, and is limited geographically to rateable property within the county. As your Lordship has pointed out, the word "county" is clearly and sharply defined in the definition clause, and it is perfectly clear that the Legislature did not include the area of any royal or parliamentary burgh within the area of county taxation, because such burghs are excluded from the conception of a county as existing for the purposes of this Act.

Having regard to views that have been expressed elsewhere, I do not wish to express a definite opinion as to whether the county general assessment was ever properly chargeable within the areas of royal and parliamentary burghs. If it was so charged, the case is an exception to the policy of modern legislation, which has been to recognise the autonomy of municipal corporations in regard to local taxation. If such anomalies did exist, they have been removed by the Local Government Act of 1889, which provides with regard to the more important class of burghs—those which either had an ancient constitution, or, on account of their importance, had been allowed a separate representation in Parliament—that they are not to be subject to the government or the assessing powers of the county councils.

On another ground I think that the defence to this action of declarator must fail, because there is no authority in the Local Government Act for laying on a "county general assessment" in contradistinction to a consolidated rate. The only way in which burghs could be made liable to the

No. 163. June 18, 1896. Corporation of Galashiels v. County Council of Selkirk.

"county general assessment" (which came in place of rogue money) would be by laying on the burghs so much of the entire consolidated county rate as is universally applicable to owners within the county. But it was not contended that royal and parliamentary burghs were universally liable to county taxation, and on this ground also my opinion is that the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator.

I concur with your Lordships in thinking that the attention of the Judges who decided the Oban[1] case had not been prominently called to the new departure in regard to financial powers which is taken in the Local Government Act of 1889, because the discussion of the subject which we find in the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Trayner is chiefly directed to the argument upon the older statutes.

I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be affirmed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think the burgh of Galashiels is not within the assessable area over which the powers of the County Council to levy rates extend. The 26th section, when it is read along with the interpretation clause, defines the assessable area in language that seems to me to be too clear to raise any question of construction, because it authorises the County Council to levy a consolidated rate or consolidated rates upon all rateable property in the county excluding royal and parliamentary burghs. I agree, therefore, with the main ground of judgment upon which your Lordships proceed; and I agree also with the second ground, that the County Council being authorised to levy a consolidated rate, is not entitled to break up the rate for the purpose of levying an assessment for one particular purpose upon a parliamentary burgh which for the purpose of all other assessments is beyond the assessable area. I think the statute authorises a county council to levy a consolidated rate within a definite area and no other rate.

In a special case presented after the widow's death, held (1) that vesting of the residue was postponed until the youngest child attained twenty-one years of age; and (2) that from the date of the widow's death till the time when the youngest child attained twenty-one years of age the income fell to be divided among the testator's surviving children, and that the issue of children who had died were not entitled to participate therein.

1ST DIVISION.

WILLIAM ADAMS died on 6th August 1890, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which he conveyed his whole estate to trustees for certain purposes.

By the fourth purpose the trustees were directed to pay the free income of the trust-estate to the truster's widow,—"And my trustees after the death or second marriage of my said spouse shall pay to or apply for behoof of my children, until the youngest attain the age of twenty-one years complete, the free income of my said estates, and that at such times, in such proportions, and in such way and manner as my trustees, to whom I commit the fullest discretionary power, may think proper, with special power also to my trustees to make such payment from the capital of my estate to or for behoof of my said spouse or children as my trustees, in the exercise of discretionary power hereby conferred on them, may hold to be necessary, in any special circumstances which may emerge, they keeping in view, however, that it is my wish that as much of the capital as possible shall be preserved for division amongst my children."

The fifth purpose was as follows:—"So soon as convenient after my youngest child attains the age of twenty-one years complete, and after the interest of my said spouse has ceased by her decease or having entered into another marriage, my said trustees shall either convey or pay over the whole of the free residue of my estates to my children equally, the issue of any child who may have predeceased leaving issue coming in place of and taking the share which would have been taken by the predeceasing parent if in life."

Mr Adams was survived by his wife, and by seven children, the youngest of whom had not, at the date of the after-mentioned special case, attained twenty-one.

The testator's widow died on 16th August 1893.

Of the children Mrs Jessie Adams or Carrick died intestate on 23d June 1895, domiciled in Ireland, and survived by her husband James Carrick and an only child Margaret Finlay Carrick, and Eliza Adams died on 10th January 1896, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which she conveyed her whole estate to trustees for certain purposes.

In consequence of the deaths of these children questions arose as to the parties entitled to share in the trust-estate of Mr Adams, and as to their respective rights thereto, to determine which this special case was presented by Mr Adams' trustees, of the first part; Margaret Finlay Carrick, of the second part; James Carrick, of the third part; the surviving children of Mr Adams, of the fourth part; and the trustees of Miss Eliza Adams, of the fifth part.

The second party maintained (1) that the share of income which would have belonged to her mother Mrs Carrick, if in life, now fell to her because, inter alia, the word "children" in the settlement included "grandchildren"; (2) that a share of the capital did not vest in her mother; and (3) that assuming the trustees had no power to pay presently to the second party the proportion of the income which they would have paid to her mother, they were nevertheless entitled to set apart and accumulate such proportion—the accumulation falling to be paid to her at the period of division.

The third party maintained that one-seventh of the capital vested in his late wife before her death, and now fell to him by Irish law, and that the share of income belonging to his late wife now fell to him. The fifth parties maintained that one-seventh of the capital vested in Miss Eliza Adams before her death, and that the share of income belonging to her now fell to them.

The fourth parties maintained that vesting was postponed until the testator's youngest child attained majority, before which time the parties entitled to the capital could not be ascertained, and that neither the second nor the third party was entitled to share the income, but that the surviving children of Mr Adams were alone entitled to it.

The following questions of law were submitted to the Court:—"(1) Did one-seventh share of the free residue of the trust-estate vest in each or either of the deceased Mrs Jessie Adams or Carrick and Eliza Mary Helen Adams? (2) In the event of the first question being answered in the affirmative, did the said share vest on the death of Mrs Carrick in the second party? (3) Are the trustees, the first parties, bound to pay to, or apply for behoof of, either (a) the second party, or (b) the third party, one-seventh, or one-sixth, or such share as they may think proper, of the income accruing to the trust-estate between the death of the said Mrs Adams or Carrick and the payment or conveyance of the free residue? (4) If not bound, are the trustees, the first parties, entitled, under the powers conferred on them by the fourth purpose of said settlement, to pay to, or apply for behoof of, either (a) the second party, (b) the third party, or (c) the fifth parties, such share as they may think proper of the said income? (5) In the event of the third and fourth questions being answered in the negative, are the trustees entitled or bound to accumulate the share of income which they would have been entitled to pay to Mrs Carrick if alive, and to pay the accumulation to the second party if alive at the period of division of the estate, or does such income fall into residue?"

The undernoted cases were referred to by the parties in argument.[1]

June 18, 1896. Adams' Trustees v. Carrick.

LORD ADAM.—The questions in this case arise upon the construction of the trust-disposition and settlement of the late William Adams, who died on the 6th August 1890.

By his trust-disposition and settlement the truster left his whole property, heritable and moveable, to trustees. He gave them directions as to the disposal of his household furniture and personal articles, but these do not appear to be material in the present case.

By the fourth purpose of the trust he directed his trustees to pay the income arising out of his whole estates to his widow, under the condition that out of such income she should pay for the education, clothing, and maintenance of such of his children as might be in minority, in so far as they might not be in a position to maintain themselves. He further empowered his trustees to give his wife possession of a house rent free, and he declared that in the event of his wife entering into a second marriage, she should, after that event, have no right or interest in his estates, and should quit possession of any house she might be occupying under his trustees.

He directed his trustees, after the death or second marriage of his wife, to pay to or apply for behoof of his children, until the youngest should attain the age of twenty-one, the income of his estates, at such times, in such proportions, and in such way and manner as his trustees should think proper, to whom he committed the fullest discretionary power.

He also empowered his trustees to make such payments out of the capital of his estates, for behoof of his spouse or children, as they might hold to be necessary in any special circumstances which might emerge.

By the fifth purpose of the trust he directed his trustees, as soon as convenient after his youngest child had attained the age of twenty-one, and after the interest of his wife had ceased by death or remarriage, to convey or pay over the whole free residue of his estates to his children equally, the issue of any child who might have predeceased leaving issue coming in place of and taking the share which would have been taken by the predeceasing parent if in life.

The truster was survived by his wife, who never remarried, and who died in August 1893.

He was also survived by seven children, of whom one, Mrs Carrick, died in June 1895, leaving one child, Margaret Finlay Carrick, who is the second party to this case. Her father is the third party. Another child of the truster, Eliza, died in 1896, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which she conveyed her whole estate to certain trustees, who are the fifth parties to the case. The fourth parties are the surviving children of the truster.

These are the facts relative to the present position of the truster's family which have given rise to the present questions.

The first question we are asked is whether one-seventh share of the residue of the trust-estate vested in each or either of the deceased Mrs Carrick or Eliza Adams?

It appears to me that there are only two possible periods of vesting under this deed, either a morte testatoris, or at the period of division.

No. 164.

June 18, 1896. Adams' Trustees v. Carrick.

Now, it will be observed that this is not the case of a gift of the estate to the children, with a subsequent direction to pay or divide it among them. The gift is implied from the direction to pay. But the time at which payment is to be made is as soon as convenient after the youngest child shall have attained twenty-one and the wife's interest shall have ceased; and the persons to whom payment is to be made are the children, and the issue of any child who may have predeceased leaving issue,—that is, predeceased the term of payment. The trustees can only pay when the time for payment directed by the deed arrives, and then only to children, or to the issue of a predeceasing child. But the time for payment has not yet arrived, and it appears to me that there can be no vesting till it does, when only the parties who are to take can be ascertained.

I think, therefore, that the first question must be answered in the negative.

The next two questions relate to the disposal of the income of the trust-estate, after the widow shall have ceased to have any interest in it, by death or remarriage, till the period of division.

The direction to the trustees, on that event occurring, is to pay it to, or apply it for behoof of, the truster's children, until the youngest shall attain the age of twenty-one. It appears to me that by "children" here the truster means his own immediate children, and that grandchildren are not intended to be included. If grandchildren were held to be included, the direction would be a direction to the trustees to continue paying the income of the estate until the youngest grandchild had attained the age of twenty-one. For that purpose they would have to retain the estate in their own hands; but that is certainly not the truster's intention, because, as we have seen, he has directed the fee of his estate to be distributed as soon as the youngest of his immediate children had attained twenty-one, so that it would be impossible for the trustees to fulfil such a direction.

It is clear that the truster did not overlook the case of grandchildren in making his settlement, and that they are specially named when they are intended to take any benefit, as appears from the next clause, which relates to the disposal of the fee of his estate, by which, in that case, the issue of children are specially substituted in place of their predeceasing parents.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the trustees are directed to pay the income in question to the truster's immediate children only, and that they are neither bound nor entitled to pay any of it to grandchildren, or anyone claiming in their right, and therefore that the third and fourth questions must be answered in the negative.

In my opinion the fifth question must also be answered in the negative. There is no direction to accumulate, and, as I have said, the trustees are bound to pay the income of the estate to the immediate children of the truster alive at the time.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT answered the first, third, fourth, and fifth questions in the negative, and found it unnecessary to answer the second question.

Parish Council of Kilmarnock v. Ossington's Trustees.

Trust—Chairman of Parochial Board ex officio trustee—Parish Council succeeding to Parochial Board—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 58), secs. 21 and 22.—The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, section 21, enacted that on and after 15th May 1895 the parochial board of any parish should cease to hold office, "and on and after such day every reference in any Act of Parliament, scheme, deed, or instrument to a parochial board . . . shall be read and construed as referring to a parish council constituted under this Act." Section 22 enacted,—"A parish council shall . . . come in place of a parochial board . . . and shall be deemed to be a continuance thereof, and shall have and may exercise all the powers and duties . . . of a parochial board."

A truster in 1885 nominated among her trustees "the chairman of the Parochial Board of the parish of K. and his successor in office for the time being, so long as such board shall exist."

Held that the chairman of the Parish Council of K. was not entitled ex officio to act as a trustee under the deed.

2D DIVISION.

ON 8th April 1885 the Viscountess Ossington, relict of the Right Honourable John Evelyn Denison, Viscount Ossington, executed a deed of trust by which on the narrative that she had purchased a site at Kilmarnock, and that she had erected thereon a building to be used as a coffee tavern, and that she had provided furniture for said coffee tavern, and also the capital necessary for procuring provisions and defraying the cost of working the said coffee tavern, and that the said coffee tavern was then in active operation; and on the further narrative that she had resolved, in order that the said coffee tavern might be continued in all time coming, and for the furtherance of the temperance cause, to grant the said deed of trust; therefore she disponed "to the provost of the burgh of Kilmarnock, and his successor in office for the time being; the chairman of the Parochial Board of the parish of Kilmarnock, and his successor in office for the time being, so long as such board shall exist; and Frederick John Turner and Joseph Harling Turner, factors on the entailed estate of Kilmarnock, and their successors or successor in office for the time being," and certain other individuals named, and the survivors and survivor of them, and any other persons to be assumed as trustees for the purposes therein mentioned, All and Whole the subjects therein described, with entry as at the date of her death, reserving power to alter or revoke.

Viscountess Ossington died on 30th September 1889.

By virtue of the provisions of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, the Parochial Board of the parish of Kilmarnock ceased to hold office on 15th May 1895.

The chairman of the Parish Council, which, under the provisions of the statute, came in place of the Parochial Board, claimed right to act as a trustee under the deed of trust as the successor in office of the chairman of the Parochial Board.

The trustees maintained that he was not entitled to act as a trustee, and this special case was presented to the Court by (1) the Parish Council of the parish of Kilmarnock, and (2) Viscountess Ossington's trustees, the question for the opinion of the Court being "Whether the chairman of the Parish Council of the parish of Kilmarnock was entitled ex officio to act as a trustee under the said deed of trust?"

Argued for the first parties;—By the 21st section of the Local Government Act, 1894,* every reference in any deed to a parochial board was to be read as referring to a parish council, and if the reference in the trust-deed was so read the chairman of the Parish Council for the time being was clearly an ex officio trustee. Further, by the 22d section of the Act, a parish council "shall come in place of a parochial board, and shall be deemed to be a continuance thereof," and therefore the Parochial Board in question had not in a legal sense at all events "ceased to exist," and the event provided against by the truster had not occurred.

Argued for the second parties;—(1) The intention of the truster as expressed in the deed was clear. The deed spoke from the date of her death in 1889, when the reorganisation of local government was already in progress. The truster contemplated a probable change, and expressly provided for it by the insertion of the peculiar words, "so long as such board shall exist."[1] This it had ceased to do under the 21st section of the Act. The Parish Council differed in many essentials from the extinct body, and was not the same thing under a new name. (2) The "reference to the Parochial Board" in the trust-deed was merely for the purpose of describing the chairman individually, and was not a reference to the board in its corporate capacity such as was meant by section 21. Again, section 22 provided that the new body was to take the place of the old in regard to its corporate duties and liabilities, but that did not substitute the one chairman for the other in the management of a trust, with which the board as a body had nothing to do.

LORD TRAYNER.—By the trust-deed mentioned in this special case Lady Ossington appointed certain persons to be trustees to carry out and fulfil the purposes of the trust. One of the persons so appointed is thus described in the trust-deed,—"the chairman of the Parochial Board of the parish of Kilmarnock, and his successors for the time being, so long as such board shall exist." By virtue of the provisions of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, the Parochial Board of the parish of Kilmarnock ceased to hold office on 15th May 1895, and its chairman, according to the statement in the case before us, has ceased to act as a trustee, his office having "then expired." The chairman of the Parish Council, which, under the provisions of the statute I have cited, came in place of the parochial board, claims

* The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 58), enacts, section 21,—"On and after the 15th day of May in the year 1895 all enactments regulating the constitution and election of parochial boards shall be repealed, and the parochial board of any parish shall continue to hold office only until the said day, and no longer; and on and after such day every reference in any Act of Parliament, scheme, deed, or instrument to a parochial board constituted under the law in force at the passing of this Act shall be read and construed as referring to a parish council constituted under this Act."

Section 22,—"A parish council shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, come in place of a parochial board, and shall be deemed to be a continuance thereof; and a parish council shall have and may exercise all the powers and duties, and shall be subject to all the liabilities, of a parochial board. . . ."

right to act as a trustee under said trust, "as the successor in office of the chairman of the said parochial board," and whether that claim is well founded is the question we are asked to determine.

I think there is no room to doubt that in ordinary parlance the Parochial Board of the parish of Kilmarnock,—that is, the board which was formerly entrusted with the administration of the poor law, and that only, in the parish of Kilmarnock,—has ceased to exist, and that consequently the person who was chairman of that board no longer holding such office is no longer a trustee. But the first party to this case maintains that certain expressions in the 21st and 22d sections of the statute I have cited have conferred upon him the office of chairman of the parochial board, and that he is entitled as such to the vacant trusteeship. We must therefore look at these sections, for upon their interpretation and effect depends the answer to the question before us.

Section 21 provides that on and after the 15th May 1895 "every reference in any Act of Parliament, scheme, deed, or instrument to a parochial board . . . shall be read and construed as referring to a parish council constituted under this Act." This does not appear to me to support the claim of the first party. The reference to a "parochial board" in this section means a reference to the parochial board as such—as a collective body having well-recognised rights and duties—not merely a reference to the board incidentally, as in the present case, as part of the description or designation of one of its members. Section 22 again provides that "a parish council shall . . . come in place of a parochial board, and shall be deemed to be a continuance thereof." But to what effect and purpose this is to be deemed a continuance is made plain by the words which follow,—"And a parish council shall have and may exercise all the powers and duties, and shall be subject to all the liabilities, of a parochial board." In short, the meaning and effect of this clause is shortly and accurately stated in its rubric,—"Parish councils to take the place of parochial boards." All the duties incumbent on a parochial board are to be undertaken and performed by the parish council, and all the rights (of property or otherwise) and privileges of a parochial board are transferred to the parish council. In this sense, that the parish council in future should represent the parochial board in its rights and obligations, the one is to be deemed a continuance of the other, but only in this sense. As the trust in question was one with which the parochial board had no concern, so I think the parish council has nothing to do with it. And accordingly, I am of opinion that the chairman of the parish council cannot claim ex officio to be a trustee. I think, therefore, that the question put to us should be answered in the negative.

Succession—Vesting—Repugnancy—Power to trustees to postpone payment—Conditional institution of children of beneficiary dying before payment.—A testator, by the fifth purpose of his settlement, directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate in certain proportions among his children, "in the case of sons, upon their respectively attaining majority, and in the case of daughters, upon their respectively attaining majority or being married," with a clause of survivorship, which per se imported that vesting took place in the children as they respectively attained majority, or in the case of daughters, were married. By the sixth purpose he provided, —"With respect to the shares of the residue falling to my sons, I declare that the capital of the one-half thereof . . . shall not be payable to them before they shall respectively have attained the age of twenty-five years complete . . . declaring, nevertheless, that my trustees shall have power to pay to any of my sons the capital of the said half, in whole or in part, as soon after he shall have attained majority as they shall deem advisable, and that, on the other hand, my said trustees, if they shall consider it for the interest of any of my sons, shall have power to withhold payment of the capital of such half, in whole or in part, even after he shall have attained the age of twenty-five," and to pay him the income of the capital retained as an alimentary provision, "declaring also that in case any of my sons shall die after me and after attaining majority, but without having received payment of the whole of the capital of the above-mentioned half . . . the capital of such half, or so much thereof as shall remain in the hands of the trustees, shall be paid to the lawful issue of the body of such son," whom failing, to such persons as he should appoint by a revocable writing under his hand.

Held that the provisions of clause sixth were not repugnant to the gift in clause fifth, but were to be read as effectually qualifying that gift, and that portions of capital retained by the trustees from the share of a son in the exercise of the power conferred on them, and in their hands at the death of the son, leaving issue, did not vest in such son.

Succession—Trust—Power to withhold payment—Exercise of power.—A truster, after directing his trustees to divide the residue of his estate amongst his sons on their attaining majority, provided that the capital of one-half of their shares should not be payable to them until the age of twenty-five; "declaring, nevertheless, that my trustees shall have power to pay to any of my sons the capital of the said half, in whole or in part, as soon after he shall have attained majority as they shall deem advisable, and that, on the other hand, my said trustees, if they shall consider it for the interest of any of my sons, shall have power to withhold payment of the capital of such half . . . even after he shall have attained the age of twenty-five, . . . and that either during the remainder of his life or for such shorter period or periods as my said trustees shall from time to time determine," meantime paying him the interest.

One of the sons survived his father, and died two years after attaining the age of twenty-five, without having received payment of the whole of his one-half share of the residue. The trustees had not recorded any minute determining to exercise their power to withhold payment, but they had in point of fact not paid, without protest on the part of the son.

2D DIVISION.

MR JAMES FARQUHAR WHITE, of Balruddery, died on 5th September 1884, leaving a universal trust-disposition and settlement dated 14th February 1868, and several codicils thereto of various dates.

By the fifth purpose of his trust-disposition and settlement the testator appointed his trustees "to divide the residue of my estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, after answering the foregoing purposes, and all accumulations thereof, amongst the whole lawful children or remoter issue procreated or to be procreated of my body in such shares that James Martin White, my son, or his lawful issue, shall receive three shares, each of my other sons, or their lawful issue, two shares, and each of my daughters, or their lawful issue, one share, and that after my death, and in the case of sons upon their respectively attaining majority, and in the case of daughters upon their respectively attaining majority or being married, whichever of these events shall first happen; and in case any of my said sons shall predecease me or shall die in minority, or in case any of my daughters shall predecease me or shall die before attaining majority and without being married, the share of such deceasers shall fall and belong to his or her lawful issue, whom failing, to my other children or their issue, in the same proportions and subject to the same provisions as their original shares."

The sixth purpose was in these terms:—"Sixthly, With respect to the shares of the residue, original or accresced, falling to my sons, I declare that the capital of the one-half thereof, whether original or accresced, shall not be payable to them respectively before they shall respectively have attained the age of twenty-five years complete, but they shall receive the interest thereof from the time of their respectively attaining majority: Declaring nevertheless that my said trustees shall have power to pay to any of my sons the capital of the said half, in whole or in part, as soon after he shall have attained majority as they shall deem advisable, and that, on the other hand, my said trustees, if they shall consider it for the interest of any of my sons, shall have power to withhold payment of the capital of such half, in whole or in part, even after he shall have attained the age of twenty-five years complete, and that either during the remainder of his life, or for such shorter period or periods as my said trustees shall from time to time determine, and the interest on the capital so retained shall be paid to such son, yearly or half-yearly, as it falls due, for his aliment, and such interest shall not be assignable by him, nor subject to his debts or deeds or the diligence of his creditors: Declaring also that in case any of my sons shall die after me and after attaining majority, but without having received payment of the whole of the capital of the above-mentioned half of his shares, original or accresced, of the residue, the capital of such half, or so much thereof as shall remain in the hands of the trustees, shall be paid to the lawful issue of the body of such son, whom failing, to such person or persons as he shall have appointed by a revocable writing under his hand, and failing such appointment, to my other children, or their respective issue, in the same proportions and subject to the same provisions as their original shares."

By one of the codicils, dated 18th March 1876, the testator, inter alia, provided as follows:—"Declaring also with reference to the sale and disposal of my estate, wherever situated, that my trustees shall not be bound to realise the whole thereof unless they consider it necessary or proper, or the purposes of the trust shall in their opinion render it advisable to do so, but they shall have full power, and they are hereby specially authorised, any law or practice to the contrary notwithstanding, so long as they shall consider it advisable, to retain unrealised such property, shares, stocks, debentures, bonds, or other securities on which my said estate, or any part of it, may be invested at the time of my death, and to hold the same, at the values to be put thereon as after mentioned, as investments of my said estate under the trust: And further, with the view of enabling my trustees, in fulfilment of the purposes of the trust, to ascertain the amount of any of the shares of my said estate falling to be paid up or set aside, as provided for in the said trust-disposition and settlement, I hereby specially authorise and empower my trustees, from time to time as occasion may require, to put a value upon my said estate, and the whole securities on which the same may be invested for the time, and to hold the amount of such valuation to be the basis for ascertaining the amount of such share or shares falling to be paid over or set aside as aforesaid; and also, if they think proper, to appropriate and set aside such of the said securities or the values so put upon them as in full or in part payment of such shares falling to be paid or set aside as aforesaid; declaring that such values so to be put upon my estate, and securities on which the same is invested by my trustees, and their appropriation thereof, shall be final and binding upon all parties interested, and shall not be subject to challenge on any ground whatever: With power also to my trustees to hold and manage such parts of my estate remaining in their hands as may not be paid over or set aside as an aggregate fund for the joint behoof of the parties interested according to their several and respective rights and interests therein."

The testator was predeceased by his wife, and was survived by two sons and six daughters.

Alexander Sidney White, the testator's youngest son, was in minority at the date of his father's death, and attained majority on 29th March 1888.

Alexander Sidney White died on 4th November 1894, survived by his wife and by a pupil son and a pupil daughter, and leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 26th July 1894, with relative codicil, by which he conveyed to trustees for the purposes set forth, his whole means and estate, including the share of residue falling to him under his father's settlement.

After the death of Alexander Sidney White, questions arose as to whether certain sums forming part of the share of residue left to him and his issue by his father, but still in the hands of his father's trustees, had vested in him, or fell to his children as conditional institutes under the settlement.

No. 166.

June 20, 1896. White's Trustees v. White.

A special case was accordingly presented, from which the following facts appeared.

By minutes of meeting dated 8th July 1889, the trustees resolved that valuations of the trust-estate other than certain heritable properties should be obtained as at 30th June 1889, and that a scheme of division should be made up. The valuations having been obtained and the scheme of division made up, the trustees, on 6th November 1889, instructed the agents to submit the documents to the beneficiaries, and to prepare a deed of ratification and discharge for signature by the beneficiaries.

The deed of ratification and discharge so obtained was dated 2d May 1890 and subsequent dates, and proceeded on a narrative of the truster's settlement and codicils, and of the various steps taken by the trustees towards realising the estate, and on the further narrative that, with a view to an interim division, a state and scheme of division shewing the estate of the trust, and of the portion thereof of which an interim division was then to be made, had been made up, that the securities set forth in that state had been valued, and that the trustees, in place of realising same, were to make them over to the beneficiaries. The deed contained the following clauses,—"And now seeing . . . that the said trustees have allocated to me, the said Alexander Sidney White, the securities and cash of the value of £80,957, 11s. 6d., conform to column 'B' in the said scheme of division, and have made payment or accounted for to me for the sum of £48,000 thereof, and in virtue of the power conferred upon them by the said trust-disposition and settlement, and codicil thereto, the said trustees have retained and hold for my behoof the balance of £32,957, 11s. 6d.; . . . And we the said James Martin White and Alexander Sidney White hereby severally and respectively exoner, acquit, and simpliciter discharge the said" [trustees], "and their respective heirs, executors, and successors, and also the agents of the trustees, and all other persons whomsoever, of and from the foresaid several and respective sums of money and securities paid and allocated to us respectively: . . . Reserving always to us, the said James Martin White and Alexander Sidney White, and to us" [then followed the names of the daughters] "and our . . . children or remoter issue, or the persons entitled to claim through us . . . the respective shares falling to us . . . of the residue of the means and estate of the said deceased James Farquhar White, in so far as the same is not included in the said scheme of division."

Prior to the date of the foregoing deed, on 8th July 1889, the trustees, having in view that Mr J. Martin White, the elder son of the truster, had attained the age of twenty-five, and also the discretionary powers conferred upon them by the fifth and sixth heads of the truster's settlement, "resolved to pay the said Mr J. Martin White his share of the residue, under deduction of . . . a sum of £15,000 withheld by the trustees in virtue of the powers reserved to them under the sixth head of the settlement, and which sum of £15,000 shall be so withheld by the trustees during the remainder of the life of the said J. Martin White, or for such shorter period as the said trustees shall from time to time determine, and the interest of the said principal sum of £15,000 shall be paid to the said J. Martin White half-yearly as it falls due for his aliment."

There was no similar formal resolution by the trustees with respect to the balance of £32,957, 11s. 6d. referred to in the deed of ratification and discharge as retained for behoof of Alexander Sidney White, but after he attained the age of twenty-five (on 29th March 1892) the trustees continued to retain the whole of that sum and to pay him the interest accruing thereon until his death.

No. 166.

June 20, 1896. White's Trustees v. White.

It further appeared that after Alexander Sidney White's death the trustees made a final valuation and division, allocating to his share an additional sum of £5180, which they retained and held along with the £32,957, 11s. 6d. previously allocated, making together a balance of £38,137, 11s. 6d. in their hands.

The testator's trustees were the first parties to the special case, Alexander Sidney White's trustees were the second parties, and his children and their mother as their guardian under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, were the third parties.

The third parties contended that the intention of the testator, as expressed in the sixth purpose of his settlement, was that any portion of a son's share, beyond the half which was payable to him on his attaining majority, remaining in the hands of the trustees at the time of such son's death should be paid to the lawful issue of his body, and that only failing issue had such son power to test thereon.

The second parties contended that the direction contained in the latter part of the sixth purpose, to pay to the issue of any deceasing son any balance of the capital of his half share remaining in the hands of the trustees, referred only to such portion of the capital of a son's share as the trustees might have from time to time determined to retain for behoof of such son, and that no such determination having been come to by the trustees, the whole of Alexander Sidney White's share in the hands of his father's trustees was conveyed to his own trustees by his trust-disposition and settlement.

The first parties contended that in the event of the third parties being successful in their contention, they (the first parties) were, in terms of the fifth purpose of the trust-settlement, bound to hold the balance in their hands until the attainment of majority in the case of the son, and until that event or marriage in the case of the daughter, of Alexander Sidney White.

The questions of law were,—"1. Are the second parties, in virtue of the disposition in their favour contained in Mr A. Sidney White's trust-disposition and settlement, entitled to demand and receive from the first parties the portion of Mr A. Sidney White's share of his father's estate allocated to him in terms of the discharge quoted, but still in the hands of his father's trustees? 2. Are the second parties entitled to demand and receive from the first parties the share of the portion of Mr J. F. White's trust-estate unallocated at the date of Mr A. Sidney White's death? 3. If the first or second question be answered in the negative, is Mrs Sidney White, as guardian of her pupil children, entitled to receive the portion of Mr A. Sidney White's share of his father's estate referred to in the first question, and the share of the unallocated estate referred to in the second question, or either of them? 4. Are the first parties entitled and bound to retain said shares, or either of them, until the attainment of majority in the case of Ian Sidney White, or until that event or marriage in the case of Alison Marjorie White?"

Mr James Pitman, advocate, was appointed tutor ad litem to the pupil children.

Argued for the second parties;—Under his father's settlement Alexander White became entitled to payment of one-half of his share of the residue on his attaining the age of twenty-one, and he acquired a vested right in the other half on his attaining the age of twenty-five. The discretionary power given to the trustees in the sixth purpose of the deed was merely a power to postpone payment, and could not suspend vesting.[1] The last clause of that purpose, as to sons dying after the truster without having received payment of their shares of the half to be retained by the trustees, referred to the contingency of sons dying between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-five, and as Alexander White attained the age of twenty-five on 29th March 1892 his right to the share of the balance fully vested in him. In any view the clause could not receive effect, as it was repugnant to the gift of fee already given.[2] Further, it referred to such portion of the sons' shares as the trustees might in the exercise of their discretion have determined to retain for behoof of a son after he attained majority. Now, while the trustees had indicated by minute their intention to withhold the share of one of the sons, there was nothing whatever to shew that they intended to withhold payment of Alexander's share. On the contrary, they had allocated to him his share under the powers given to them by the codicil of 18th March 1876, and following thereon they had taken from him a discharge as fiar. It had never been held that a discretionary power had been exercised by trustees where they had done nothing to shew that they had exercised it.[3] The result was that the balance of Alexander's share of the residue in the hands of the trustees at the date of his death passed to his own trustees, and was carried by his settlement.

Argued for the third parties;—(1) The present case was unlike Miller's Trustees,[4] Lindsay's Trustees,[5] or M'Elmail v. Lundie's Trustees.[6] Alexander White had no vested proprietary right in the share in question of his father's estate. The declaration in the sixth purpose of the deed qualified the fifth purpose. It rendered the gift of fee conditional, and consequently suspended the vesting.[7] (2) Upon a sound construction of the trust-deed, Mr White's trustees had done all that was necessary. Where trustees were given a power to withhold or to postpone payment, the mere fact of doing so was a sufficient exercise of the power.[8] Here the deed said nothing as to the time and mode in which the power was to be exercised. Generally the trustees were given power to consider the matter from time to time according as circumstances might change. In any view the proceedings of the trustees, as disclosed in the minutes and discharge, shewed that they had applied their minds to the matter and duly exercised their discretion. The cases relied upon by the second parties contained no such declaration as occurred in the sixth purpose of the deed. In Weller v. Ker [1] the deed directed that the trustees' disapprobation must be minuted if it were to have effect in restricting the beneficiary to a liferent. Lastly, assuming that the third parties were entitled as maintained to succeed, the sixth clause negatived any idea of the first parties having to hold the fund for behoof of grandchildren till their majority or marriage. It followed from these considerations that the unpaid portion of Alexander's share was not carried by his settlement, but fell to be paid now to his widow as guardian of his pupil children.

Argued for the first parties;—In the event of the third parties being held entitled to the fund, the first parties were bound to hold their shares until respectively Alexander Sidney White's son attained majority, and his daughter attained majority or was married. The words "sons" and "daughters" in the vesting clause of the fifth purpose were intended to include grandchildren. When the truster in other parts of the deed referred to his own children, he markedly referred to them as "my sons" and "my daughters."

Lord Moncreiff.—Under the will of his father, James F. White, the late Alexander Sidney White was entitled under the conditions after mentioned to a share of the residue of James White's estate. Part of the share was paid to Alexander White in May 1890, but the balance of his share remained in the hands of his father's trustees at the date of his death. The first question which we have to decide in this special case is whether right to the balance which was not paid over vested in Alexander White. If it vested in him it passed to the parties of the second part, his testamentary trustees; if it did not vest, the parties of the third part, being his only children, are entitled to it under the express conditional institution in their favour in the settlement of James White.

The answer to the question depends upon the meaning and effect of the declaration at the close of the sixth purpose of James White's settlement. But for that declaration I do not think that there is anything in the earlier part of the deed which necessarily leads to a postponement or suspension of vesting. If the fifth purpose is taken by itself the shares of the sons vested at majority,—not a morte testatoris, because a survivorship clause prevents that, but at majority. But the sixth purpose qualifies and controls the fifth in several material particulars. It begins by declaring that the capital of one-half of the shares falling to the sons "shall not be payable to them respectively before they shall respectively have attained the age of twenty-five years complete." What follows shews that this declaration does no more than indicate the truster's views as to the time before which, in the absence of any special reason to the contrary, the remaining half should not be paid over, because immediately thereafter he confers upon his trustees a discretionary power, on any of his sons attaining majority, either to pay to him the whole of the remaining half of his share or part thereof, or, if they should think it for the son's interests to do so, to retain it or part thereof, not merely until he attained the age of twenty-five, but if necessary during the remainder of his life, meantime paying only the interest to him.

So far, important as are these modifications, they do not necessarily involve postponement of vesting or prevent testing. But when we come to the declaration which follows, I think it is clear that the truster contemplated, and expressly provided for, the contingency of the trustees not paying over the balance of a son's share on his attaining majority or twenty-five years, and the possibility of the son dying before receiving payment. The declaration is as follows:—"Declaring also that in case any of my sons shall die after me and after attaining majority, but without having received payment of the whole of the capital of the above-mentioned half of his shares, original or accresced, of the residue, the capital of such half, or so much thereof as shall remain in the hands of the trustees, shall be paid to the lawful issue of the body of such son, whom failing to such person or persons as he shall have appointed by a revocable writing under his hand, and failing such appointment, to my other children or their respective issue, in the same proportions, and subject to the same provisions, as their original shares."

I shall first consider the argument on the footing that this declaration, if effect be given to it, involves the result that Alexander White, having died without having received payment of the balance of his share, the capital passed to his lawful issue as conditional institutes.

The second parties, on this assumption, maintain that the declaration should not receive effect, because they say it is repugnant to the gift of fee in the fifth purpose of the trust. If it were repugnant, the general, though not the inflexible, rule of construction, would be to give effect to it as containing the later expression of the truster's intention; but it is too late to regard such a declaration as repugnant to the original bequest. It has been decided more than once in the House of Lords, that a power to trustees to restrict the right of a beneficiary to a liferent and settle the fee on his issue or other beneficiaries may be sustained as being a competent condition of the grant. This was notably decided in Chambers' Trustees v. Smith,[1] as decided by the House of Lords, 5 R. (H. L.) 151, reversing the decision of the First Division of this Court, and in the earlier case of Weller v. Ker.[2]

The ratio of those decisions I take to be that there, as here, there was not an unconditional gift of fee; that where such a discretionary power is conferred on trustees it is to be read as a condition of the bequest, and operates suspension of vesting until the share is actually paid over to the beneficiaries, even although a time of vesting is named in the deed.

This clearly appears from the opinions of Lord Young and Lord Shand in this Court and of the learned Lords in the House of Lords in the case of Chambers.[3]

Where, again, there is an unconditional gift of fee and no ulterior destination dependent on the exercise or non-exercise of the power, directions or powers given to trustees to manage or withhold the provision beyond the period of vesting will, except where necessary for trust purposes, be disregarded as inconsistent with the right of fee. The recent case of Miller's Trustees,[1] and Wilkie's Trustees v. Wight's Trustees,[2] are strong examples of this. Again, postponement of payment alone will not postpone vesting—Jamieson,[3] M'Elmail.[4]

Here the bequest made in the fifth purpose was not unconditional, being qualified by the wide-reaching provisions of the sixth purpose, and the terms of the declaration.

It remains to notice two other points which were urged on behalf of the second parties. It was maintained that the declaration only applies to the period between the attainment of majority and the attainment of twenty-five years by the son, and that as Mr Alexander White attained the age of twenty-five years on 29th March 1892, right to the balance fully vested in him. I think that this contention is untenable, because the discretionary power given to the trustees may be exercised even after the beneficiary has attained the age of twenty-five years as well as before that period.

There is more difficulty about the remaining argument, which was to the effect that as there is no minute shewing that the trustees resolved to retain the balance after Alexander White reached the age of twenty-five, and as the balance was under the will payable on his attaining that age, the maxim quod fieri debet infectum valet applies. Now, in the first place, I think it clear that the words "die without having received payment" in this case do not admit of the interpretation which was put upon similar words in the case of Chalmers' Trustees.[5] There the words "should die previous to payment" were interpreted not as meaning previous to the actual receipt and payment of the provision, but previous to the time at which the testator had declared the provision to be payable, viz., majority. In the case of Chalmers' Trustees,[5] however, there was nothing to indicate that the truster intended or contemplated postponement of distribution, as in the case of Howat's Trustees v. Howat, &c.,[6] and Macdougall v. M'Farlane's Trustees,[7] and as in this case.

If, however, it had been clear that there was an express direction to pay to the beneficiary, on his attaining the age of twenty-five years, and that the trustees were in fault in not then making payment, the second parties might have been entitled to prevail. But, first, the deed only says that the balance "shall not be payable to them respectively before they shall have respectively attained the age of twenty-five years complete." Secondly, I find no statement or admission that the trustees were in any way in fault in delaying to pay, or that they did not retain the balance of Alexander White's share under the power conferred upon them. On the contrary, it appears from a discharge signed by Alexander White on 2d May 1890, at which time the trustees might if they had thought proper have paid over to him the whole of the balance (he having attained majority on 29th March 1888) that the trustees retained and held the balance in virtue of the power conferred upon them by the settlement, which was a power to retain even after the son attained the age of twenty-five.

I may observe in passing that, in my opinion, nothing turns upon the allocation of certain securities to satisfy Alexander White's share, which the trustees made, I presume, under the codicil of 18th March 1876. That allocation was not equivalent to payment to Alexander White, or an acknowledgment that the trustees held for him alone. It only operated as an appropriation of particular securities at specified values for behoof of all the parties (including Alexander White), who might ultimately be found entitled to that share or part thereof.

Further, the trust-deed does not make it imperative that the trustees should minute their resolution to retain the balance. In point of fact they did retain it without objection on the part of Alexander White for upwards of two years after he had attained majority, and I think that, in order to overcome the express declaration in the sixth purpose, the second parties required to shew by the clearest evidence or admission that, in withholding payment until after Alexander White's death, the trustees acted contrary to their duty, and in excess of their powers. This, in my opinion, they have failed to do.

I therefore think that the first question must be answered in the negative. The second question, which I take it refers to a further balance of about £5000 which was not allocated to Alexander White's share before his death, should also be answered in the negative.

The third and fourth questions have, in this view, to be considered. I think that the third question should be answered in the affirmative and the fourth in the negative. Mr James White's trustees are directed in the event which has happened, of Alexander White dying without having received payment of the balance, to pay the same to the lawful issue of his body. The only ground on which it is maintained for the first parties that they should retain the balance is, that in the fifth purpose it is declared that payment is to be made in the case of sons only on their attaining majority, and in the case of daughters on their attaining majority or being married. But I am of opinion that the words sons and daughters apply only to the truster's children, and not to remoter descendants.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN April 1896 John M'Aulay, mason, Crosslee, Johnstone, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company for damages on account of personal injuries sustained by him.

The pursuer averred that on 15th January 1896 he was a passenger on the defenders' line from Johnstone to Elderslie by a workman's train leaving Johnstone at 5.24 A.M. (Cond. 3) "The station at Elderslie is not lighted at all by the railway company, and when some yards from the platform of that station the train stopped, but at that time it had not reached the said platform." (Cond. 4) "About 300 yards before entering the station platform, and in a line with, up to, and abutting the coping of the platform, is a parapet wall which reaches to the footboard of the carriage, and resembles the station platform, although it is narrow." (Cond. 5) "On the train stopping, the pursuer in the darkness stepped out on to the parapet wall, where there is a bridge over the Glasgow, Paisley, and Johnstone Canal, thinking it to be the station platform owing to the darkness, and the fact that the defenders systematically were in the habit of leaving Elderslie Station unlit. The pursuer, along with the other passengers, believed, and was justified in believing, that the train had arrived at the station platform." (Cond. 6) "When he discovered where he was he turned round to re-enter the carriage, but the train started suddenly and without any previous warning, and the pursuer was precipitated over the parapet on to the ground, a distance of 10 feet, and was injured. In consequence of said accident defenders now light the station in the morning."

In defence the railway company pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant.

On 29th May 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) allowed a proof before answer.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial, and lodged an issue for the trial of the cause.

On the motion for the approval of the issue, the defenders objected to the relevancy of the action, and argued;—The action was irrelevant, for the pursuer's averments did not shew that his injuries were due to fault on the part of the defenders. The existence of the parapet wall plainly was not such fault. Nor was it fault that the train stopped at the parapet wall on the occasion in question, and no warning was given to passengers that they were not at a station; railway companies were under no obligation to warn passengers that they were not at a station whenever they stopped between stations. It was said that Elderslie Station was not lighted, but the want of light had nothing to do with the accident to the pursuer. If the station had been lighted, and he had got out at the parapet wall, the accident would have occurred exactly as it did. To infer liability against a railway company for injuries to a passenger through his getting out of the train at a dangerous place, the railway company must have given the passenger an express or implied invitation to alight. Here there had been no such invitation. The fact that a station was not lighted did not justify a passenger in supposing that the stoppage of the train meant the station. Passengers were expected to use their intelligence in getting into and out of trains.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer did not put his case so high as to say that every time a train stopped on its journey passengers were justified in believing that they were at a station. His case was that, in the circumstances averred by him, when he got out of the train on the morning in question, he was justified in believing that he was at Elderslie Station. No doubt a railway company would not be liable if they did not invite passengers to alight, but the invitation might consist in not warning passengers that they were not at a station where the circumstances were such as to impose on the company the duty of warning. Here the circumstances imposed that duty on the defenders. According to the pursuer's averments, the parapet wall was practically a continuation of the platform, except in the matters of breadth and want of protection on the offside from the train, and the station was not lighted. In such circumstances if the company chose to stop their train when it was dark at the parapet wall and give the passengers no warning, they took the risk of passengers getting out under the belief that it was the station; had the station been lighted that might have been sufficient to distinguish the wall from the platform. At all events the question was a jury one, and the pursuer's averments were sufficient to entitle him to go to a jury.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a curious case. It is not alleged that anything the railway company did or failed to do at the place where the accident occurred was the cause of the accident; the fault alleged lay in something that occurred at another place. The allegation is that when the train stopped the pursuer made the mistake of getting out, thinking that he was at the station, and stepped on to the parapet of a bridge in the belief that he was stepping on to the platform. One would have expected some other explanation, but such is the averment. I cannot conceive how he could make such a mistake. I cannot see how such an accident could take place unless it was so dark that he could not see at all. It is a mistake for which I cannot see that the defenders are responsible. To say that if a train stops anywhere a passenger is therefore entitled to assume that the train is at a platform is surely absurd. I am of opinion that the pursuer has not stated a relevant case.

LORD YOUNG.—The only doubt I have arises from the case of Whittaker,[1] but that case is distinguishable. The train there had arrived at the station, and the name of the station was called out, so that the Judge and jury thought it was a reasonable invitation to the passengers to alight. The carriage had overshot the platform, and a passenger answered the invitation by getting out and was injured. The verdict in that case was upheld. In this case the train was not at a station, and nothing happened which could be regarded as an invitation to alight; there was nothing to shew the arrival at a station. The pursuer says he thought he had arrived at a station. What was the actionable fault? The pursuer says that the Elderslie Station, which was 300 yards off, was never lighted, and that he might therefore reasonably think that he was at the station. That is not sufficient, and does not bring this case within the rule in Whittaker.[1] of the Thellusson Act the rents of a testator's heritage fell as they accrued to his heir-at-law at the time, and the income of his moveable estate to his next of kin, and where the heir-at-law was one of the next of kin, held that the heir-at-law was entitled to a share of the income of the moveable estate without collating.

JOHN LOGAN, pawnbroker in Glasgow, died on 30th March 1871, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees for the purposes therein mentioned. Inter alia, he directed his trustees to pay certain legacies, and to pay annuities of £50 each to his widow and to his daughters Alice and Elizabeth, and an annuity of £12 to his sister. With regard to the residue of his estate he directed,—"Lastly, upon the death of the last survivor of my said spouse and sister, and my daughters Alice and Elizabeth, or at such other time thereafter as my trustees shall think proper, my trustees shall realise and convert into cash my whole estate and effects, and, after meeting or providing for the foregoing purposes, so far as the same shall not have been previously met or provided for, divide the residue and remainder of my said means and estate equally among my sons William Logan and Charles Logan, and my daughter Mrs Mary Ann Logan or Shannon, or the lawful issue of them respectively per stirpes, and the lawful issue per stirpes of my daughters Elizabeth Logan or M'Dermott and Alice Logan, and in the event of any of my said sons and daughters dying without leaving lawful issue, the share or shares that would have fallen to such deceaser of my said sons and my daughter Mrs Mary Ann Logan or Shannon, or to the lawful issue per stirpes of such deceaser of my said daughters Elizabeth Logan or M'Dermott and Alice Logan, shall accresce to the share or shares falling to the survivors of my said sons and my daughter Mrs Mary Ann Logan or Shannon, or the lawful issue respectively per stirpes of such of them as shall predecease the foresaid period of division leaving such issue, and to the lawful issue per stirpes of such of my said daughters Elizabeth and Alice dying leaving such issue: And it is hereby declared that the shares of residue effeiring to my said sons William and Charles, and my daughter Mrs Mary Ann Logan or Shannon, or their lawful issue respectively, and to the lawful issue of my said daughters Elizabeth and Alice, shall become vested interests in their persons at and only upon the arrival of the period of division above mentioned."

Mr Logan was survived by his widow (who died a few years after him), and by the two sons and three daughters mentioned in his settlement. Of these children, William Logan died on 30th May 1879, survived by a widow, in whose favour he left a general disposition and settlement appointing her his executrix and general disponee, and Mrs Mary Ann Shannon died intestate in 1883, survived by several children. The other children survived at the date of this case.

The estate left by the testator consisted of both moveable and heritable property, but after payment of debts and legacies there was practically no moveable estate left in the hands of the trustees. The heritable estate was of considerable value, and after providing for the annuities directed by the settlement a considerable sum was annually accumulated in the hands of the trustees. In 1892 the value of the heritable estate left by the testator was estimated to be about £8000, the rental being about £600 annually. At the same date the income accumulated in the hands of the trustees amounted to £7870.

June 24, 1896. Logan's Trustees v. Logan.

In view of questions arising under the Thellusson Act,* a special case was presented by the following parties:—First, John Logan's trustees: Second, the widow and general disponee of William Logan, who maintained that, as representing her husband, who was the heir in heritage of John Logan at the date of his death, she was entitled to the surplus income derived from John Logan's heritable estate since 30th March 1892 (being twenty-one years from the date of the testator's death), and to continue to receive it as it should become due: Third, Catherine Logan and others, the heirs in moveables, or the representatives of the heirs in moveables of John Logan, at the date of his death, who maintained (1) that the whole estate of John Logan became moveable by virtue of the provisions of his trust-disposition and settlement, and that the surplus income must be treated as moveable, and that they were accordingly entitled to the whole of the same after 30th March 1892; or (2) alternatively, that the accumulations of the rents and profits from the heritable estate which had accrued between the date of John Logan's death and 30th March 1892 formed part of the moveable estate of the trust, and that they were entitled to the surplus income of the same: Fourth, Charles Logan, the heir in heritage of John Logan after William Logan's death on 30th May 1879, who maintained that he was entitled to the free income of the whole heritable estate from 30th March 1892 until the trust-estate became divisible: Fifth, Mrs Elizabeth M'Laughlin and others as heirs in mobilibus of John Logan, as at 30th March 1892, who maintained that they were entitled to receive the surplus income from 30th March 1892: Sixth, children of John Logan's daughter Elizabeth, who claimed the surplus income as residuary legatees under his settlement.

The judgment of the Court was asked on the following questions:—"1. Is the surplus income of the trust-estate accruing during the period between the testator's death and the final division of the trust-estate undisposed of by the testator? 2. If there is an implied direction to accumulate the said income, is such accumulation subsequent to 30th March 1892 prohibited by the Thellusson Act? 3. Are the whole estates left by the testator to be treated as moveable in virtue of the terms of the said trust-disposition and settlement? 4. Are the accumulations of the rents and profits of the heritable estate which have accrued from the date of the testator's death till 30th March 1892 part of the moveable estate of the trust? 5. Are the parties entitled to succeed to such of the surplus income as is held to be moveable estate (a) the heirs in mobilibus of the testator as at the date of his death; or (b) the heirs in mobilibus of the testator as at 30th March 1892; or (c) the heirs in mobilibus of the testator when such income accrued or may accrue? 6. Is the party entitled to succeed to such of the surplus income as is held to be heritable estate (a) the second party as representing the heir-at-law of the testator as at the date of his death; or (b) the fourth party who is the heir-at-law of the testator as at March 1892; or (c) the heir-at-law at the time when such income accrued or may accrue? 7. In the event of the fourth party's claim as heir in heritage being sustained, is he also entitled to a share of such of the estate as may be held to be moveable as one of the third or fifth parties as the case may be?"

* The Thellusson Act (39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 98) enacts as follows:—"Whereas it is expedient that all dispositions of real or personal estates, whereby the profits and produce thereof are directed to be accumulated, and the beneficial enjoyment thereof is postponed, should be made subject to the restrictions hereinafter contained . . . be it enacted . . . that no person or persons shall, after the passing of this Act, by any deed or deeds, . . . settle or dispose of any real or personal property so and in such manner that the rents, issues, profits, or produce thereof, shall be wholly or partially accumulated for any longer term than the life or lives of any such grantor or grantors, settler or settlers, or the term of twenty-one years from the death of any such grantor, settler, devisor, or testator, . . . and in every case when any accumulation shall be directed otherwise than as aforesaid, such direction shall be null and void, and the rents, issues, profits, and produce of such property so directed to be accumulated, shall, so long as the same shall be directed to be accumulated contrary to the provisions of this Act, go to and be received by such person or persons as would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed."

Argued for the second party;—This party assumed, and indeed it could not be disputed, that there was here an implied direction to accumulate to which the Thellusson Act applied.[1] Vesting being postponed, the prohibited accumulations were undisposed of and fell into intestacy. Two classes of cases had come before the Court. Where there was a present gift burdened with a direction to accumulate, the accumulations after twenty-one years fell to be paid to the donee,[2] but where there was no present gift they fell into intestacy.[3] It followed that, as the estate from which the accumulations were derived was heritable, they were heritable also, for the direction to realise the residue of the estate when the period of final division arrived could not affect the character of that part of the estate which had fallen into intestacy. If the accumulations were heritable estate they fell to the second party as the representative of the heir-at-law of the testator as at the date of the testator's death.[1] That was the date to be looked at, and not the date when the accumulations fell due. Campbell's Trustees[4] seemed to decide otherwise, but must be held to have been wrongly decided, being inconsistent with Lord v. Colvin,[1] and the other cases in which that decision had been followed.

Argued for the third parties;—The whole estate was moveable in virtue of the direction to convert,[5] and the accumulations were therefore moveable. At anyrate the funds accumulated in the hands of the trustees were moveable. The accumulations fell into intestacy, and the parties entitled thereto were the testator's heirs in moveables. These must be looked for as at the testator's death.[6]

Argued for the fourth party;—The Thellusson Act applied, and there being no present gift or vested right, the prohibited accumulations fell into intestacy. Being the income of heritable estate, they were themselves heritable, for the direction to convert could not affect estate liberated by the operation of the Thellusson Act before that direction took effect.[7] If heritable, the accumulations fell to the person who was heir-at-law of the deceased at the date when they accrued.[1] Nor was he bound to collate in order to participate in the proceeds of the funds accumulated prior to 1892, as this was not a case of ordinary intestate succession.

Argued for the fifth parties;—The estate was moveable and the accumulations fell to the heirs in moveables of the deceased, but these were to be looked for at the date when the accumulations accrued.[1]

Argued for the sixth parties;—Although the Thellusson Act applied the result was not necessarily intestacy. The testator's intentions must, so far as possible, be carried out. The funds which could no longer be accumulated should therefore be paid over to his residuary legatees.[2]

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—The subject of dispute between the parties may be considered under three heads. (1) Is there an implied direction to accumulate rents, so that the income of the heritable property falls under the operation of the Thellusson Act? (2) Assuming that the residue of the truster's estate does not vest until the period of distribution, so that the surplus income cannot be treated as residue, is this income heritable or moveable as to succession? (3) If the income is heritable, who is the heir?

On the first point I think there is no room for doubt. If a truster directs that to be done which as a consequence leads to indefinite accumulation, he must, within the meaning of the statute, be taken to have directed accumulation. This is the principle of the decision in Lord v. Colvin,[3] where the cause of the accumulation was the failure of the parties to whom the testator had left the intermediate income of his estate. Here, the income of the trust-estate is undisposed of; and if the trustees were to act up to the letter of the will, they would be under the necessity of adding the income year by year to the capital until the arrival of the period of vesting. I think this is a plain case of accumulation contrary to the express provisions of the statute.

On the second point it is only necessary to read the residuary destination in the last trust purpose, to see that the beneficiaries cannot be ascertained until after the failure by death of the truster's spouse and sister, and his daughters Alice and Elizabeth. Then the principle to be applied is stated by Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff in the case of Stirling-Maxwell,[4]—"If the fund directed to be accumulated is not the subject of any present gift, the right of the eventual beneficiary will not be accelerated or arise at the term of twenty-one years. . . . But if there be a present gift of the fund itself, and the direction to accumulate be only a burden on the gift, then the burden will terminate at the expiration of twenty-one years."

In the case before us there is certainly no present gift of the residue; and as the income cannot lawfully be accumulated for the benefit of unknown residuary legatees, it must go to heirs-at-law, or to next of kin. But in considering who is entitled to the income, it is necessary to distinguish the sources from which the residue is derived, because the existing residue consists in part of the truster's heritable estate, and in part of the rents which have been lawfully accumulated during the permitted period of twenty-one years.

As regards the rents of the truster's heritable estate, my opinion is that these, as they fall due, are heritable, and that the principle of constructive conversion is inapplicable. In the argument addressed to us on this subject our attention was called to the introductory part of the last trust purpose, where the truster directs his trustees to "realise and convert into cash" his whole estate and effects, with a view to distribution. If we were here considering the devolution of a share of residue given under the will, I should think it perfectly clear that the heritable estate was constructively converted, and that the next of kin of the beneficiary were the persons entitled to take as his representatives. But then it is settled law that constructive conversion in virtue of a direction to sell only exists and takes effect for the purposes of the trust, and it cannot well be said that the application of surplus income in terms of an Act of Parliament is one of the purposes of this will.

If the question were, who is entitled to take a heritable subject, or a share of heritage, which in a certain event is undisposed of, the answer must be the heir in heritage; and I am unable in this question to distinguish between the undisposed of capital and undisposed of income, because the principle is that the heir cannot be displaced except by giving the estate to another. I think the reasoning of Lord Barcaple in Thomas v. Tennent[1] and of the Lord President in the case of Cowan,[2] apply just as truly to the case of estate set free by the operation of an Act of Parliament, as to cases of proper intestate succession arising through the failure of the objects of a trust; and if this view be well founded, it follows that the rents which accrue after accumulation ceases are heritable.

Again, with respect to the income which has accrued and may accrue by the investment of the rents which were lawfully accumulated during the permitted period of twenty-one years, I am of opinion that such income must go to the truster's next of kin, because, as soon as these rents were lawfully reduced into possession by the trustees, for the purposes of the trust, they became moveable in every sense, and the income derived from their investment is also moveable. I need hardly add that next of kin are always ascertained at the death of the intestate. There are no other next of kin known to the law.

On the third point, my opinion is, that the right to uplift rents which are not disposed of by the will falls under the heir's title of apparency. It is, of course, an elementary rule that the apparent heir has a title to receive the rents of his ancestor's estate, and this title must subsist until it is displaced by a better title.

I do not think it is possible in the actual circumstances of this trust to make up a title to rents in genere, and it follows, in my opinion, that each termly payment as it accrues vests in the heir-apparent, that is, in the person who, at the time, has the character of nearest heir of the truster. My view is supported by the judgment of the other Division of the Court in the case of Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell,[1] and I desire to express my concurrence in the reasoning of Lord Rutherfurd Clark on this point.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD ADAM.—(The following opinion of Lord Adam, who was absent when the case was advised, was read by Lord Kinnear):—The late John Logan died on 30th March 1871, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which he conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to trustees for certain purposes.

Inter alia, he directed his trustees, who are the first parties to this case, to pay out of the annual proceeds of his estates an annuity of £50 to his wife during her life or widowhood, an annuity of £50 to each of his daughters Alice and Elizabeth, and an annuity of £12 to his sister Mrs King. Lastly, he directed his trustees on the death of the last survivor of his spouse, sister, and daughters Alice and Elizabeth, to realise and convert into cash his whole estate, heritable and moveable, and divide the residue equally among his sons William and Charles, and his daughter Mrs Shannon, or their lawful issue respectively, and among the lawful issue of his daughters Elizabeth and Alice, but it was declared that their shares of the residue should only become vested in their persons at and only upon the arrival of the period of division.

The truster's daughters Alice and Elizabeth are still alive, so that the period of division has not arrived, and consequently no right to a share of the residue has vested in the persons named as residuary legatees, but their contingent interest in the residue is represented in this case by the parties of the sixth part, who are the children of the truster's daughter Elizabeth Logan or M'Dermott.

It appears that after providing for payment of the annuities the income of the estate has been largely in excess of the expenditure. That income is now derived from the income of the original estate left by the truster, which appears to be entirely heritable, and from the income derived from the accumulations of the surplus income which has been invested from time to time.

The period of twenty-one years from the truster's death expired on 30th March 1892, and the principal questions raised in this case are whether the Thellusson Act applies, and if so who are the parties entitled to the surplus income subsequent to the 30th March 1892, first, from the heritable estate left by the truster, and second, from the before-mentioned accumulations.

It seems to me to be very clear that there is an implied direction to accumulate the surplus income in this case, and that therefore the Thellusson Act applies to the effect of prohibiting such accumulation after the 30th March 1892. It is also sufficiently clear that the surplus income must now be paid over to some one or other of the claimants who can shew a present right to it; but as the residue has not vested in the residuary legatees, and they have no present right to it, and may never have any right at all, they can have no right to the surplus income, and that disposes of the claim of the sixth parties.

Logan's Trustees v. Logan.

The Act says that the direction to accumulate beyond twenty-one years shall be null and void, and that the proceeds of the property so directed to be accumulated shall go to such person or persons as would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed. Now, as the only testamentary direction with regard to this surplus income is null and void, it seems to follow that it must be treated as estate not disposed of by the truster, and therefore to go to the person entitled to succeed to him therein ab intestato at the time of his death. But the estate left by the truster was entirely heritable, therefore it seems to me the surplus income subsequent to 30th March 1892, in so far as derived from that estate, must go to the heir in heritage of the truster at the time of his death, or to the person now representing him,—that is, to the party of the second part.

The future income derived and to be derived from the accumulations of surplus income during the period of twenty-one years appears to me to be in a different position. That income was properly received and administered by the trustees during that period. Although derived from heritable estate it became moveable in their hands. But the truster must be held to have given no direction as to the disposal of the future income derived from these accumulations, and being derived from moveable estate I think it must go to the truster's heirs in moveables at the date of his death, or to their representatives,—that is, to the third parties to this case.

I am therefore of opinion that the first question should be answered to the effect that the surplus income accruing after the period of twenty-one years from the truster's death is undisposed of; that the second question should be answered in the affirmative, the third in the negative, the fourth in the affirmative, question five (a) in the affirmative, six (a) in the affirmative.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred with LORD M'LAREN.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Answer the first and second questions in the affirmative: Find, in answer to the third question, that the rents subsequent to 30th March 1892 are heritable, and fall to the heir for the time being: Answer question four and questions five (a) and six (c) in the affirmative: Find, in answer to the seventh question, that a party who is heir and also one of the next of kin may take a share of the moveables as well as the rents falling to him by statute."

Sale—Sale of second-hand machinery—Disconformity to description—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. c. 71), sec. 11, subsec. 2, and sec. 13.—A firm of machinery merchants sold a second-hand four-horse power nominal gas-engine, described as in "excellent order," "running up to about a week ago," and "a great bargain at this price,"—£47, 10s. When the engine was delivered on 22d October 1895, the buyer found that it would not work, and an engineer sent by the sellers to inspect it also found that it would not work. He reported that it would require an expenditure of £8, 10s. to put it right, and the sellers offered, on 16th December, to execute these repairs. This offer was refused by the buyer, who required the engine for an immediate and temporary purpose, and had supplied himself with another engine.

In an action by the sellers for the price, the evidence led by them shewed that the engine had been working up to about a week before the sale; that certain breakages absolutely prevented the engine from working; that these breakages could be repaired at a cost of about £1 or £1, 10s.; but that so repaired it could not work up to more than 5½ actual horse-power, instead of 7, the proper amount for a four-horse power nominal engine. To bring it up to that horse-power certain parts which had been worn through ordinary wear and tear would have to be renewed, these latter repairs being included in those which the sellers offered to execute.

The sellers contended that the buyer was not entitled to reject, as the breakages could be repaired at trifling cost, and as deterioration from tear and wear was to be expected in a second-hand machine.

Held that the engine was disconform to description, and that the buyer was entitled to reject it.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Fife and Kinross.

ON 16th October 1895 Roberts & Company, machinery merchants, Leeds, wrote to David Yule, Abbotshall Mills, Kirkcaldy,—"We have pleasure in bringing to your notice, 10,245 one 4 h.-p. 'Stockport,' by the well-known makers, Messrs Andrews & Co., with tank and all accessories. This engine is in excellent order, and was running up to within about a week ago, when we pulled it out to replace with a new 8 h.-p. nominal. There was no fault of it being taken out, but simply because it was too small. It would be put on rails, Leeds, for £47, 10s., and as it is really in excellent condition, it is a great bargain at this price, and will soon go. You need not be afraid of ordering it without seeing, but, of course, we should be only too pleased to shew it you or to any one else you may depute, by giving us a clear day's notice so that our Mr Roberts could be about."

On 17th October the following telegrams passed between the parties:—

Yule to Roberts & Company.—"Offer forty-five delivered Kirkcaldy. Wire forward immediately if accepted."

Roberts & Company to Yule.—"Will deliver Kirkcaldy for £47, 10s. Cannot do better. Bargain. Wire instantly."

Yule to Roberts & Co.—"Accept your offer. Send at once."

These telegrams were duly confirmed by letters between the parties, also dated 17th October; and on that day Roberts & Company wrote another letter to Yule, in which they said,—"Thanking you for your order for gas-engine. You will be pleased to hear that we have been looking at it this afternoon personally, and have to say that it is about the best second-hand gas-engine we have ever sold, and you have really got a bargain. All the parts are very good, and scarcely worn; in fact it has done very little work, and we have replaced it with a larger one."

The gas-engine arrived at Kirkcaldy on 22d October, and Yule, after getting the gas company to lay down piping for the introduction of gas, employed Thomas Bernard, a local engineer, who had had experience in the erection of gas-engines, to erect and work the engine. After erecting the engine Bernard found that it could not be made to work, and on 12th November Yule wrote to Roberts & Company intimating this.

No. 169.

June 24, 1896.
Roberts & Co. v. Yule.

Roberts & Company replied next day, expressing their surprise, and suggesting some slight remedies.

Yule replied on the 15th November,—"The engineer has again tried the engine, but can make nothing of it. I would suggest that you should get Messrs Andrews [the makers of the engine] to send one of their men. I presume they have men in Scotland."

Roberts & Company replied next day that the engine "was running splendidly when we bought it here, and certainly it is no fault of the gas-engine, but must be the fault of your men fixing the connections, &c.; of this we are absolutely certain, and it is a pity if any ordinary mechanic cannot make it work right. However, we have asked our friends, Messrs Andrews, for whom we are agents, if they have any men in Scotland who can look at it," and in a subsequent letter Roberts & Company intimated that the engineer attached to Messrs Andrews' Glasgow agency would be sent.

On 2d December Yule wrote to Roberts & Company:—"Messrs Andrews' man has not yet turned up here, and as I cannot afford to wait longer, I will require to look out for something else, unless it is set agoing this week."

Messrs Andrews' engineer at Glasgow—a man named Price—inspected the engine on 9th December, having been unable to come earlier through ill-health; and on the same day Yule wrote to Roberts & Company,—"The engineer from Glasgow called here to-day in connection with the gas-engine, and along with Mr Bernard tried to start it, but without any result, and no doubt he will be sending you his report to-day. I will leave him to tell his own story. . . . I enclose Messrs Bernard's account, and on receipt of your cheque will return the engine to your order at Kirkcaldy Station."

Roberts & Company replied on 16th December,—"Referring to the 4 h.-p. 'Stockport' gas-engine we sold to you, we have been having some considerable correspondence with works respecting this matter, and we have decided to make it right by putting in a new liner, and new piston rings, and a new mushroom valve box, &c., as recommended by the engineer who came to inspect on our behalf. We have requested the works to have this done immediately, and yon may rely upon it being done in a businesslike manner, and it will then work all right.

"This will be a very serious thing to us indeed, but we do it rather than put you to any more inconvenience, and to keep up to the description given you."

Yule replied next day that he regretted he could not keep the engine now, as he could not wait longer, and had to get a machine elsewhere.

As Yule declined to recede from this position, Roberts & Company, on 22d January, brought an action against him in the Debts Recovery Court, at Kirkcaldy, for the price of the engine.

A proof was allowed.

Price, Andrews & Company's engineer, as a witness for the pursuers, deponed,—"On trying to start the engine I discovered that it would not start, therefore I had to take it to pieces to discover where the defect was. On pulling out the piston I discovered that one of the three working piston rings was broken, also one of the junk rings and one of the compression rings. The half of the compression ring was off. This would prevent the engine from working, these breakages being at vital points. On further examination of the engine I discovered that the mushroom valve was a little worn. The mushroom valve is that by which the air and gas is let into the explosive chamber; the effect of the mushroom valve being worn was that it would not allow the valve to come down on its seat, and consequently there was a loss of pressure. I examined the cylinder lining. There was nothing defective in its construction, only ordinary wear and tear. I put the engine together again. I tried to start it. I found that it would not go. I did not expect it to go under the circumstances, the breakages that I have mentioned being sufficient to prevent it working. . . . I pulled the engine to pieces again, and minutely inspected the cylinder lining, and I found this was worn one-sixteenth of an inch, and this, together with the broken piston rings and junk rings, is the cause of the engine not starting. I reported on the defects. . . . I consider a new liner and new piston rings, and the new mushroom valve box, as ordinary repairs to second-hand engines. After these are done the engine is practically as good as new. Messrs Andrews sell such engines after they have had such repairs put on them from £70 to £80. They usually give the same guarantee with a second-hand engine so repaired as they do with a new engine. A second-hand engine so repaired is as good as a new one so far as the working parts are concerned. A person acquainted with gas-engines would not expect to get a second-hand 4 h.-p. engine thoroughly overhauled for £47, 10s. He would assume from the price that such a 4 h.-p. engine would require some overhauling. . . . I reported that I would make the engine right by putting in a new liner, a new set of rings, a new mushroom valve, and a new compression ring. The engine then would be practically new. These repairs would have taken me four days to execute. The defect of the liner was caused by the ordinary tear and wear, and the action of the gas-engine. . . . There is nothing incredible in the statement that this engine, before being sent here, might have been working with the worn liner and doing very well, but not with the broken rings. . . . It might have been working quite well even although the rings were worn, even old rings. There would be a little escape of compression owing to the tear and wear of the liner and the rings. The loss of compression might depreciate the horse-power to the extent of 1½ horse-power. A 4 h.-p. nominal engine works up to 7 h.-p. actually if required,—that is, when the engine is taxed to its full power. My 1½ means 1½ off 7. Notwithstanding this slight escape of compression this engine might have been a good working 4 h.-p. engine before it came here. . . . The liner was not too far gone for the repairs that I have mentioned [i.e., the renewal of the broken rings.] The engine would work with a good deal less than my report, three new piston rings and a new compression ring would make it work as a second-hand engine. . . . Roughly speaking the cost of three new piston rings and a compression ring, which would make it go as a second-hand machine, would be £1 to £1, 10s." In cross-examination, witness further deponed,—"(Q.) As a skilled engineer, would you consider that this engine could have been describable as one of the best second-hand engines ever seen? (A.) My answer to that would be that I would consider it a fairly good second-hand machine. . . . When an engine is advertised as 4 h.-p., that means 4 h.-p. nominal, unless stated otherwise. (Q.) Supposing you knew that it had lost 1½ h.-p., would you still advertise it as a 4 h.-p. engine? (A.) Yes, as a 4 h.-p. second-hand engine."

Roberts & Co. v. Yule.

Arthur Roberts, the sole member of the pursuers' firm, deponed that he had "seen the engine running and working about a week or ten days before it was taken out of the yard in which it was working" before being removed to the pursuers' premises, and that it remained in their premises for about a week before being sent to the defender. Witness further deponed that the total cost of the repairs specified by Price, including the renewal both of breakages and worn-out parts, would be about £8, 10s. "The cost of a new 4 h.-p. gas-engine is about £95. I certainly would not sell an engine which had just been fitted up by Messrs Andrews & Company for £56. I know that they are in the habit of making such repairs to second-hand engines and selling them. They will be able to sell a 4 h.-p. gas-engine overhauled in this way for £75. . . . Cross.—I draw a distinction between a second-hand engine which is as good as new, and a second-hand engine which is fit to run. . . . The engine is not a particularly old-fashioned one. It was not made to-day."

Bernard, the Kirkcaldy engineer, employed by the defender, and examined as a witness for him, deponed in cross-examination,—"(Q.) What would be the value of this engine after it got all these repairs? (A.) Just about its present price, £47, 10s. Of course it is one of those old-fashioned ones. (Q.) If it belonged to you and you had to sell it, would you sell it for that? (A.) Yes, if I could get it. (Q.) After all these repairs were put upon it? (A.) Yes."

Benjamin J. Smith, the engineer in charge of the engine before it was sold to the pursuers, a witness adduced by the pursuers, deponed that it "was a fairly good engine. We worked it . . . regularly till the day it was taken out. We got some new machinery which was very heavy, and the gas-engine was not competent for that work. Up to the time we got that new machinery it worked all right."

The defender's manager deponed that the defender required it for an immediate and temporary purpose.

There was a conflict of evidence as to whether any or all of the breakages above mentioned occurred before or after the engine came into the defender's possession.

On 26th March 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Gillespie) pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Finds that the gas-engine in question is a fairly good second-hand engine, and that it was running up to about a week before the sale to the defender: Finds that the engine was received at Kirkcaldy on 22d October; that after being erected it could not be got to work: Finds that the cause of this has since been ascertained to be the breakage of certain rings which formed vital parts of the engine, but which would only have taken about £1, 10s. to renew: Finds that it is uncertain whether the breakage occurred in transit or after delivery to the defender, but that the former is more probable. . . . Finds in law that the gas-engine fairly corresponding with its description, the defender was not entitled to reject it, though he was entitled to get the broken rings renewed at the pursuers' expense, and that in any view the pursuers' offer of 16th December 1895, to which they still adhere, was an adequate offer: Finds that on that offer being satisfactorily carried out the pursuers would be entitled to the price, or, more simply, that they are now entitled to the price less the estimated cost of the proposed operations; therefore ordains and decerns the defender to make payment to the pursuers of £39: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses, subject to a deduction of one-fourth from the taxed amount thereof," &c.*

On appeal, the Sheriff (Mackay) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the proof and whole process, adheres to the interlocutor appealed against, and decerns." †

* "NOTE.— . . . The ordinary rule applies that where there is a contract for the sale of goods by description there is an implied condition that the goods shall correspond with that description—Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sec. 13.[1]

"The Sheriff-substitute is of opinion that though the engine did not deserve the superlative epithet bestowed on it by the pursuers, it fairly corresponded with the description as distinguished from quality. In arriving at this decision he relies much on the evidence of Benjamin J. Smith, an impartial and intelligent witness.

"The defender knew that the engine was second-hand, and a second-hand machine necessarily means some wear and tear. It was a pity, no doubt, that the pursuers should have put the defender off his guard by writing, 'You need not be afraid of ordering it without seeing,' even though he adds that he would be pleased to shew it. It is a case in which the seller is morally bound to do more than the law probably compels him, and the pursuers have properly recognised their obligation by their offer of 16th December, which, in answer to a question by the Court, was expressly adhered to by the pursuers' agent after consultation with his client. It is not even alleged, however, that the expression of opinion above quoted was made in bad faith.

"It would have been better if the pursuers had made the offer of 16th December at an earlier stage. At first they seemed to take the position that they were under no obligation whatever in regard to this engine. But in the Sheriff-substitute's opinion all that the defender could claim as matter of strict legal right was to have the breakages, but not the worn parts, made good at the pursuers' expense. The expense of renewing the broken rings was so small a part of the price of the engine that it cannot be said that the pursuers failed to perform their contract in any material part—Sale of Goods Act, sec. 11 (2).[1] Consequently it was not open to the defender to reject the engine. . . ."

† "NOTE.—I have found this case not free from difficulty. It is impossible not to have some sympathy with the appellant, who bought an engine described as 'now running in good order and a bargain,' and got one which he was unable to make work, and which, after examination (necessarily at some cost) by a practical engineer at his instance, and a second engineer probably of wider experience in gas-engines in the employment of the makers of this one, was found to have defects which disabled it from going without an expenditure of about one-fifth of the price. But after examination of the evidence I have come to agree with the Sheriff-substitute, and I add a few remarks on points which appear material in consequence of the importance of the case to the parties.

"1. This engine was described as 'in good order' and 'running' . . . and the proof that it was so by the evidence, not only of Mr Roberts, but of Mr Benjamin J. Smith, who took charge of the working, is uncontradicted and unshaken.

"2. The fact that it was a second-hand article is necessarily implied from the above description, and its price, which was much below that of a new gas-engine of 4 horse-power. It is stated to be second-hand in the invoice.

"3. The faults which prevent it working are, I think, proved to have been a combination of ordinary wear and tear, with breakages of vital parts, and the former would have been insufficient by itself." [The Sheriff then

Roberts & Co. v. Yule.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The engine here was sold by description, a material part of the description being that the engine was in "excellent order." It did not correspond with that description, for it would not work at all. The defender therefore was entitled to reject.* Bradley's[1] case was not in point, for there the defects could have been remedied at a trifling cost, here the defects would require an expenditure equivalent to about one-fifth of the price. Further, in Bradley's[1] case the machine always worked when in the hands of the seller's own men, which was not the case here. It was nothing to the point to prove that the engine was very cheap at £47, 10s.; that was what the pursuers said it was—"a great bargain." The evidence, however, did not establish that it was a great bargain—even with all the repairs it was nothing more than a fairly good second-hand engine of an old-fashioned type. It might be that the case would have been within the rule of Bradley's[1] case if the only defects had been the breakages, but there was also the question whether the wear and tear was not greater than was to be implied from the description. A second-hand machine meant anything from a machine which was as good as new to one which was practically useless, and the description here imported one of the former class. Assuming that a certain amount of wear and tear was to be implied, a loss of horse-power through wear and tear, equivalent to nearly one-fifth of that stipulated, shewed that the machine was not conform to the description, and an expenditure of £7—in addition to £1, 10s. for breakages—where the price stipulated was £47, 10s. was a much more serious matter than the trifling defects contemplated in Bradley's[1] case.

Argued for the pursuers;—The defender had bought a second-hand engine, but his arguments proceeded on the assumption that the rules applicable to new machines applied. Assuming that the pursuers were responsible for the breakages, the rule of Bradley's[1] case applied, considered the question whether the breakages had occurred after the engine had reached the defender, coming to the conclusion that they had.]

"4. Although the defender was naturally anxious to have the faults repaired speedily, . . . I do not think he clearly intimated it was required for a special temporary purpose, and certainly he did not do so before accepting the offer.

"5. Whether the case is taken on the principles of the common law of Scotland, or under section 11 (2) and section 13 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, I do not think the defender is now entitled to reject the engine. The defender has not proved a breach of any material part of the contract, or that the engine did not correspond with the description.

"To persons familiar with the style of business advertisements, the description of an article in an advertisement as 'a bargain,' should be by no means an unqualified recommendation. The eulogies of dealers are not warranties.—Bell's Prin, sec. 111. . . ."

* The Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), section 11, subsection 2, enacts,—"In Scotland, failure by the seller to perform any material part of a contract of sale is a breach of contract which entitles the buyer either within a reasonable time after delivery to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated, or to retain the goods and treat the failure to perform such material part as a breach which may give rise to a claim for compensation or damages."

Section 13 enacts,—"Where there is a contract for the sale of goods by description, there is an implied condition that the goods shall correspond with the description. . . ."

Roberts & Co. v. Yule.

so far as breakages were concerned, for the breakages could be repaired at a trifling cost; they were not a failure to perform a material part of the contract within the meaning of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. The wear and tear, and consequent loss of horse-power, were more serious in point of cost; but wear and tear was just what was to be expected in a second-hand machine. A second-hand machine did not cease to be a 4 horse-power machine merely because it had lost some of its horse-power through wear and tear. If a very large sum of money had been required to put it right, the case would have been different, but adding £8, 10s. to £47, 10s. came to £56, which was well within the £70 or £80 which the makers would have charged for a second-hand machine restored so as to be as good as new. It therefore had been truly described as in excellent condition and a great bargain. In any view the expression "excellent condition" was not a warranty. The pursuers' letter of 16th December was not an admission of fault, but an amicable offer to settle.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case relates to a not very large sum of money, and it has been decided in the same way by both the Sheriffs, although on slightly different grounds. It is a case relating to the construction of a contract, and the question is whether that contract has been fulfilled or not. The contract was made by letter, the pursuers offering to send for £47, 10s. a gas-engine, which they say "is in excellent order" and "a great bargain at this price." This offer was accepted by the defender, and the engine was sent to Kirkcaldy. When it arrived it could not be got to work. A man, who is said to have had large experience in fitting up such engines, was sent to examine it, and he could not start it. Then a man called Price was sent by Messrs Andrews, the makers of the engine, and he could not make it work either. He took it to pieces, and found that one of the piston rings was broken, and also one of the junk rings and one of the compression rings. He also discovered that the mushroom valve was a little worn, and that the cylinder lining was worn to the extent of one-sixteenth of an inch. He reported that he could put the engine right by putting in a new liner, a new set of rings, a new mushroom valve, and a new compression ring. Then he gives evidence that the defects found by him were defects which it would require an expenditure of about one-fifth of the price paid for the engine to rectify, and that if it were only repaired sufficiently to make it go at all, it could only work up to five and a-half horse power instead of seven. It is difficult to say that an engine could be in "excellent working order" which required such repairs.

It would be difficult and indeed impossible to find as matter of fact that the engine was sent as it was stated to be in the letter by which it was offered for sale, "in excellent order." The repairs which required to be done to it involved an expenditure of £8, 10s. If the pursuers had offered to make these repairs at an early stage, when there had been no loss to the defender by delay, there might have been a different question, although I do not say that even then the defender would not have been entitled to reject. The defender did his best for the engine. He required it for immediate use and for a temporary purpose. I am unable to hold that when he rejected it he was not within his legal right in rejecting, or even that he was acting harshly to the pursuers. The engine was useless to him and the repairs which it required to make it of use were not trifling repairs, but material and essential. The letter of 16th December is practically an admission that this was so. On the whole matter I am of opinion that the defender was entitled to reject.

LORD YOUNG.—I am substantially of the same opinion. I really expressed the view which presses on my mind in the last question I put to pursuers' counsel. The question I asked was whether we could find in fact that this engine conformed to the description given of it by the pursuers. We must here pronounce findings in point of fact. I could not find as the Sheriff-substitute has found, or use the expressions which he has used, when he finds that the gas-engine fairly corresponded with its description. We shall have to find that the contract was as expressed in the offer contained in the letter of 16th October, and accepted by the defender. I desire to say, because I am convinced it is so, that I think the pursuers acted in all integrity, and with an honest belief that the engine was in the condition described in their letter. I am sure they were not intentionally exaggerating, or acting otherwise than might have been expected from any perfectly respectable business man. But taking the contract as made in the letter to which I have referred, we must find that the engine was not according to contract. In terms of the pursuers' own letter of 16th December, the engine would require £8, 10s. to make it right. The Sheriff accepts that view, and he uses language which shews that he was somewhat doubtful as to his judgment. He proceeds on the view that £8, 10s. was necessary to make the engine according to contract, and proceeding on that view, I cannot affirm his judgment, for if £8, 10s. was required to make the engine according to contract, then the legal conclusion is that it was not according to contract before, and that the buyer was entitled to reject. I think there was perfect integrity in the seller, but I think there was perfect integrity on the part of the buyer also. He fairly and repeatedly tried the engine and found that it would not work. He had bought it for a temporary purpose, which was explained to the pursuers, and he required it immediately. I think he was perfectly entitled to reject. With an interlocutor expressing these views, I am prepared to concur. I think we should alter the judgment of the Sheriffs, and assoilzie the defender.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I think it right to express my concurrence with what Lord Young has said as to the good faith of the pursuers. I do not think they were trying to palm off an engine which they knew was totally disconform to the description they gave of it. On the other hand, the defender was not rejecting the engine because it was more convenient for him to do so, or on trivial grounds which he had set himself to discover.

The contract is in writing. The pursuers offer to sell, and do sell, an engine "in excellent order" delivered at Kirkcaldy for £47, 10s. I think that the letter of 17th October is of some importance. It is true that as it followed the conclusion of the contract, it cannot be read as qualifying the contract, or as increasing the burden laid upon the sellers, but I think that it may legitimately be read as a contemporary interpretation of what the pursuers meant by the contract. They tell the defender "We have been looking at it this afternoon personally, and have to say that it is about the best second-hand gas-engine we have ever sold, and you have really got a bargain. All the parts are very good, and scarcely worn." That letter shews what kind of engine they understood they had sold, and were to deliver to the defender. But without attributing too much weight to that letter, and reverting to the undoubted terms of the contract as contained in the letter of 16th October, the question is whether the engine in question was delivered in excellent order and condition. It is rather curious that the engine should have been running within a week, and that it would not work at all when tried at Kirkcaldy. It was not merely that it would not work properly, it would not work at all. The defender was so anxious to get the use of the engine for his temporary purpose that he applied to the sellers and they got a man from the makers to try and make it go. That man says very distinctly that he tried various ways, but that the engine could not be made to work. In short, it never could be made to work in defender's premises at all. An engine in such a state cannot be said to be in excellent condition. Then we find that after giving it a fair trial, and being unable to get it to work, the defender rejected it about a month after it had been sent to him. Various suggestions by the pursuers follow. In their letter of 16th December they offer to repair it, as recommended by their own engineer. For what purpose was it to be repaired? They say in their letter that if certain things are done, which they purpose to do, then it (the engine) will work all right. Without the repairs it would not work. That, as your Lordship has said, is a practical admission, after a report by their own engineer, that it was not in excellent working condition when it was sent.

A good deal has been said as to whether the defects were material. Surely they were, when without their being remedied the engine would not work at all. But on this point it is important to observe that according to the evidence of the pursuers' own witness, the engine as delivered (sold as an engine of 4 h.-p.) could not be worked much above three-fourths of that power, and that to bring it up to the description in the contract would require an expenditure on repairs to the extent of about a fifth of the whole price.

I am of opinion that there were material defects in the engine, and that the pursuers failed to fulfil their contract.

I agree with Lord Young's observations on the Sheriff-substitute's findings.

I think that the appeal should be sustained, and the defender assoilzied.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As your Lordships have both expressed an opinion as to the bona fides of the parties in this case, and as it might be supposed, if I remained silent on that matter, that I was of a different opinion, I think it right to say that I entirely concur with what your Lordships have said as to the perfect bona fides of both the parties.

LORD MONCREIFF was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the interlocutors appealed against: Find in fact (1) that the contract for the sale of the gas-engine in question was contained in the letter from the pursuers to the defender and telegrams dated respectively 16th and 17th October 1895; (2) that the said gas-engine was not conform to contract, and was timeously rejected by the defender: Find in law that the defender was entitled to reject the engine as disconform to contract: Therefore assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decern: Find him entitled to expenses in this and in the inferior Court," &c. No. 169. June 24, 1896. Roberts & Co. v. Yule.

Succession—Provision to children and issue of children—Clause of forfeiture—Revocation of provision in favour of one of children—Claim for and receipt of legitim by that child—Effect on provision for issue of child.—A testator directed his trustees to hold and convey one-fourth of the residue of his estate for behoof of his son John in liferent, and John's children in fee, and made similar provisions in favour of his sons Thomas and George, and their children, and provided the remaining one-fourth part to the children of his deceased son James. The settlement contained this declaration,—"Declaring that in the event of any of my said sons or their descendants repudiating this settlement, or by any means preventing it from taking effect in whole or in part, then such sons, as well as their descendants, shall forfeit their whole right and interest in those portions of my means and estate that I am entitled to dispose of, which right and interest shall in that event accresce and belong to such of my sons, the said John, Thomas, and George, and their descendants, and the descendants of my son James, as shall abide by this settlement and accept of the provisions herein contained."

By codicil the testator revoked the liferent provision of one-fourth share in favour of his son John, and instead directed his trustees to hold and apply the said share for behoof of John's children, "and with this alteration I confirm the said trust-disposition and settlement in every respect."

John claimed and received payment of legitim.

In competition between John's children and the surviving descendants of the testator other than John and his children, held that the right to the portion of the trust-estate bequeathed to John's children by the trust-disposition and codicil had not been forfeited by John having claimed and received payment of his legitim.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low.

GEORGE URIE, blacksmith in Glasgow, died on 28th June 1885, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 28th November 1876, and a codicil thereto, dated 5th May 1879. By the trust-disposition and settlement the testator in the first place directed payment of his debts. In the second place, he directed that the whole free income of his means and estate should be paid to his wife during her viduity. He then, in the third place, directed his trustees that they should, "upon the lapse of the foresaid liferent, by the death or second marriage of my said spouse, or upon my own death should she predecease me, hold, apply, pay, and convey the whole rest, residue, and remainder of my means and estate, as follows, viz., one-fourth part or share thereof to and for behoof of my son John Urie for his liferent alimentary use allenarly, not affectable by his debts or deeds or the diligence of his creditors, and to and for behoof of his lawful children alive at the period of payment after mentioned, jointly with the lawful issue of any of his children who may have predeceased that period leaving issue (the division being per stirpes), whom failing, the lawful children alive at said period of payment of my other sons, Thomas, George, and James (the division being per stirpes), jointly with the lawful issue of such of the children of my said sons, Thomas, George, and James, as may predecease said period leaving issue, such issue being entitled equally among them to the share their parent would have been entitled to if in life, whom all failing, my own nearest heirs and assignees in fee." The testator made similar provisions of one-fourth of his means and estate in favour of each of his sons, Thomas and George Urie, and their children, and provided that the remaining one-fourth of his means and estate should be held and applied, paid and conveyed, to and for behoof of the lawful children alive of his son James Urie (who had predeceased him), jointly with the lawful issue of any of said children who might predecease the period of payment. The deed then contained declarations with respect to the payment and vesting of the provisions in favour of the testator's grandchildren and their issue, and also the following declarations:—"Which provisions in favour of my said wife and sons and their descendants respectively are hereby declared to be, and shall be accepted of as in full to my said wife and sons respectively of all terce of land, jus relictæ, legitim, dead's part, portion-natural, and generally of the whole claims competent to them by, through, or in consequence of my decease: Declaring that, in the event of any of my said sons or their descendants repudiating this settlement, or by any means preventing it from taking effect, in whole or in part, then such sons as well as their descendants shall forfeit their whole right and interest in those portions of my means and estate that I am entitled to dispose of, which right and interest shall, in that event, accresce and belong to such of my sons, the said John, Thomas, and George, and their descendants, and the descendants of my said son James, as shall abide by this settlement, and accept of the provisions herein contained."

The codicil was in the following terms:—"I, . . . do hereby revoke the liferent provision of one-fourth part or share of the residue of my estate in favour of my son John Urie, specified in the third purpose of the said trust-disposition and settlement, and instead I direct my trustees to hold and apply, pay and divide the said one-fourth part or share of said residue to and for behoof of the lawful children alive at said period of payment of my said son John Urie, jointly with the lawful issue of any of his lawful children who may have predeceased that period leaving issue (the division being per stirpes); whom failing, the lawful children alive at said period of payment of my other sons, the said Thomas, George, and James Urie (the division being per stirpes) jointly with the lawful issue of such of the children of my said sons, Thomas, James, and George, as may predecease said period leaving issue, such issue being entitled equally among them to the share to which their parent would have been entitled if in life; whom all failing, my own nearest heirs and assignees: And with this alteration I confirm the said trust-disposition and settlement in every respect."

The testator was survived by his widow, by his sons John and George, by issue of his son James, who, as already mentioned, was dead at the date of the trust-disposition, and by issue of his remaining son Thomas, who also predeceased him.

No. 170.

June 24, 1896.
Urie's Trustees v. Urie.

John Urie, the son whose provision had been revoked by the codicil, claimed and received payment of his legitim in 1885.

Mrs Urie, the testator's widow, died on 14th April 1894.

On her death questions arose as to the effect on the provision in favour of John Urie's children of his having claimed and received payment of his legitim, and the trustees accordingly brought the present action of multiplepoinding.

The primary question, and the only question under the consideration of the Court at the stage of the proceedings now reported, was as to whether the provision in favour of John Urie's children had been forfeited in consequence of his having claimed and received legitim.

Mrs Jessie Urie or Williams and others, John Urie's children, lodged a claim in which they maintained that the provision in their favour was not affected by their father's action.

On the other hand Mrs Agnes Urie or Anderson and others, the children of the testator's deceased son Thomas, George Urie, the testator's other surviving son, and children, and Mrs Martha Urie or Folland and others, the children of the testator's deceased son James, lodged claims in which they maintained that on a sound construction of the trust-disposition and codicil, the provision in favour of John Urie's children had been forfeited by his claiming and receiving payment of his legitim.

On 29th May 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the right to the portion of the trust-estate bequeathed to the children of John Urie by the trust-disposition and settlement and codicil of his father George Urie mentioned on record, has not been forfeited by the said John Urie having claimed and received payment of his legitim out of the trust-estate, and with that finding, appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure; meantime reserves all questions of expenses." *

* "OPINION.—The only question in this case with which I have at present to deal is, Whether John Urie, by claiming his legitim, caused the provisions made for his children by the settlement of his father, the late George Urie, to be forfeited?

"If the original settlement had not been altered, and if John Urie had repudiated the liferent thereby provided to him, and claimed legitim, I should have had difficulty in coming to any other conclusion, upon a construction of the clause of forfeiture, than that, not only John Urie's right of liferent, but also his children's right of fee was forfeited.

"But by the codicil the provision in favour of John Urie was revoked, and the question is, Whether the clause of forfeiture applies to the case of a son who was not a beneficiary under the settlement claiming legitim?

"It was argued that the language of the clause was wide enough to cover such a case, because it was declared that a forfeiture should take place, not only 'in the event of any of my said sons or their descendants repudiating this settlement,' but also in the event of their 'by any means preventing it from taking effect in whole or in part.' The argument was that, by claiming legitim, John Urie had prevented the settlement from taking effect.

"It is quite certain that the clause, as originally framed, was intended only to apply to the sons John, Thomas, and George—who were given a liferent interest by the settlement,—because, although another son—James—is mentioned in the settlement, he was dead, and his name is only brought in for the purpose of describing a class of beneficiaries, namely, his children. But the result of the codicil was to strike John out of the settlement as a beneficiary, and his name thereafter only remained in the settlement, like that of James, for the purpose of describing a class of beneficiaries. v. Urie.

The Lord Ordinary having granted leave to reclaim, the claimants other than John Urie's children reclaimed. The arguments for them sufficiently appear from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.
The respondents, John Urie's children, were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must be affirmed. John Urie, at the time this testament came into operation, had nothing given to him which he could accept as being in full of all his claims, and he had nothing under the settlement which he could repudiate. He had no interest in the settlement at all, and was not in a position to demand anything under the settlement. Therefore, I think the Lord Ordinary is right when he holds that the penalty clause does not apply under the circumstances which have arisen.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and really without any doubt. The will divides the estate of the testator into four parts, and it gives one-fourth to each of his three surviving sons in liferent, and to the sons and descendants of each in fee, and it contains the declaration that "in the event of any of my said sons or their descendants repudiating this settlement, or by any means preventing it from taking effect in whole or in part, then such sons, as well as their descendants, shall forfeit their whole right." Undoubtedly that applied to the whole three sons, as the will said "in the event of any of my said sons repudiating the settlement." The dead son of course could not repudiate; he could do nothing. When the codicil was made and executed, one of the sons, John, is taken out of the number. He is no longer "one of my said sons." He is taken out of the settlement altogether—as com-question, therefore, whether the 'said sons,' to whom the clause refers, includes John, is a question of construction.

"Now, the penalty for any of the sons repudiating the settlement, or preventing it from taking effect, is that 'such sons, as well as their descendants, shall forfeit their whole right and interest in those portions of my means and estate that I am entitled to dispose of, which right and interest shall, in that event, accresce and belong to such of my sons . . . and their descendants . . . as shall abide by this settlement.' That is a penalty which is only applicable to persons who have been given a right and interest in the succession, because the event contemplated is the repudiation of the settlement by his son or his descendants, and the penalty is the forfeiture of the right of the son and his descendants. The penalty, therefore, does not apply to the circumstances which have arisen. The truster has declared his intention if a son for whom he has made a provision repudiates the settlement, but he has not declared his intention if a son to whom he has given nothing claims his legitim.

"No doubt, in order that his intention that John should get no part of his estate might be enforced, the truster might very well have stipulated that the children of John should take one-fourth of the estate only on condition that he should not claim legitim. The truster may, indeed, have believed that the clause of forfeiture would have that effect. But, in my opinion, that is not what the clause of forfeiture says. It is a clause which is framed upon the ordinary basis of a clause of forfeiture, the basis, namely, that an election is offered between conventional and legal provisions, and the forfeiture is to be incurred if the beneficiary chooses the latter and rejects the former. John therefore, who had no election given to him, does not seem to me to fall within the scope of the clause, and I am accordingly of opinion that the right of fee given to his children has not been forfeited."

pletely out of it as if he had never been in it. Accordingly upon his father's death he is left, so far as his father's will is concerned, without anything—destitute. His children take a share under the will, and they might have repudiated the settlement like any of the other descendants of his sons, or done something to prevent it from taking effect; but John could do nothing in the way of repudiating the settlement, for there was nothing in the settlement he could repudiate. He was not in it at all. I think the true reading of the clause is, "in the event of any of my said sons or their descendants repudiating this settlement, or by any means preventing it from taking effect" —meaning, in the event of their repudiating it or by any other means preventing it from taking effect. Now, John could not do that; he could not prevent it from taking effect by repudiation. But it is said he could prevent it from taking effect, if he could be regarded as one of the sons to whom it applied after the codicil, by taking a fund of legitim which would diminish the estate for division among the others. But that is not taken under the settlement, and he no more diminishes the estate under the settlement by taking that than if he had been a creditor of his father upon his father's death, say upon a bond for £1000 which the father had granted to his son for lent money—a quite conceivable case—and he had demanded payment of that sum of money. He would thereby have done something which would have diminished the estate, and prevented the will from taking effect with respect to that £1000 which he claimed as his debt, but it would not have been a reasonable or admissible meaning to put on this will that it was intended to apply to repudiation of that kind. But when his father leaves him nothing and he claims his legal provision of legitim—that is, what is due to him by law—he does no more to interfere with the operation of the will than in the case which I have supposed of his claiming payment of the £1000 bond which his father owes him. Therefore, I do not think the clause applies to the case at all, and the true reading of the provision is in my opinion this:—"If any son repudiates what I have given him under the will, and claims something else or does anything inconsistent with my will taking effect according to its expression, he shall forfeit his right, and if any descendants of sons who are provided for by this will, repudiate it, claiming the legal provisions which descendants might, or in any other way interfere with the execution of my will, according to the intention expressed, they shall forfeit"—not that a son repudiating or doing anything to hinder the will, shall forfeit for himself and his descendants, but that he shall forfeit for himself, and descendants shall be in the same position as sons. If they do anything to repudiate or prevent the will taking effect, they shall forfeit for themselves. It is not only capable, I think, of that reading and interpretation, but that is in my opinion the true reading and interpretation. But if the clause were only reasonably capable of that reading and interpretation I should adopt it and give effect to it as leading to the real justice and equity of the case, which is presumably in accordance with the intention of the testator. I therefore agree with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and with the views which he has stated in support of his interlocutor.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary for the reasons which he has given. I think that in the circumstances the clause of forfeiture does not apply to the case. It applied only to the case of a son for whom a provision is made in full of legitim in the will; and as by the codicil the testator struck John out of his will altogether, and deprived him of the provision which he had given him under the will, I think the clause of forfeiture does not apply to the case which has arisen.

Process—Appeal—Competency—Sheriff—Value of cause—Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 96), secs. 12 and 13.—Held that when a Sheriff's judgment in an action for payment of a sum under £25 involves the determination of a question as to the defender's liability for further payments, an appeal to the Court of Session will not be competent unless it appears from the process that the amount involved in the determination is over £25.

Opinion (per Lord Kinnear), that as the only process competent under section 2 of the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, was a summary process for payment of a debt, the value of the cause must be the highest sum for which decree could be given.

Drummond v. Hunter, Jan. 12, 1869, 7 Macph. 347, 41 Scot. Jur. 203, approved and distinguished.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Forfarshire.

ON 15th July 1895 the Standard Shipowners' Mutual Freight, Dead Freight, Demurrage, and Defence Association, Limited, raised an action in the Debts Recovery Court at Dundee against Robert Taylor, shipowner, Dundee, for payment of £12, 4s. 6d., "being amount of call made by the pursuers upon the defender and other members of their association towards meeting their liabilities for the year 1894-95, and annual membership fees for the year to 20th February 1896, such call and fees being payable by the defender in respect of the said steamers 'Alice Taylor' and 'Nellie,' entered by him in the pursuers' association for the purpose of protection, in terms of the rules of the association, and which the said defender refuses or delays to pay."

The defender denied liability for the sum sued for, and denied having been a member of the pursuers' association for the years 1894-95 and 1895-96. At the same time, "without prejudice to all his rights and pleas," he tendered payment of £8 as the amount of "calls for 1894-95 policy," and consigned the amount in the hands of the Clerk of Court.

On 26th February 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) "finds it to be admitted by the defender that he authorised his name to be entered as a member of this association for the years 1893-94 and 1894-95: Finds that he has paid the proper subscription or contribution for the year 1893-94, and admitted his willingness to pay the contribution for 1894-95, and that he tendered and consigned said contribution on 24th December 1895, being the sum of £8 sterling: Finds it proved that he did not expressly or knowingly enter the said association for the year 1895-96, and that the pursuers' claim for £4, 4s. for that year has no legal justification of any kind: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the pursuers' claim for £4, 4s. applicable to the year 1895-96."

On appeal the Sheriff (Comrie Thomson), on 19th May, affirmed the interlocutor of his Substitute.

The pursuers appealed. The defender objected to the competency of the appeal.*

Argued for the pursuers;—The appeal was competent. Although the sum sued for was only £12, 4s. 6d., the judgment involved the question of the defender's continuing liability for membership of the association for the year 1895-96, which liability would greatly exceed £25. The pursuers had printed, and now referred to an account,† shewing that the obligations incurred by the defender in respect of membership for 1894-96, amounted to much more than £25. The true criterion of the competency of the appeal had been enunciated by Lord Barcaple in his opinion in Drummond's case,[1] which had been since approved of in Cunningham v. Black,[2] viz., that the appeal would be competent, although the sum concluded for was less than £25, if it appeared that decree could not be given for that sum without determining a question which involved a larger pecuniary amount than £25. If the interlocutor of the Sheriff was not appealable the question of the defender's liability was res judicata in any action for calls due for 1895-96 which the pursuers might make. The soundness of the judgment in Welsh v. Duncan[3] was questionable, and Lord Rutherfurd Clark had dissented.

Argued for the defender;—The appeal was incompetent. No question of continuing liability was involved. The true test of the value of the cause was the sum which appeared on the face of the summons, or the sum by payment of which the defender could get rid of the action against him.[4] The pursuers had not established that even a continuing liability for calls involved a sum larger than £25, nor was the judgment appealed against one ad factum præstandum.[5] The judgment of the Sheriff would not be res judicata in any future action.[6]

Lord President.—I should be prepared to give effect to the principle laid down in the case of Drummond[7] in cases to which it is clearly applicable. It seems to me to be a very intelligible view which is stated by Lord Barcaple, and one capable of being applied with precision to similar cases. The principle I understand to be this—prima facie, the value of the cause is to be found on the face of the summons, but it may turn out that no decree can be given for the sum concluded for in the summons without determining a question which involves a larger pecuniary amount than £25.

When I turn to the present case I find that it is deficient in the facts postulated for the application of that principle. It is quite true that there is a general contention as to the membership of the pursuers' association, and that that problem had to be solved by the Sheriff in order to give decree for the sum concluded for. But then it does not appear that the amount involved directly in the determining of that question is more than £25. We were referred to documents not in process, and it was admitted that, unless we look at them, there is no material before the Court for instructing a greater amount than £25 as depending on any proposition which must form a basis of judgment. Therefore I think that the facts of this case do not bring it within the principle of Drummond.[7]

Standard Shipowners' Mutual Association v. Taylor.

It is to be observed that this is a purely petitory action, and it is also to be observed that the rights involved in the determination of the main question for judgment—whatever the amount yielded by them—could yield nothing but money. Accordingly, it seems to me that the appellant here, as the basis of his right to appeal, ought to have been able, but is unable, to instruct that more than £25 was involved in the larger question tabled for the decision of the Court. On these grounds I think this appeal is incompetent.

LORD M'LAREN.—I should be against a very strict construction of the clauses of this Act of Parliament, which limit the right of appeal upon grounds depending on the value of the action, because the expressions used in the statute are, I think, of an intentionally indefinite character, leaving a margin which may be defined by judicial decisions. I think the criterion proposed by Lord Barcaple in the case of Drummond[1] does not go in the least beyond what the language of the statute would justify. Where it clearly appears from the pursuer's statement, taken in connection with his petitory conclusions, that the petitory conclusions are not the limit of the question for judgment, but merely represent the amount actually due under a continuing obligation, the decision of the Sheriff is not final in such a case.

I should have been willing to extend that principle to this case if I had thought that it could have been brought within the scope of the decisions as to actions ad factum præstandum. But I rather think that the ground on which such actions are appealable is that the value does not admit of pecuniary estimation at all, and therefore that the statute does not exclude the right of appeal. But in this case, so far as we are able to discover, the consequent liability of the defender in respect of his subscription is a thing that admits of pecuniary estimation. We are told that it is known, and that it exceeds the value of £25. Now, as no steps have been taken to amend the record so as to make it appear that there is a question behind which would raise the value of the action above the limit of £25, I agree that there are not materials within the case for applying the rule of Drummond.[1] The lease in Drummond[1] was for five years, and it was an arithmetical result that the value of the question involved in the decision exceeded the statutory limit. But here the obligation to pay calls is wholly indefinite as to amount, and we do not find it averred, nor does it appear on the face of the proceedings, that the sums involved are in amount beyond £25.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordships.

The only process competent under the second section of the Act is a summary process for the payment of a debt, and therefore we must look at this petition as being simply a petitory action for payment of a debt. If that be so, then I think that the value of the cause must be the highest sum for which decree could be given.

I agree with your Lordships that there is nothing more to be found in this action than a conclusion for payment of a sum of £12 odds. It may be that the Sheriff's findings go beyond the conclusions of the action—I do not say whether this is so or not—but if it be so, then neither party can be prejudiced by that.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal as incompetent.

No. 172. June 26, 1896. Martin and Stark v. Cruickshanks.

WILLIAM MARTIN, Pursuer.—Watt—A. S. D. Thomson.
JAMES STARK, Pursuer.—Watt—A. S. D. Thomson.
WILLIAM CRUICKSHANKS, Defender.—Balfour—Grierson.

Reparation—Slander—Privilege—Report of railway inspector to superior—Motion for new trial—Credibility—Evidence to support verdict.—A railway inspector lodged a report with the traffic superintendent stating that he had detected, in a goods shed, a railway clerk using a gimlet in the side of a cask, and a railway porter sitting on the cask with a water can in his hands, that he had said to them that they were in a very awkward position, and that the clerk said they were, while the porter followed him and asked if he intended to report the matter.

The clerk and the porter raised an action of damages for slander against the inspector, and obtained an issue which contained malice.

At the trial the defender, who had been for thirty years in the employment of the railway company, deponed to the truth of his report, and stated that on leaving the goods shed he went to the stationmaster and told him what he had seen, and that the stationmaster returned with him to the goods shed and examined the cask, which he pointed out. The stationmaster deponed that he went with the defender to the goods shed and examined the cask along with him, and found that the bung appeared as if newly chipped or roughly cut in one or two places. Certain other officials of the company deponed to seeing marks of a sharp instrument upon the cask. The pursuers, who had also been for some time in the employment of the company, deponed that the whole report was an invention, but they offered no explanation of the defender's motive in making the charge against them. It was proved that when separately charged they gave the same account of what had occurred that afternoon, and their account was so far confirmed by servants of the railway company who were working at the shed shortly before the arrival of the defender. The consignee of the cask deponed that he failed to find any indication upon it that it had been tampered with.

The jury having returned a verdict for the pursuers, and awarded £100 to each as damages, the Court (dis. Lord Young) refused to grant a new trial, on the ground that the question was one of credibility, and that if the jury believed the evidence for the pursuers the false report by the defender was sufficient evidence of malice to warrant the verdict returned.

2D DIVISION.

WILLIAM MARTIN and JAMES STARK, who were formerly employed by the North British Railway as goods porter and railway clerk at Inverkeithing Station, raised this action of damages for slander against William Cruickshanks, an inspector in the service of the railway company.

The issues for both of the pursuers were in similar terms. The issue for the pursuer Martin was as follows:—"Whether the defender wrote and transmitted to John Stewart, Burntisland, the report set forth in the schedule hereto annexed, and whether the said report is of and concerning the pursuer William Martin, and falsely, maliciously, and calumniously represents that the said pursuer was, on or about 8th August 1895, pilfering, or attempting to pilfer, from a cask in the custody of the North British Railway Company, at or near their station in Inverkeithing, to the loss, injury, and damage of the said pursuer? Damages claimed by the pursuer William Martin, £250.

"SCHEDULE.

"Goods Department, Dunfermline Station, to John Stewart, Esq., Burntisland, date 12th August 1895.

"Inverkithing, 8th August 1895.—Dear Sir,—On me visiting the above, and entering goods shed from east end, I came on the clerk Stark using a gamlet in side of a cask, and it on its end. The porter was sitting on it with a watter can in his hands. I went to them and said men you are in a very awkward position, the clerk turned up his head and said they were. I saw another man sitting in shed looking at them, I did not know him, he had on a mixted soot of tweeds. The clerk left shed, so did the porter with can, and the porter returned to me and asked me if I was going to say anything about it. I told him that I would consider what I was to do with that; he was not pleased, and he folled me up the time I was checking three sidings, repeting the same questin. I told him I was afraid it was not his first time, and he said it was. I asked him whatever attempted him to do it, and he said he had been drinking this last two nights. When I put it to him was it his first time, he said he was brought up to it. I went to the hut—there was a party there with clerk, and I did not speak to him, but went to Mr Simpson, and him and me examined cask, and found there had been a spail put in as cask was liking. The cask was addressed Sim, Invkithing.—Yours truly, W. CRUICKSHANKS."

The trial took place on 25th February 1896 before Lord Low (Ordinary) and a jury.*

* Pursuers' evidence:—

The pursuer Stark deponed that in May 1890 he entered the employment of the North British Railway Company, and that after various promotions he became goods clerk at Inverkeithing, where he had full charge of the goods department under the stationmaster; that on 8th August 1895, between 3 and 4 P.M., he was in the goods shed. "Two men came to the door of the shed inquiring for goods. I did not know them. They inquired at me. The goods, they said, were addressed to Somers. . . . When I was speaking to them the defender came into the shed. I saw him just about the middle of the shed on platform. He came in at the south side, the side next the goods office, by the loading table. When the men left I went back to the office. The defender had not spoken to me or I to him. This would be between 3 and 4 P.M. Martin was about the place where he had sat down. When he came in he was some distance away from me. I did not see defender speak to Martin. There was beer in the shed at that time—some ale returned as not having been ordered, I understand. It was at end north of shed exactly at the back of me. There was a piano case between me and it. I knew of some beer to be delivered that day to one Sym, at Inverkeithing—two half-barrels and a quarter-hogshead. I don't know if that beer was there at the time I speak of, or had been sent away by carrier. . . . Never heard of charge till Angus, policeman, and Simpson, the station-master, challenged me on the morning of 9th August. . . . All the statements in the report referring to me are untrue, except that defender went to goods office and found me there with a man. I was much distressed at the charge. . . . The jury returned a verdict in favour of each pursuer, and awarded to each £100 as damages.

On 11th June the defender obtained a rule on the pursuers, and on 20th October the pursuers shewed cause.

Argued for the pursuers;—The question was one of credibility. The evidence was fairly balanced, and the jury preferred that of the pursuers. The verdict must stand unless it was impossible to reconcile it with the evidence.[1]

Argued for the defender;—The verdict was contrary to the evidence. All the elements determining the quality of the evidence must be considered. The report was made by a privileged person against whom there was no presumption of falsehood. He was not likely to invent the charge. On the other side two young men were accused of a not uncommon offence. A discovery of such an offence was very likely to be met by a denial. The jury affirmed the view that the charge was invented, but this was so much against the weight of the evidence, in the absence of all suggestion of motive, that the verdict could not stand.

could prove it. Smith had gone away before defender came. . . . The whole of the report is an invention, except the statement to which I have already referred."

The pursuer Martin deponed that he had been in the railway company's service for 3½ years. "On 8th August last was at my work . . . I came from dinner at two o'clock, and loaded up a general waggon. . . . After loading waggon I went to shunt at three o'clock. Was shunting about three quarters of an hour. I was alone at that work. Thomas Rose was engine-driver. . . . I got water from the tender. I brought the pan across from the shed for that purpose. That was the only way to get water. . . . I took pan to the shed and put it on the floor. After pilot was away I went in and sat down on bags of oakum which were lying for delivery. They were a little past middle of shed, towards the office. I was smoking. Stark came into shed with two men. He asked about a box men were wanting. He said it was addressed to Somers or Somerville. He was looking for box. Did not know men. Were like showmen. It was Lammas Fair time. The defender came through the shed. He came in at last door next the goods office. He passed on and gave me good-day, and I answered him. Nothing else passed. He went through the shed and out at the end. I had no conversation with him that day, except a word at passing one time. Nothing said about any charge. First I heard of charge was next day from Angus and Simpson. . . . On 8th August there was beer lying in shed belonging to Kerr of Inverkeithing. He could not take it, as his cellars were full. It was lying at the end away from goods office near a piano case. There was also Sym's beer. It came in morning. Two small barrels, I think. They were delivered to Sym just after dinner by Charles Stewart the carter. Sym's barrels were away before defender came to the shed. I never put a spile in Sym's cask. . . . The statements in the defender's report are untrue. Cross.—The defender's report an invention from beginning to end. Defender came into shed near four o'clock. Smoking in shed is not allowed. The can was not between my feet. It was on floor a few feet from me. I was sitting with my face towards the line. It was then the defender passed along. The can was full. It was intended to be taken to the office. Kerr's casks were the only barrels of beer in shed at time. They were at end of shed. I was about the middle. I don't know how many barrels there

LORD LOW.—If I had been trying this case alone, and without the assistance of a jury, I should have come to the conclusion that the pursuers had failed to prove their case, because I should have been unable to get over the extreme improbability that the defender, who for some thirty years has held a position of trust and responsibility in the employment of the North British Railway Company, had, without any cause which can be suggested or imagined, invented a wicked and injurious charge against two young men whom he hardly knew. But it is a very different thing to say that upon the evidence which was laid before them the jury were not entitled to come to a different conclusion. I think it must be conceded that the pursuers presented to the jury a strong case. Your Lordships cannot know, and it is right that I should mention it, that the appearance of both the pursuers and their demeanour in the witness-box were markedly in their favour. They gave their evidence apparently with great candour and moderation. In the next place they were both young men who had been in the employment of the railway company for a considerable time, and nothing against their previous character was suggested, and, as Lord Trayner pointed out, it would have were exactly. Sure that all Sym's casks were away before defender came in. There were two for Sym. . . . They had been taken away on the back of two o'clock. . . . I know James Anderson, coal-merchant and storekeeper, Inverkeithing. He spoke to me about the charge, and so did other people. I don't remember inquiring from him about a bottle of whisky. I did not say to him that Stark and I had been boring at the barrel when the defender came in, or anything like that, or that we had been sitting on the barrel or on two barrels together. Re-examined.—I may have told Anderson what defender charged us with."

James Sim, spirit-dealer, Inverkeithing, deponed,—"Barrels delivered in afternoon of 8th August. . . . I was not at home when the beer was delivered. I found it there on my return, but I can't say as to time, but I think it was a little before five o'clock. On 9th August Simpson and Angus called for me, and asked to see the barrels. I shewed them to them. They told me the reason for wanting to see the barrels. We looked for marks of a gimlet, but saw none. The spile in bung did not appear to be tampered with. It was of usual kind, and fitted properly. The bung quite dry. The spile could not have been made by hand, but by machinery. Nothing suspicious about the casks. If a hole had been made with a gimlet, some froth would have been forced out, as the beer is brisk at that time of year. The barrel quite full. Must have two holes in barrel to run the beer out. A little would flash out of one hole, but it would not run. My opinion that no tampering with barrel."

Thomas Rose (39), engine-driver, Dumfermline.—"On 8th August, in afternoon, I was shunting waggons in and out of goods' shed. I left about 3.40 P.M., and just before Martin came up with the can, and got it filled with water. I was on east side of goods' shed, and he went in that direction. I went to the east with my engine, and came back past the shed towards the Forth Bridge. I saw defender coming from north entrance of shed. I passed twice towards Queensferry that afternoon, once at 3.45, and once at four o'clock. I think I saw defender the first time at 3.45, or very near that time. About 4.30 I saw defender going towards passenger station. I had come back with goods at that time. I saw him return with station-master, and go into goods shed. They were about five minutes in shed."

Charles Stewart (23), lorryman at Inverkeithing, and works at station.—"Remember charge against pursuers. Heard of it on 9th August. I saw been practically impossible for the jury to give a verdict against the pursuers without affirming that they had been guilty of an attempt at dishonesty, because there was no suggestion in this case that they had been innocently doing something which the defender believed to be an attempt to draw beer from a barrel in the goods shed. In the next place it appeared that the pursuers, when separately charged with having tampered with the barrel of beer, gave the same account of what had occurred when the defender came to the goods shed, and they did so, as far as could be seen, without any opportunity of communicating or consulting with each other. In the next place, Mr Sym, to whom the barrel was consigned, and who may be regarded to a certain extent as a man of skill in the matter, said that he could find no indication upon the barrel that it had been tampered with, and that he does not believe that it had been tampered with, and finally the pursuers' story as to what took place in the goods shed when the defender came there receives important confirmation from the evidence of the engine-driver and the fireman of the goods engine, who had been working at the goods shed shortly before the arrival of the defender.

Angus in goods office that day. On the 8th August had delivered beer to Sym—two casks. I did so the first thing after dinner. I dine as near one o'clock as possible, and go back to work at two o'clock. I delivered the beer between two and three o'clock. I put the barrels down in front of Sym's shop."

There was no evidence or suggestion of motive on the defender's part to make the charge against the pursuers if it was not true.

Defender's evidence:—

The defender deponed,—"About thirty years with company, and eighteen years inspector. . . . My duties as inspector are—I have to give a note to superintendent of anything which comes under my observation in any interference with property or irregularities I see. I came to Inverkeithing on the 8th of August. I arrived at goods shed according to my book at 3.50. I made a note of my arrival and departure from station. I went over the waggons at Inverkeithing on siding. Then I went into goods shed at south end to look at waggons there. I passed one waggon, and on second waggon the clerk, Stark, was sitting using his right hand on a barrel which was on platform. The porter, Martin, was sitting on cask facing clerk, with can between his legs. Stark was down on his right knee. Martin was sitting on top of cask. It was a common station water pitcher that Martin had. I did not look into it, but by the way Martin was holding it it looked empty. I came on them suddenly. I can be under no mistake as to what I saw. I walked up to them and said, 'Well, men, don't you think you are in a very awkward position?' and they turned their heads and said, 'Yes.' When I spoke, Stark stopped the movement with his hand. I can't say what he had in his hand, but it was either a gimlet or other instrument. He rose up and said nothing more. Martin also rose to his feet with the pitcher. I thought at first he was the fireman. Nothing more passed at that time. I then went out of shed. Martin followed me and said, 'I hope you won't say anything about it,' and I said I would consider. He still followed me up and repeated the same question three or four times. I made the same reply, and then he said, 'The cask's open, I must go and shut it.' He said if I said anything about it it would be his job. The only other thing I said was that 'I wish to see the clerk before you see him.' I then went to the office, but someone was with Stark, and so I did not mention the subject. I should have said that I asked Martin what made him attempt it, and he said he had been drinking for the last two

There is only one point, I think, in regard to which it could be argued that the evidence given by the pursuers was contradicted, and that was in regard to the time when the barrel with which they are said to have tampered was removed from the goods shed. That from one point of view was a very important matter. From another point of view, I do not think that it was so important. If the pursuers had been able to establish that the barrel with which they are said to have tampered had been removed from the goods shed before the defender came there, that would have been a piece of evidence in their favour so strong as to be almost conclusive; and at the close of the pursuers' case it did appear as if they had proved that that was the case, because Stewart the lorryman who removed the barrel, and who is a witness against whose credibility nothing can be suggested, gave evidence which, if correct, made it quite certain that the barrel had been taken from the shed long before four o'clock or a quarter to four, when the defender says he came there. But then there is the evidence of the stationmaster, whom I also take to be a perfectly unimpeachable witness, that when he went to the goods shed about half-past four with the defender the barrel was still there, that he took the nights. He said he had been brought up to it, but whether it was to the drinking or the broaching I did not know. I thought I was bound in duty to report the matter to my superiors. Mr Simpson was the stationmaster, so I went to him and told him that I had seen two of his men in a very awkward position, and would he come with me. We went to the shed. This was about five to ten minutes after I had caught the men. I pointed out to Simpson the cask at which the men had been working. It had been put away among other casks. It was alone when I caught the men. I had no difficulty in recognising the cask. There were four or five others, but it was the smallest cask the men had. Simpson and I turned the cask up, and I pointed where it had been broached. It was leaking, and a spile of white wood put into it. It was a soft wood spile. They are usually hard wood. I saw it was different from the usual spile. There was a little leakage. The spile looked new wood, not like as if it had had a journey. Simpson and I took number of cask and name of consignee. The number was 25,586, and the consignee was Mr Sym. I entered the name and number in my book at the time. Having reported the matter to Simpson, I left it, but I afterwards received from Mr Stewart a request for a written report to him, and I wrote report in schedule to issues, and sent it to Stewart. That was the only written report I made. All I say in report is true. . . . Had no ill-will to either Martin or Stark, and never had. I had no quarrel with either, and knew little of them. I had no desire to do anything but my duty."

George Simpson, stationmaster, Inverkeithing, deponed,—"Defender came to me on 8th August. In consequence of what he said I went with him to goods shed, and he pointed out a barrel to me. I examined it. It was about centre of shed with four other barrels—three consigned to Arnott, and two to Sym, one of which was this one. It was from Bernard, Edinburgh. No. 15 is like the label on barrel. I took number at time—25,586. It was about 4.30 when I went with defender to shed. We examined the bung of the cask. It looked as if newly chipped or roughly cut in two or three places. I had not time to examine the spile, but there was one in the bung. . . . . I communicated with John Angus. We went first to Martin, and told him what had been said about him. He denied the charge, and said that the can was one with water from the engine. . . . Then we went to Stark, and then to Mr Sym's. We saw the cask in his cellar. I pointed out the number of the barrel and found that was the number of the barrel on Sym's premises next morning. Now, the result of that is that the pursuers cannot be held to have proved that the barrel was removed before the defender came to the goods shed, but I do not think it goes further. I do not think that fact can be used as discrediting the pursuers, or as shewing that they wilfully gave false evidence in the witness-box. All that it amounts to is this, that they have been mistaken in common with one or other of the witnesses in the case. They have either been mistaken in common with Stewart as to the time when the barrel was taken to the goods shed, or they have been mistaken in common with the stationmaster, and with the defender himself, as to the time when the latter went to the goods shed. The question before the jury therefore appears to have been entirely a question of credibility, and a question of credibility in regard to which the considerations upon the one side and upon the other were not unevenly balanced.

In these circumstances it appears to me that it is impossible to say that the verdict of the jury was contrary to the evidence. I therefore come to the conclusion, although I confess that I do so with some regret, that it is not competent for the Court to allow a new trial in this case.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am of the same opinion as has been expressed by Lord Low. Of course it is a very unusual case which depends absolutely on credibility as between the pursuer and the defender, as it does in this case practically, and in the ordinary case one could not, judging cuts in the bung, and Sym pointed out that the spile was soft wood spile, and not a trade spile. We all tried it with our nail and saw it was soft. It struck me that something unusual had been done to the cask."

John Angus, railway detective, deponed,—"We went to Sym's to examine the barrel. Simpson had a note of number of cask. I asked what the number was, and Simpson said, 'Here you are,' and pulled out a note-book and told me the number. He mentioned the number which was on the cask. The bung was a little chipped looking. We talked about the spile, and Sym said it looked like a soft wood spile. Then we went and saw both Martin and Stark. . . . Cross.—I saw the men again with Duncan, and they again denied the charge, and gave the same story as before. They both told the same story—at least very nearly so. I did not see much that was suspicious about the cask. It was Sym that pointed out that the spile was soft wood."

George Duncan, police-inspector, deponed,—"I went to Sym's and saw the cask. . . . There was a white soft spile in the bung, and at side of spile there appeared to have been a corkscrew slightly inserted into the bung, and drawn out again, ruffling the surface of the wood. I think it was a machine-made spile."

John Stewart, traffic superintendent, deponed,—"It was the defender's duty to bring the matter before his superiors. He is a very zealous officer, and a very honest reliable man. He has a responsible position."

James Anderson (69), coal-merchant and cement-merchant, Inverkeithing, deponed,—"Know Martin, and heard about the charge against him. I had a conversation with him upon the subject. I got a bottle of whisky among the cement and Martin came speering about it, and he asked me to taste it, and I did so. Then he told me defender had come upon them piercing a barrel, and had said they were in an awkward position, and that he had asked the defender not to say anything about it, but that 'he had done it already.'" such a case for one's self, pronounce a verdict such as was given by the jury here except on strong grounds; but as the case does turn on credibility, and as the evidence of the pursuers was distinct and clear on the matter, and as we have heard from the Judge who tried the case that they impressed him favourably in regard to their truthfulness, I am unable to say that the verdict is contrary to the evidence so that we should set it aside and send the case to another jury. Therefore I think we must discharge the rule.

LORD YOUNG.—The question is whether we have grounds upon which we can and ought to send this case to be tried again. The case is certainly peculiar. I have not seen an action in the course of my not short experience exactly like it. The defender has been I think over thirty years in the employment of the North British Railway Company, and for eighteen years he has been an inspector, with a duty of taking notice of—inspecting—the conduct of others, with a view to reporting anything which he sees amiss, and which he in his judgment (which is not inexperienced) thinks ought in the interests of the company to be reported. He did, in the case of the two pursuers, with respect to whom he had the duty I have referred to, give a report to his own superior officer in writing, which we have printed in these proceedings. He reports in it no more than that he saw one of the men using a gimlet in the side of a cask which was on its end. The porter was sitting on it with a water can in his hand, and the other man had just begun to use, or was just using, the gimlet. He does not say he saw them take anything out of the cask, but merely that he saw them in this suspicious position. He went to them and said,—"Men, you are in a very awkward position." That is what he reports that he did, and one of the men turned his head aside and said they were in an awkward position, and asked him to say nothing about it.

Now, I think it was his duty to report this, and that in doing so he was in a privileged position. When anybody speaks of another—a neighbour, or friend, or an enemy—slanders, or writes of him libellously, falsehood and malice are presumed, and it is incumbent on him to remove the presumption by shewing that what he said or reported is true. A man in the privileged position of the present defender is not in that case. His position altogether removes—excludes—any presumption of falsehood or malice, and makes it incumbent upon the party who charges him with having made a false and malicious charge to prove falsehood and malice. To prove that the charge is erroneous is not enough; it must be proved to be malicious, and in the common case—certainly in this case—the proof of malice, and the only proof of malice, is that it was false to his knowledge. When a man is in a privileged position where malice and falsehood are not presumed, but require to be proved, if it is shewn that what he said was false to his knowledge, that is evidence of the falsehood of course, and also of the malice. Now, it was incumbent upon the pursuers here to prove that; not only (to use an expression used by Lord Low) to present a case not unevenly balanced. I am by no means of opinion that the case here is evenly balanced. But where the burden is incumbent upon the pursuer as a condition of his success to prove malice—falsehood—so that that can be affirmed by a jury, he certainly does not discharge the onus upon him by presenting a case not unevenly balanced. Nor do I at all concur in the view that the jury, by saying that they were not convinced and not prepared to affirm that the pursuers had proved wilful and malicious falsehood on the part of the defender, thereby affirmed—at all thereby affirmed—that the pursuers had been guilty of dishonesty. They merely affirmed that the pursuers have not proved the case which it was incumbent on them to prove as a condition of their success. By finding that the party upon whom the onus lies did not prove that, they do not affirm that the contrary is the truth. If this old servant of the railway company, thirty years in their employment, and eighteen years in a comparatively high position, were indicted now—as he might well be upon a verdict by a jury finding that he was guilty of malicious falsehood—and the jury found that it was not proved against him, they would not thereby affirm that the two porters had been guilty of dishonesty. They would merely affirm that it had not been proved to their satisfaction — that there was not evidence which ought to satisfy anybody that that was the truth which could be affirmed by a verdict, which is a declaration of the truth. I suppose nobody can doubt for a single moment that any jury who were asked the question upon such evidence as was submitted to this jury,—"Is it proved that this man is a malicious slanderer and guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury?" would have said,—"No, it is not proved." Suppose any man—say the chief constable—going along the street, or in a railway station, and seeing somebody attempting to pick a pocket, goes up to him and says, "I saw you attempting to pick that man's or that lady's pocket," and takes him into custody against the man's remonstrances, who says, "Oh, don't take me, I will never do it again; I was hungry, I was wanting something, but I will really not do such a thing again." There is then a prosecution such as this against him as being a false and malicious slanderer. There is no suggestion that he had any malice—no suggestion that he knew the party or was otherwise than perfectly respectable himself, or that he had any knowledge whatever of the individual—nothing to suggest a notion of malice. Nevertheless the jury finds that it is proved, because the person whom he apprehended said,—"Oh, I am not guilty, I did not do it." There is nothing else here—nothing in the world besides the denial by the party who is charged by one having a duty as much as an inspector, a constable, or the head of the police force, to interfere in the matter as he has done—nothing except the denial of the party against whom the charge is made; and the learned Judge who tried the case said that if he had been trying it, and had had to return a verdict, he would have returned an opposite verdict from that which the jury here returned. Did the learned Judge mean when he said that, that by returning an opposite verdict he would have found the two pursuers guilty of dishonest conduct, or would have found merely that there was no reasonable evidence on which to come to the conclusion that this old railway servant had been guilty of wilful and corrupt falsehood? Now, I am clearly of opinion that there was no evidence heard upon which that conclusion—the opposite conclusion at which the learned Judge arrived—expressed in the verdict can alone depend.

Of course, a commonplace observation occurs here as in every case when there was evidence to submit to the jury,—that it was for them to judge.

No. 172.

June 26, 1896.
Martin and Stark v. Cruickshanks.

That observation is applicable, and is true in every case that comes before us on a motion for a new trial, upon the ground that on the evidence as we read it the verdict is not satisfactory. Motions for a new trial are not always, or even generally, upon the ground that there was no evidence at all for the consideration of the jury. It is said that there was not evidence which reasonably supports the verdict, and that is enough if the Court comes to that conclusion, and I put the question more than once in the course of the discussion whether in a case of this kind such a verdict as this had ever been returned where there was no evidence shewing malicious feeling on the part of the person in a privileged position towards the party against whom he made the charge. The answer was in the negative, and I do not believe that the experience of any one of your Lordships is different from my own in this, that I never met with or heard of a case such as this, where a perfectly respectable individual in a privileged position is found guilty of wilful and corrupt malice in inventing a charge against a person of whom he knew nothing and against whom he had no ill-will whatever. Such a case has never been presented. I am therefore of opinion that this is a clear case—I should say a gross case—in which we are not only entitled, but in our duty called upon, to grant a new trial—in duty to this highly respectable man, who, no one will be surprised to hear, is continued in the service of the company, against whom no one could believe such a charge as the jury have affirmed. I think it is in all justice to him our duty in such a gross case to send the case again for trial.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur in all that Lord Low said, except one observation, and that was, that if he had been trying this case himself he would have been unable to have got over the improbability of the defender, considering him as a most respectable man as Lord Young has said, having made a statement absolutely untrue and without foundation.

In dealing with this case I think that the question of probability and improbability is not for us to consider at all. The probabilities or improbabilities of any case, as affecting the effect to be given to the evidence adduced, is a consideration to be urged on the jury, and in this case was, we were told, urged as strongly, I have no doubt, as possible. It is just the peculiar function of the jury to deal with the probabilities of the case before them, in considering what effect they are to give to the evidence adduced. But if we are to consider probabilities, I repeat now what I said in the course of the discussion, that notwithstanding the respectability of the defender, I am not able to see that there is any more probability that the pursuers are thieves than that the defender is untruthful. The defender is a very respectable man, and has been a long time in the service of the railway company. Granted. The pursuers are respectable men, and have been a long time in the service of the railway company. Why should it be suggested that to save one man from the charge of untruthfulness, other two men are to be subjected to the charge or the supposition of dishonesty? I see no reason in the world for such a suggestion.

I quite concede that in this case the pursuers had to establish not only that the charge was false but that it was malicious. Have they not done so? The jury thought they had, for they affirmed it, and they did that on a charge of a very distinct character from the learned Judge who presided at the trial. His Lordship told the jury that there were two stories as they must have seen; that the story of the pursuers and the story of the defender were absolutely conflicting and contradictory, and that it was a question of credibility entirely, and one on which they must make up their own minds. If the defender's statement was true—if they believed the defender's evidence—then the pursuers could not succeed, for the defender had then established to the satisfaction of the jury that the statement he had made to his superior officer was true. If they believed the pursuers' case, then they must of necessity have disbelieved the defender, who did not suggest that he might have been mistaken, but told a circumstantial story, not only as to what the pursuers were engaged in doing, but as to the conversation which took place between him and them thereafter, which involved practically an admission of guilt on the part of the pursuers, and a request that their conduct should not be reported. Now, if that is not true, or if it is not believed—and that is the same thing—if the jury did not believe the defender's statement, it was the same as if it were not there at all,—then the defender's story was a story that was false, and false to his knowledge. Nothing could be more malicious; and if that was the view the jury took of the evidence they were entitled and bound to find for the pursuers as they did.

I have, contrary to my original intention rather, expressed some views that I had not intended to express in this case, because I think it is sufficient for the determination of the question before us to hold, as I do very distinctly hold, and I think I do in common with the learned Judge who tried the case, that there was sufficient evidence adduced by the pursuers to warrant the verdict returned if that evidence was believed. That it was believed is ascertained by the fact that the jury returned the verdict they did, and I am clearly of opinion that to grant a rule for a new trial in this case would be utterly inconsistent with the principles and practice that have ruled and formed part of our procedure during the whole time I have known the procedure of the Court.

Lord Moncreiff.—I have felt some difficulty about this case. The pursuers had to prove that the charge complained of was made by the defender maliciously, and I have no doubt that this was clearly explained to the jury by the presiding Judge. The peculiarity of the case is that there is no proof or suggestion of motive on the part of the defender to make the charge if it was not true. Further, in order to arrive at their verdict the jury must have held, not only that the defender swore falsely, but also that the station-master at Inverkeithing, and Angus, the railway detective, and Duncan, the police inspector, were not to be believed when they said that they saw marks of a corkscrew or other sharp instrument having been used on the cask.

But we are dealing with the verdict of a jury. The question is one of credibility. There is no room for mistake; the story on the one side or the other is false. The jury have thought fit to believe the evidence for the pursuers, and we cannot set aside their verdict unless we are prepared to hold that that evidence if believed is not sufficient to support it. Now, I am unable to say that if the evidence of the pursuers and the witnesses Sym and Stewart is to be believed, it is not sufficient to support the verdict. I have therefore with some hesitation come to the conclusion that the rule should be discharged.

Perth General Station Committee v. Ross.

THE PERTH GENERAL STATION COMMITTEE, Pursuers (Appellants).—Balfour—F. T. Cooper.
ALEXANDER ROSS AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—W. Campbell—Graham Stewart.

Railway—Right of railway to exclude from station persons other than travellers—Exclusion of hotel servants wearing hotel badge—Interdict.—The Perth General Station Committee presented a petition to the Sheriff to interdict A B, a hotelkeeper in Perth, "himself, or by his boots, or other servant . . . unlawfully entering or trespassing upon any of the railway stations . . . of the pursuers; and in particular from so entering or trespassing in or upon the Perth General Railway Station, or other works or premises connected therewith, while wearing the uniform or badge of the hotelkeeper, or of his hotel."

The petitioners stated that they were proprietors of Perth Station; that on 17th July 1894 they intimated to A B that they had right to prevent, and would not permit, hotel servants wearing hotel badges to appear upon their platforms; that on various occasions in July 1895 A B had sent the boots of his hotel, wearing the hotel uniform and badge, to wait the arrival of certain trains, and that the latter on each occasion had been asked by the petitioners' servants to leave the station, but that he had refused to do so.

The defender admitted that in July 1895 he had sent his hotel boots to meet customers arriving by train.

The Sheriff refused the petition, and on appeal the Court affirmed the Sheriff's judgment, holding (1) that an interdict against the pursuer or his servants "unlawfully entering" the station could not be granted, as such an interdict would not specify the act forbidden; and (2) that quoad ultra the interdict sought was merely to prevent hotel servants entering the station in a certain dress to meet customers, and that that was not a case for interdict.

Question, whether the petitioners' right of property in the station was of such a character as to entitle them to exclude from the station all persons other than travellers.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Perthshire.

ON 26th July 1895 the Perth General Station Committee, incorporated under the Perth General Station Act, 1865, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Perth against Alexander Ross, hotelkeeper, Royal British Hotel, Leonard Street, Perth, and Charles Julius, boots at that hotel, in which the Court was craved "to interdict the defender Alexander Ross himself, or by his boots or other servant, or any others in his employment, or acting for him, or for whom he is responsible, and the defender Charles Julius, from unlawfully entering or trespassing upon any of the railways, stations, or other works or premises of the pursuers; and in particular from so entering or trespassing in or upon the Perth General Railway Station, or other works or premises therewith connected, while wearing the uniform or badge of the defender Alexander Ross, or of the said Royal British Hotel, and from waiting the arrival of passenger trains therein for the purpose of obtaining customers for said hotel."

No. 173.

June 26, 1896. Perth General Station Committee v. Ross.

The pursuers averred that they were proprietors of Perth General Railway Station; that the defender Ross was tenant of the Royal British Hotel, Perth, and that Charles Julius was his boots or porter; that on 17th July 1894 the pursuers intimated to Ross that the pursuers had right to prevent persons with hotel badges appearing on the platforms of the station, and that the pursuers had instructed their servants to remove such persons. That at various specified dates in July 1895, the defender Ross had sent the defender Julius, his hotel boots, with the uniform and badge of the hotel, to await the arrival of certain passenger trains, and that on these occasions he was warned and requested by the officers or agents of the pursuers to quit the platforms, but that he refused to do so, and was persisting in repeating the trespass.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having trespassed upon the said Perth General Railway Station, the property of the pursuers, and declined to desist, the pursuers are entitled to have such trespass interdicted by the Court.

The defender Ross admitted that in the month of July 1895 he had sent his hotel boots with the uniform and badge of his hotel for the express purpose of meeting customers.

The defender Ross pleaded;—(2) There being no averment that the defender Ross or his servants ever unlawfully entered or trespassed on the Perth General Station, or that he or they ever awaited the arrival of passenger trains for the purpose of obtaining customers for said hotel, the pursuers are not entitled to interdict as craved, and the interim interdict awarded should be recalled and the petition dismissed, with expenses. (3) The defender Ross never having either by himself or his servants trespassed on the Perth General Station, and having no intention to trespass thereon, the pursuers are not entitled to interdict. (4) The pursuers having by statute immediate recourse against the defenders in the event of their wilfully trespassing on the Perth General Station, the present proceedings are unnecessary and oppressive, and the petition should therefore be dismissed, with expenses. (5) The object of the petition being an attempt to restrict the liberty of the defender Ross or his servants in the matter of wearing a uniform or badge is illegal, and the pursuers are not entitled to interdict.

The defender Julius did not appear, and decree in absence was pronounced against him.

On 1st August 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Grahame) granted interim interdict.

On 19th November a proof was allowed. It was proved that Ross did not by himself or his servants enter the station except for the purpose of accompanying passengers who were leaving his hotel, or of meeting passengers who had intimated that they were to arrive at his hotel, and that neither he nor his servants had "touted" for business, nor caused any obstruction or inconvenience at the Perth Railway Station.

On 13th February 1896 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor, in which he found "... that it is proved that on several occasions in the month of July 1895, as set forth in the pursuers' condescendence, the defender Ross was, by himself or his servants, present in said station while wearing the uniform or badge of his hotel, waiting the arrival of passenger trains, for the purpose of obtaining customers for his hotel: That it is not proved that such presence of the defender Ross, by himself or his servants, interfered with the proper or convenient management or control by the pursuers of their station: That the pursuers, as proprietors of said station, hold their said property under the condition of their not preventing its convenient use by any member of the railway travelling public, or with the presence therein of the keeper or servants of the hotel where such traveller has been staying, or which he may propose to go to, except in so far as is necessary for the proper management and control of the station, and for the securing of which the pursuers have power to make such regulations or bye-laws as they may think necessary: That the pursuers not having proved that the presence of the defender Ross, by himself or his servants, in said station has interfered with the pursuers' proper control or management thereof, and it having been proved that the exclusion of the defender Ross, by himself or his servant, from said station, as craved, would be an interference with the convenience of the members of the railway travelling public who have been staying, or propose to stay, at his hotel, the pursuers are not entitled to the interdict which they crave against him: Therefore recalls the interim interdict formerly granted, and refuses the prayer of the petition." *

* "NOTE.— . . . The sole point at issue is, as already stated, whether or not the pursuers, as proprietors of the Perth General Station, are at common law, and apart from the statutory provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, entitled to obtain interdict against the defender Ross, on the ground of his having, by himself or his servants, while wearing the uniform or badge of his hotel, illegally trespassed on the pursuers' property, and that he is threatening to continue to do so. In considering this, it must be kept in view that an alleged trespass on a railway station is not the same as the case of an alleged ordinary trespass upon private property which has been acquired and is possessed under the ordinary conditions and for the ordinary purposes of proprietorship, and it is right in dealing with the present case that this should be kept in view. The Perth Railway Station was acquired by the pursuers compulsorily and for railway purposes, and they cannot be held entitled to exercise the powers of proprietorship thus obtained in a manner inconsistent with the purposes for which a power of compulsory purchase was given to them. The public, and especially the railway-travelling public, are entitled to require that their enjoyment of the travelling facilities, in respect of affording which the pursuers compulsorily acquired the property of the Perth Railway Station, should not be interfered with; and in this connection it is worthy of remark that, in the Perth Station Hotel Act, 1865, the convenience of the railway-travelling public is set forth as a ground on which the building of said hotel should be authorised, and the granting of the statutory authority to erect said hotel may be taken as affording a presumption as well as an illustration of the reasonableness of holding that any unnecessary interference with the convenience of the travelling public in obtaining such hotel accommodation as may be required by them for railway travelling, in connection with either the departure from or arrival by train at the Perth Railway Station, is not warranted, in respect of the pursuers' right of proprietorship of said station.

"If the interdict which the pursuers here crave will have the effect of causing such interference, and as I think the evidence shews that it will, I am of opinion it cannot be granted. Under the present arrangement, which excludes from the pursuers' said station on the arrival and departure of trains any hotelkeeper or his servants, while wearing a badge and waiting for customers, except those belonging to the Station Hotel, inconvenience must, I think, be caused to a certain portion of the travelling public, who are thus unable, in consequence of this prohibition, to recognise the boots or servant of the hotel at which they intend to stay, and to whom they might apply for information, or give such instructions in regard to their luggage, or other matters bearing upon their convenience and comfort, as they might think right. Such a prohibition as this is, I think, beyond the right of the pursuers to make, and appears to me to be unnecessary, for though, no doubt, the unrestricted presence of hotel servants in uniform, and seeking or touting for customers at the arrival of trains, would probably lead to confusion and interference not only with the orderly conduct of the railway station business but with the comfort of the railway travellers themselves, the absolute prohibition which the pursuers seek is unnecessary, and whether or not it is their right to enforce this absolute prohibition is the question here at issue, and I am of opinion that it is not. The pursuers have, under the Railway Station Act, power to make such regulations or bye-laws as they may judge necessary for the regulation and control of the station, but they have not done so, and have insisted in the enforcing of their alleged right of absolute exclusion. It has not been shewn that the making of such regulations would be ineffectual to prevent the evil referred to, and looking to what is proved to have been done in other stations, the presumption is that such regulations could be made by the pursuers for the admission of hotelkeepers or servants, even while wearing the badge, to the railway station, without any injurious interference with its proper management and the convenience of the travelling public. The result which, in the whole circumstances, I have arrived at is that while pursuers would be quite within their right in requiring that the presence of hotelkeepers or their servants, while wearing the uniform or badge, in the station, should be only allowed under such regulations as might be necessary for the proper conducting of the station business and the convenience of the travelling public, the absolute exclusion which is asked for in the present action is beyond what the pursuers are entitled to require, and that therefore the defender Ross has not unlawfully trespassed on said station, and the interim interdict which has been granted against him ought to be recalled, and the prayer of the petition refused."

* "NOTE.— . . . This action is purely an application for interdict at common law. Such applications must be very precise as to the acts against which they crave interdict, and it must be clear that the acts which are sought to be interdicted are wrongous. As was said by one of the Judges in the case of Winans v. Macrae, 12 R. 1051:—'Interdicts are granted by Courts of law when appreciable wrong to a man, whether in his property or other rights, is threatened,' and in the case of Hay's Trustees v. Young, 4 R. 398, it was said that 'interdict is a remedy either against a wrong in course of being done, or against an apprehended violation of a party's right only to be awarded on evidence of the wrong, or on reasonable grounds of apprehension that such violation is intended.' Now, what is the wrong alleged here? It is said generally that the wrong was a trespass upon the private property of the Station Committee; that the station being the private property of the Committee, they are entitled to admit whom they please, and exclude whom they please, subject only to this that they are not entitled to exclude persons who have travelled or intend to travel by their railways, or who come to receive or send away goods that have been carried, or are to be carried, by such railways, and that accordingly any other person whom they prohibit to come there is a trespasser if he does come there after such prohibition. I cannot accept this as a correct statement of the pursuers' rights. I think that persons having lawful business in connection with any members of the public travelling by railway are, prima facie, entitled to access to the station in pursuit of such business. In particular, I think that if a traveller by railway writes to his own

The pursuers appealed.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) They had right by statute to the Perth Railway Station, and except in so far as they were bound to the public as railway carriers they were entitled to all the common law rights and remedies in connection with the station which any private individual had with reference to his own private property. It followed that they were, if they chose, entitled to exclude from their station all persons not resorting to it on railway business; in other words, all persons who did not employ them either to carry them as passengers or to carry their goods. They were even entitled to exclude people who came to the station in order to see their friends arrive at or depart from the station.[1] There was nothing novel in this, for in certain stations in Scotland and in many parts of the Continent, only passengers by the trains were allowed to go on to the platform. It was said that the pursuers by granting free admission to their own servants, and excluding the defender's servant, were granting an undue preference, in contravention of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 31), and interfering with the convenience of the travelling public. But the power of deal-servant, or to the servant of the hotel where he intends to reside, to meet him at the station, and assist him with his luggage, such servant cannot be deemed to be versans in illicito in entering the railway station for the purpose of meeting such traveller. It is, however, manifest that the presence of indefinite numbers of such persons might obstruct the railway officials in their duty, especially if they began interfering with passengers' luggage before it was out of the hands of the station servants. Accordingly, every railway company and the present pursuers have power, subject to the sanction of the Board of Trade, to make bye-laws and regulations for the management of their stations, and if these are broken they may be entitled to interdict against such breach. But no such regulations were made in the present case. Apart from such regulations, if it were proved that any particular hotel boots was in the habit of annoying passengers by touting, or of obstructing the station servants in their duty, a good case for interdict might be established against him. But no such case has been proved here, while, on the other hand, it has been proved that, as a rule at all events, the boots of the defenders' hotel only went to the station to meet customers who had written that they intended to arrive by specified trains. But the groundlessness of the present application for interdict is, I think, most clearly shewn by this, that according to the railway officials, and specially the railway constables, who in this matter are entirely corroborated by the witnesses for the defence, the whole gravamen of the offence complained of as having been perpetrated by the boots was that he appeared in the station in uniform, or with a hotel badge on his cap. This appears clearly from the evidence of William Donald, station constable, on the one hand, and of Charles Julius on the other. But that this is so is apparent all through the proof, and the prayer for interdict as amended only craves interdict, 'in particular against the defenders entering the station while wearing the uniform or badge of the defender, Alexander Ross, or of the Royal British Hotel.' I must say that it appears to me to be out of the question to hold that, at common law, the Station Committee are entitled to an interdict against anyone wearing what clothes he pleases in their station, unless ing with this question was now vested exclusively in the Railway Commissioners.[1] (2) Such being the nature of the pursuer's right of property, and the defender asserting his right to continue his invasion, interdict was the appropriate remedy. Winans'[2] case was in contrast to this, for the owner of the pet lamb did not assert any right to graze on the land. In the Institute of Patent-Agents[3] case there was no invasion of a right of property.

Argued for the defender;—(1) There was no analogy between the case of an alleged trespass on a railway station and a trespass upon private property. The station was acquired compulsorily by the pursuers for railway purposes, and they were not entitled to use it in any way inconsistent with these purposes. The public were therefore entitled to receive from them such reasonable travelling facilities as were claimed here. The undernoted cases shewed that the question of inconvenience to the public was one which the Court would consider,[4] and it was obvious that inconvenience would be caused to members of the public who had engaged rooms at the defender's hotel if his servant was excluded from the station. The gravamen of the pursuer's complaint was the wearing of the badge by the defender's servant, but any member of the public could wear what uniform he pleased in the station so long as it was decent. The attempted exclusion was also vexatious, for it was not proved that there had been any touting by the boots. If the railway officials found that the defender's servant caused any obstruction, they had it in their power to make rules and regulations, subject to the sanction of the Board of Trade, for the management of their station. Case v. Storey[5] had no application. It only decided that a station was not public in the same sense as a road. Further, in seeking to exclude the boots, the pursuers were granting an undue preference to their own servants, in contravention of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 31). (2) There was no appreciable wrong suffered by the pursuers, and they are of such a description as to be against decency or likely to cause a breach of the peace. Besides this, it is proved that some distinctive dress or badge is needed to enable travellers to recognise the particular boots whose services they desire to obtain, and I should think it a protection alike to the public and the Station Committee that such badges should be worn. With regard to the first part of the prayer for interdict, I think it is far too general in its terms to be granted, even were there grounds for an interdict at all, which I think there are not. On the whole matter I am of opinion that no case for an interdict at common law has been made out, in respect that no wrong has been proved, and that if it should turn out that the influx of hotel boots into the station is likely to become a source of inconvenience to the public and the railway officials, the proper remedy of the pursuers is to frame appropriate bye-laws for the regulation of hotel servants awaiting trains at the station, which would be applicable to all hotels alike."

interdict was therefore not a competent remedy.[1] In any view, the first part of the prayer for interdict was too vague.

Perth General Station Committee v. Ross.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a somewhat novel case. Indeed, none of the cases which were referred to in the course of the argument come near to it at all. The facts out of which it has arisen are these. The Perth Railway Station, which, of course, is a station of great size, and has a large number of passengers coming in crowds to it and leaving it in crowds, is managed by a joint committee of several railways. The hotels in the neighbourhood have been in the practice, where the passengers are leaving their hotels and going out by the trains, to supply servants from the hotel to help the passengers with their small things and luggage when getting into the trains. On the other hand, they have been in the practice of sending their servants to the station to meet passengers who have given notice that they intended to come to the hotel and wished to be met by someone from the hotel at the station. There is no question here, so far as I can see, of touting at the station—meeting the trains and touting for passengers who had not expressed any intention at all of going to a particular hotel. It is only at the request of passengers that hotel servants meet them. It further appears that the servants of these hotels have been in the practice, by instructions of their masters, of wearing a cap or badge by which it was made manifest to a passenger arriving that a particular individual was the boots or porter of a particular hotel. The Station Committee, while stating that they do not object to the servants of the hotels going to the station with passengers to see them off and meeting passengers by appointment, object to their coming into the station with the cap or badge shewing where they come from. A dispute on this point having arisen, and intimation having been given that servants of the hotels would not be allowed to enter the station and go near the trains wearing such a cap or badge, the question was brought to an issue by a servant appearing at the station with his badge or cap on, and, on the train entering the station, being ordered out of the station, and on declining to go, being taken out of the station by one of the station constables. Then the Station Committee raised this action of interdict, which is an action whereby it is sought in effect to have it declared illegal for the servants of these hotels to enter the station wearing a badge or cap with the name of the hotel on it, and that if they do so they shall be punishable as for breach of interdict.

Now, these being the facts, I may, in the first place, say unhesitatingly that I have no doubt whatever of the power of the Station Committee to regulate the use of the station—to regulate it even in the case of passengers actually going and arriving, subject, of course, to the Station Committee being put right if they take any steps in the regulation of the station which are not truly steps of reasonable regulation, but steps which they have no right to take. But it is to be kept in view that their right to have the station there, and their right to regulate it, originates in those whom they represent having been empowered to make the railways which come into it, and to make that station, because it was for the public advantage and convenience that it should be made. Therefore it is quite plain that all regulations they make must be regulations of proper management for the purpose for which they received statutory right to become proprietors of that place at all, and to erect the station as they did. There is one thing certain as regards these regulations which they may make, that they can get the means of enforcing them if they are regulations that ought to be made, because they can obtain the sanction of the Board of Trade to their regulations, with penalties attached against anybody committing a breach of them. And accordingly we know very well that in all large railway stations a long list of offences, which the public are not allowed to commit at stations or on the line, is posted up, with a statement of corresponding penalties, and we generally see, under these, placards stating that persons named have been fined for breach of some regulations, such as a regulation forbidding persons to alight from a train before it has been stopped, or from getting into the train while it is in motion. But here what is asked is that a servant of a hotel going on what is plainly in itself perfectly lawful business, and for the convenience of passengers coming to the station, shall be prevented from wearing such a cap or badge on his person as shall indicate that he is the servant of that hotel. That is the specific legal wrong which the Railway Station Committee demand shall be interdicted, so that the doing of it in future shall be followed by penal consequences. Suppose a person goes into the station in such a manner and for such a purpose, he could not be interdicted if he came in what is ordinarily called plain clothes. I cannot see that there is any ground for interdicting him if he wears something of the nature of uniform which is perfectly decent and according to propriety in itself. I see no ground whatever why the company should be entitled to ask interdict against that. I could quite understand that if any person who was not a servant of the company was to insist on dressing himself up in some costume for the purpose of being mistaken, or which might from its character and style be mistaken for the uniform of an officer of the company, in order that he might do something which only officials of the company might do, then steps might be taken to prevent that. But this is nothing more nor less than a demand that a servant from the hotel, of whom it is not said that he might not go into the station to meet a passenger—on the contrary it is said he may go—is to be interdicted from going merely because he wears a cap indicating that he is from the hotel. I do not think that this action forms any ground for granting interdict.

But it is also the fact that this Committee asks for an interdict in general terms. They desire to obtain an interdict against Ross and his servant—why they should have brought in the servant at all I cannot understand—from unlawfully entering or trespassing upon any of the railways, stations, and other works or premises of the pursuers. It would be a very extraordinary thing if such an interdict should be granted. If it was, they could be brought up and subjected to criminal punishment merely because they entered the station. It is a perfectly vague and general demand that the defender is to be interdicted from "unlawfully" entering the station. The station is a place which he has a right to enter into, and in the course of business may require to enter. But in this prayer for interdict there is no definition and no limitation, and to grant interdict in these general terms would, I think, be out of the question. I am of opinion that we should not interfere with what the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff have done.

No. 173.

Perth General Station Committee v. Ross.

LORD YOUNG.—We have a very simple case to deal with. There is a general prayer for interdict, to which your Lordship has referred, against Mr Alexander Ross, who is a hotelkeeper in Perth, by himself or by his boots, or other servants or any others in his employment, unlawfully entering or trespassing upon any of the railways, stations, or other works or premises of the pursuers.

Now, it is not alleged that Mr Ross claims any right to be in the railway station unless he is either departing or arriving by a train there, or unless he is going or sending to meet a guest expected at the hotel, and who has sent word that he is coming, or accompanying a guest from the hotel who is going to the station with his luggage. There is no suggestion of any other pretence on his part of right, or that he ever acted otherwise than as a hotelkeeper arriving or departing at that station, or sending guests to the station with their luggage, or sending to meet guests expected at the station, and conducting them to the hotel to which they had sent notice. There is a particular reference in the prayer, no doubt, in regard to wearing a uniform, or badge, or anything indicating Mr Ross' hotel, but we are relieved from the necessity of dealing with that, although it would be very easily dealt with, by the very proper and candid admission of Mr Balfour that if his argument is good for anything it is good without the cap. He maintains that Mr Ross is not entitled to come with guests from the hotel, or to send anybody with guests from the hotel, or to meet guests for the hotel. If his argument is good for anything, it is good to exclude that. And it is also good—if good for anything—to have any man interdicted from ever going to meet his wife at the station or to take her there and see her off with her luggage or to send his servant to meet her or to see her off. The station is private property, the pursuers say, and they are absolute private proprietors, incorporated by Act of Parliament, and they maintain that they are just as much entitled to keep husbands or wives or servants, with or without livery, out of the station as any private individual is entitled to keep anybody out of his dining-room who is not invited or welcomed there. Now, I think that is absolutely ridiculous. It is not law, and it is certainly not sense.

I am by no means of opinion that it is for us to say in this action, or perhaps in any action, what a railway company may do in the way of putting up rails or fences to exclude people from approaching a platform where the trains are arriving or starting, and letting in through the gate only certain people, and excluding others. But I am not disposed at all to put up the rail of an interdict against Mr Ross or his servants, or against anybody else, under such circumstances as are set forth here. If this Committee choose to take the responsibility of putting up practical physical impediments, they will be answerable for their conduct, but we are not going to put up an interdict to prevent husbands coming or going with their wives, or brothers with their sisters, or servants being sent with any of the family to see them off and their luggage fairly put on board the train. The Committee may make any regulations they please. They will have to be submitted to another authority before they are approved of and become operative, but in the meantime, upon facts which I think we must find in conformity with the Act of Parliament, here I think there is no case whatever made out for an interdict. The proof makes clear enough—what indeed I think was not seriously disputed—that Mr Ross never sends his servant except with guests from the hotel, or to meet guests who were coming, and therefore we may find that is the fact. But I put the question whether it had ever been disputed that that was the truth of the matter, and the answer I got was "No," and it is rather a curious observation to have to make, and with this long and ridiculous proof—for that is the character of it—that the answer I got from each of the parties to the question was that there was no fact in dispute between them. We will have to put findings under the Act of Parliament as to what we hold to be the facts of the case upon the evidence. I would put in merely findings to the effect which I have already stated, namely, that there was no going by the hotelkeeper or sending by the hotelkeeper with passengers or to meet passengers except guests going from or coming to the hotel. And upon that find that there are no grounds whatever for the interdict asked, and accordingly dismiss this application, with expenses.

Lord Trayner.—In the course of the debate before us on this appeal some observations were made indicating that the question here raised involved questions regarding the facilities which the pursuers were bound to afford the public, and of undue advantage conferred by the pursuers on some persons over the advantages conferred on others. In my opinion no such questions are raised here, or involved in the question, and the only question, we are called upon to decide. Nor do I think it necessary to consider or determine what are the rights of the pursuers in their General Station at Perth and the accesses thereto. Whether their right is absolute, as that of a private proprietor, or conditional and limited by the purpose for which they are alone entitled to hold and use their railway and station, is a matter on which I give no opinion, any such opinion being in my view unnecessary for the decision of this case.

The pursuers seek an interdict in certain terms, and the question is, are they entitled to what they seek? I think they are not. The first thing prayed for is an interdict against the defender "from unlawfully entering or trespassing upon any of the railway stations," &c., of the pursuers. No interdict can be granted on these terms. It is certain that entering upon the pursuers' premises is not, in the circumstances, unlawful for the defender, and to grant interdict in the terms prayed for would leave it to be determined, and that in a quasi-criminal proceeding, what was lawful and what was unlawful entering on the pursuers' premises. It would be unfair to the defender to grant any interdict against him without specifying precisely what it is he is prohibited from doing, so that he may know, and know exactly, what he may not do without incurring the penalties which attach to breach of interdict. The second branch of the prayer seeks an interdict against the defender's servant from entering, and the defender from sending his servant to the station, wearing the badge or uniform of the defender or of his hotel. The pursuers have no right to such an interdict, because they have no right to dictate to the persons coming to their station what clothes they shall wear, or to prohibit anyone coming there in whatever costume or uniform he pleases, provided it be decent and one which he is otherwise entitled to wear. The last branch of the prayer of the petition is for interdict against the defender or his servants waiting the arrival of trains "for the purpose of obtaining customers for said hotel." I think this must also be refused. It is not proved that the defender ever went or sent his servant to the station "for the purpose of obtaining customers"; on the contrary, it is established that the defender's servants only went to the station to meet customers who were coming to the defender's hotel, or with customers who were leaving it, so that there is no ground in fact on which this part of the prayer could be sustained. I am not to be understood as expressing any opinion as to whether the pursuers would have been entitled to interdict in terms of this part of the prayer had the facts averred in support of it been established.

The pursuers have the power to regulate the use of their station by rules and bye-laws issued by them with the approval of the Board of Trade. It appears to me that that affords a better way of regulating the station than is afforded by an application like the present.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am satisfied that the pursuers are not entitled to interdict in terms of any branches of the prayer. They ask, in the first place, that the defenders should be interdicted from "unlawfully entering or trespassing upon any of the railways, stations, or other works or premises of the pursuers." This is far too general. The pursuers were bound to specify wherein the unlawful entering or trespass sought to be interdicted consists. If, for instance, by the words quoted it is meant that anyone who enters the precincts of a railway station without intending to travel by the railway, or without having travelled or arrived by it, commits a trespass, this should have been distinctly stated.

In regard to the remainder of the prayer, I am satisfied from the proof that it is not proved that the respondents entered the complainers' premises for the purpose of "obtaining" customers. They only went there for the purpose of meeting customers who were known to be arriving by train, or to see customers off.

It is not proved that the defender Ross's boots touted for business or caused any disturbance or confusion.

As to the boots' uniform or badge—if the complainers are entitled to exclude from the station, without reason assigned, any person except travellers, they may attach any conditions they please, and therefore they may exclude a man on account of any badge or uniform he may choose to wear. But taken by itself it is not a ground for interdict.

The more general question which was dealt with in argument, viz., whether the pursuers are entitled, as matter of right, to exclude not merely from their platforms, but from the precincts of their stations, anyone who has not actually travelled or is about to travel by the railway, is not properly raised. It is not covered by the prayer, and leave to amend was not asked.

June 26, 1896. Perth General Station Committee v. Ross.

But I must say that as at present advised I am not prepared to affirm that broad and startling proposition. A railway company is not in the position of an owner of private property. They hold their stations for the convenience of the travelling public. It may be that the ultimate decision as to what facilities they are bound to provide for the travelling public rests with the Railway Commissioners. But when a railway company applies to this Court for interdict on such grounds, in the absence of any deliverance by the Railway Commissioners, I do not think that they should obtain the assistance of the Court, unless their right is demonstrated beyond doubt. Now, prima facie, there are many cases in which a passenger requires as a necessary convenience the attendance of a relative or servant to see him away or meet him at the train, and to call the relative or servant a trespasser seems an abuse of the term. To recognise the traveller's right to have this accommodation in no way interferes with the railway company's right to regulate the admission of those who are not passengers. They have power to frame regulations, to be approved of by the Board of Trade, and possibly they have power without any such sanction to erect barricades at the platforms or other suitable places within the station. But what the pursuers desire to do here is to exclude such persons altogether from the premises. As I have said, whatever remedies they may be able to obtain from the Railway Commissioners on cause shewn, I do not think they are entitled to interdict at common law.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors appealed against: Find in fact (1) that the defender did not by himself or his servants enter the pursuers' station except for the purpose of accompanying passengers who were leaving his hotel, or of meeting passengers who had intimated that they were to arrive at the defender's hotel; and (2) that neither the defender nor his servants have caused any obstruction or inconvenience at the pursuers' station: Find in law that the pursuers are not entitled to interdict against the defenders as craved: Therefore recall the interim interdict formerly granted: Refuse the prayer of the petition, and decern."

Burgh—Police—Drainage of houses—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. 273), secs. 332-5—Glasgow Police Amendment Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. c. 221), sec. 16.—Section 16 of the Glasgow Police Amendment Act, 1890, enacts that if the drains of any house, &c., are found to be defective, the owner of the premises shall be bound immediately on an "order to that effect being given by the Police Commissioners, to carry out all necessary operations for removing defects of structure, and to do such acts as may be requisite to prevent risk to health, and failing compliance the Police Commissioners may do the work and recover the expenses from the owner." No appeal is provided.

By secs. 335, 337, 321, and 322 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, the Police Commissioners are empowered to require owners of houses to construct new drains if such should be necessary; and it is provided that in the event of an owner objecting the case shall be brought before the Dean of Guild.

Glasgow Police Commissioners v. M'Omish & Arthur.

The Glasgow Police Commissioners having found the drains of a block of houses to be defective, issued an order in terms of section 16. The owner having failed to obey the order, the Police Commissioners proceeded to execute certain work, on the advice of their sanitary engineer, discarding as useless the materials of the old drain, and constructing at a safer distance from the property a new drain in a different site, and with a different outflow.

In an action by the Police Commissioners against the owner for the expenses of the work, the Court (diss. Lord Young) assoilzied the defender on the ground that the proceedings of the pursuers were not warranted by section 16 of the Act of 1890, in respect that it only contemplated repairs to existing structures, and not the formation of a new system of drainage.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

THE GLASGOW POLICE COMMISSIONERS having spent a sum of £80, 10s. 8d. on the drainage of a block of houses at Garngad Hill, Glasgow, raised this action for repayment of the amount against J. & J. M'Omish & Arthur, the factors for the proprietor of the houses, and as such owners in the sense of the Glasgow Police Acts.

The action was raised in the following circumstances: In March 1894 the sanitary inspector of the city intimated to the defenders that there were reasonable grounds for believing that the drains of the houses were defective so as to cause risk to health, and that a test would be applied on a certain date. The drains were found to be defective, and on 4th April 1894 the sanitary inspector issued to the defenders this notice:—

No. 174.
June 26, 1896.
Glasgow Police Commissioners v. M'Omish & Arthur.

Glasgow, of which you are owners, there exists the following nuisance within the meaning of the Glasgow Police Acts, 1866 to 1890, viz.:—"Drains in back court and in wash-houses are very defective, also branch drains from sink conductors and under surface gratings, and in wash-houses untrapped, likewise the whole is discharged into the Monkland Canal.

"Remedy.—Disconnect from canal and lay down a new drainage system from present drain in court through close at No. 134 Garngad Hill, and insert in drain under foot pavement of street an improved ventilating trap, &c. With certification that, if you fail to do so, the said Police Commissioners will immediately thereafter take proceedings to enforce the provisions of said Acts."

At this time it was supposed that by taking the drains through the closes junction could be effected with a public sewer in front or on the west side of the houses. It was afterwards discovered, in the course of the operations conducted by the Police Commissioners, that the public sewer did not run in front of the houses, but stopped some distance from the south gable of the block. The assumption that the drains discharged into the Monkland Canal was also erroneous. They were actually connected with the public sewer.

Representatives of the sanitary authority and the defenders met at the premises on 11th April, and it was agreed to delay operations until the defenders could consult their client, the owner. The pursuers again urged the execution of the works, and on 10th September the defenders informed them that they were unable to induce the owner to undertake the repairs, and that the pursuers would require to do the work and charge them with the expense. "The matter was, however, allowed to lie over till on or about the 20th of September 1894, when the defenders or their representatives called on the sanitary inspector, and he then informed them that he insisted on their executing the work specified in said notices dated 4th April 1894." This was stated in cond. 8, and admitted.

The following notice was served upon the defenders on 25th September 1894:—"53° and 54° Victoriæ, cap. 221, sec. 16.—The Glasgow Police (Amendment) Act, 1890.—By virtue and in terms of section 16 of the Glasgow Police (Amendment) Act, 1890, the Glasgow Police Commissioners hereby intimate to you that the drains connected with the houses or buildings situated at 134, 140, 146, 152, 160, and 164 Garngad Hill, Glasgow, have, after examination thereof, been found to be defective, so as to cause risk to health, and order you, as the owner of said houses or buildings, to carry out all necessary operations for removing defects of structure, or to do such acts as may be requisite to prevent risk to health, and that within seven days from this date, under certification that if you fail to comply with this order within the above period, the said Police Commissioners will, on the expiry thereof, execute the work, and recover the expense thereof as damages from you, all in terms of the section above mentioned of the said Glasgow Police (Amendment) Act, 1890."

The defenders failed to execute the repairs.

The sanitary inspector then took estimates for the work, and the operations were conducted under the superintendence of the sanitary engineer of Glasgow, by whose advice a new drain was laid down some feet further from the windows of the houses than the old drain, and the materials of the old drain were discarded as injured and useless, and new pipes were used. As the pursuers were ignorant that the old drain was connected with the public sewer, they connected the new drain to the sewer by a new outfall.

The defenders refused to pay the expense of these operations.

After a proof, the Sheriff-substitute (Spens), on 14th March 1896, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the Sanitary Inspector for the city of Glasgow had, on or about March 1894, reasonable grounds for believing that the drains connected with the houses or buildings at Garngad Hill, specified in article 2 of the condescendence, of which defenders were factors, were defective: Finds that he gave notice to defenders on 16th March, having in view the 16th section of the Glasgow Police Act, 1890, that the sufficiency of said drains would be tested on 2d April 1894: Finds on the said 2d April the smoke test was applied to the drains in said tenement, with the result of indicating the drains were defective, and finds in point of fact said drains were defective: Finds that certain procedure thereafter went on, but finally, on 24th September, the pursuers, the Glasgow Police Commissioners, issued an order under the 16th section of the statute above referred to, ordaining the defenders to carry out all necessary operations for removing defects of structure, or to do such acts as might be requisite to prevent risk to health, and that within seven days, under certification that if they failed to comply with said order within said period the pursuers would execute the work at the expense of the defenders: Finds nothing was done by defenders, and the sanitary inspector, on or about 17th October 1894, ordered the witness John Shaw to proceed with the work, which the sanitary authorities specified as in their opinion necessary to put the drainage right: Finds the charge for the work done in connection with the premises by the said John Shaw amounted in cumulo to the sum of £80, 10s. 8d., being the amount of the account sued on: Finds, under reference to note, the defenders are liable for said expenditure by pursuers; therefore repels the defences, and decerns as libelled: Finds defenders liable in expenses," &c.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—The pursuers' proceedings were ultra vires. The notice of 25th September referred to and incorporated the notice of 4th April, and both were under section 16 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1890. From the first a new drainage system was contemplated and ordered. All that the corporation could legitimately do was to call for remedy without specification.[1] If on failure of the owner the pursuers did the work, they could only repair the existing structure. Instead of this they had made a drain which was new throughout. Accordingly they were outside the provisions of section 16 of the Act, and the defenders were not liable.[2] They should have proceeded under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sections 332-335, or under the Public Health Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 101), section 85, which was applicable to Glasgow, both of which applied where there was either no system at all, or where an existing system had to be discarded.

the judge of sanitation, and the Court would only interfere in very exceptional circumstances. [LORD TRAYNER.—We might not interfere in respect of the manner in which a Local Authority executes what it has power to do, but here was there not a new construction substituted for repair?] Even if there were, the pursuers were within the statute. "All necessary operations for removing defects of structure," and "such acts as may be requisite to prevent risk to health," were sufficient to cover a new structure. Section 335 of the Act of 1866 did not apply. It concerned a case where there was no drain, or where a sewer only went part of the way. Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Paterson was not in point, for the only question was whether the statutory words were wide enough to cover any actings. These only involved a renewal of the drain, and a removal of defects.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuers ask that the defenders be ordained to pay the expense of certain works executed upon property for which they are responsible as proprietors, the legal ground for the claim being statutory, and statutory only. The pursuers are the public authority which has certain statutory powers in regard to the drainage of house property in Glasgow; that power includes the right to examine drains, and if defects are found, to give notice to the proprietor or his factor to have the defects remedied, and if this be not done then to execute the works necessary to cure the defects and to charge the defaulting owner with the expense. These powers are conferred by the Glasgow Police Act of 1890. In this case the public authority represented by the pursuers proceeded under section 16, and under section 16 only. No notice was given under any other section, or under any other Act of Parliament. The procedure was that a notice under section 16 was served by which the defenders were called upon "to carry out all necessary operations for removing defects of structure or to do such acts as may be requisite to prevent risk to health." The work was not done by or for the proprietors, and thereupon the pursuers proceeded to do certain works themselves, for the cost of which they now sue. The real question is whether what they did were works falling under the notice. If they were, then the defenders have no answer to the pursuers' claim. What the pursuers in point of fact did was to substitute an entirely new drain some feet out from where the existing drain was at the back of the premises, and to carry a new drain from the end of the houses to the main drain which was in the road in front of them. I am unable to hold that this work was work which can be held to fall within the notice under section 16. That section bears to relate to the remedying of defects of structure requiring remedy, not to entirely new works. It is true that to the words "removing defects of structure" these words are added "or to do such acts as may be requisite to prevent risk to health," but I cannot hold that these words are to be read as separate from the previous words of the section, which point at remedy of defect in the existing system. The notice indicates that this, and nothing more, is contemplated, allowing as it does only seven days for the completion of the work. The words are "to carry out . . . and that within seven days," which seems quite inconsistent with the idea that proceedings are contemplated in which no portion of the existing works is to be utilised at all, but an entirely new system substituted for them.

It is to be observed that the public authority has power, where this is necessary, to require that a property not drained shall have a system of drainage put in, and to require that a bad system which cannot be made efficient shall have a proper system substituted for it. But in such a case the procedure is different. Whereas under section 16 of the Act of 1890 the proprietor has no option but to submit to the order or to do the work for himself or pay for it if on his failure the Commissioners execute it, the Police Act of 1866 provides that if a proprietor is to be required to put in a new system of drainage, the authority of the Dean of Guild Court must be invoked, the matter being considered by a judicial tribunal which will deal impartially between the executive authority and the private citizen, and an appeal being open to a higher Court where grounds for appeal may exist.

In this case the work done was one entirely of substitution of a new system, professedly under a mode of procedure which gave the citizen no protection by judicial inquiry or appeal. The proprietors had no reason to expect that anything more would be done than the notice under section 16 of the Act of 1890 implied. As matter of fact one part of the work, viz., the new drain leading to the main street drain was not made because of any defect in the existing drain, but because the Commissioners were not aware of the existence of the drain, and believed that the sewage of the defenders' houses passed in an opposite direction into the Monkland Canal.

I do not lay any weight upon the fact, although it illustrates the looseness of the Commissioners' procedure, that before the formal notice under sec. 16, notices had been given in which they specified certain works which they required to be done, and which it turned out were based upon a totally erroneous idea, that there was a main street drain in front of the defenders' houses, which drain did not in fact exist. I take the case as if the notice on 25th September under sec. 16 was the only notice given. I have not been able to hold that the works done were such as fall under the notice, and therefore, although I agree with the Sheriff-substitute in thinking that the officials of the Commissioners acted in bona fide, still I think that the works they executed were not such as can, under the notice served upon the defenders, be charged against them.

LORD YOUNG.—It is admitted, and indeed is the case of both parties, that the appellants, although only the factors for the owners of the premises referred to in the pleading, must in this action be regarded and dealt with as if themselves the owners. I am nevertheless of opinion that account may be, and ought to be, taken of the conduct of the owner himself, as to which we have the evidence of his factors and of his own letter of 27th March 1895.

The premises in question consist of a tenement of houses in Glasgow. The tenement comprehends eighty-two houses of about three rooms each, and occupied by several hundred individuals. It is more than twenty-five years old. In 1893 and 1894 complaints were made to the sanitary inspector of the condition of the drains connected with the tenement, which were said to be very bad, sending foul and smelling air into the houses, and causing enteric fever, which in one case at least ended in death. The inspector, in consequence, communicated with the defenders with a view to proceedings being taken under section 16 of the Glasgow Police Amendment Act, 1890, for testing the drains, removing defects, and doing such acts as might be requisite to prevent risk to health. It is not questionable, or I think questioned, that this was his duty. This was the only notice given. That which the Lord Justice-Clerk referred to was not a notice, but an order. The result was that the drains were found to be very bad indeed. This was found not only by the smoke test, but by the test of all the eyes and noses which were used for the purpose. The defenders afforded all due facilities for testing and examining the drains, and themselves saw and knew the results. There is not, I think, a statutory duty on the Commissioners of Police, or of the Health Committee, or sanitary inspector, when informing an owner that his drains are defective and dangerous to health, to point out or suggest remedies; but Mr Fyfe, the chief sanitary inspector of Glasgow, in his evidence says,—"The Health Committee desire to do it just out of courtesy to the proprietors before Mr Lang is asked to issue the statutory notice." This course was followed in the intimations made to the defenders in April 1894, and led to a request by the defenders that Mr Fyfe should meet them on the ground on 11th April. The meeting took place accordingly on that day between Mr Crawford, who was then, and is now I suppose, inspector under Mr Fyfe, and Mr Arthur, one of the defenders' firm. An account of the meeting is given by Crawford, the result being that Mr Arthur asked a fortnight's delay, which was granted. Nothing was done by the defenders, and the trifling pressure by the pursuers resulted in Mr M'Omish, one of the defenders, calling on Mr Fyfe, on 10th September, and saying to him,—"I am afraid you will require to do the work and charge us with the expenses." This is the evidence of Mr Crawford who was present, and of Mr Fyfe. Mr M'Omish explained "that he could not get the proprietor to move in the matter, and do anything." Mr M'Omish's own account of his client's conduct in the matter is very frank, and I think in accord with the evidence of Crawford and Fyfe. The evidence of these witnesses satisfies me that the police and sanitary authorities did not act hastily, but, on the contrary, gave much indulgence to the defenders, or rather perhaps to their seemingly eccentric and impracticable client. Mr Fyfe says that he instructed Mr Shaw to proceed with the removal of the nuisance on 17th October. "That was about seven months after I had first started this case, and after I had been delayed more or less by the factors or the proprietor. On various occasions they requested delay from my inspector and from me."

Thus far the case seems clear. The drains connected with the tenement were "found defective" in the only practical meaning of the word in a clause of a sanitary Act requiring that drains shall not be allowed to continue in a state causing risk to health, viz., so unfit for their purpose as to cause such risk. The duty of the owner of the premises with which these defective drains were connected is described in these very plain words—"The owner of the premises shall be bound, immediately on an order to that effect being given by the Police Commissioners, to carry out all necessary operations for removing defects of structure, or doing such acts as may be requisite to prevent risk to health." There is nothing whatever in the Act prescribing that this must be done in seven days. It is in the order, but I attach no importance to this. If the work had been begun, or steps taken for its execution within seven days, that would have been sufficient, and no proceedings would have lain against the appellant because the work was not completed within that time. An order to the above effect was admittedly given by the proper authority on 25th September 1894, and disregarded by the owner of the premises, who took no notice of it, and did nothing in consequence of it. This failure of duty by the owner is not denied or defended. He undoubtedly ought to have ascertained for himself whether any, and if so what, operations were necessary "for removing defects of structure," and what acts, if any, were "requisite to prevent risk to health." If assured that no such operations or acts were "necessary" or "requisite" he was entitled to prevent the Police Commissioners from executing any work on his property under section 16 of the Act. This is really not doubtful, but it would be unprofitable to pursue this topic, it being clear, and indeed admitted, that some "operations" and "work" were "necessary" and "requisite." The skilled witnesses for the defenders in the proof before us suggest in their evidence the advice they would probably have given if consulted as to what was necessary to be done to satisfy the reasonable requirements of the sanitary authorities. Now, why was such advice not taken and acted on? Abundance of time to do so was given, but nothing done. It was, in these circumstances, clearly the duty of the Police Commissioners to ascertain for themselves what operations and acts were necessary, and to execute them. This is what they did, acting throughout as a public body in the discharge of a public duty put upon them by statute. It is of course conceivable that they might have been otherwise and better advised than they were, and so remedied the defective drainage at less cost to the owner. But I am not disposed to give very favourable attention to criticism and complaint of this sort by an owner who declines to do his duty by attending to the matter for himself.

The Commissioners were advised, and acted on the advice, that the pipes in the existing drain were of bad material and bad construction, and much broken, that they were not worth lifting, and that the proper thing to do was to get and use new pipes of better material and more efficient construction. They were also advised, and acted on the advice, that it was requisite, to prevent risk to health, that the pipes of the main drain should be laid two or three feet further from the windows of the tenement. This was all done openly and slowly on the property, with due notice to and in the sight of the owner's factors, who were themselves fully informed of everything that was intended to be done and was done, and who kept their client duly informed, although he did not choose to notice their communications.

It is said that the Commissioners incurred extra expense through a mistake on their part as to where the outlet of the drain was. I attach no importance to this. The owner's letter of 27th March 1895 is rather an important one, and shews where the mistake as to the outlet of the drain sprang from. Mr Macdougall there writes to his agents, the defenders—"You are perfectly aware that I have all along denied the right of the sanitary inspector to order the diversion of the drainage system from the former outlet to the canal into the road at my expense."

I think there is really no good objection to the proceedings of the Police Commissioners, or to any of the operations which they executed under presumably competent advice. But if I thought otherwise I should be disposed to hold that the owner was barred from objecting in respect of his own failure of duty, and his conduct in standing by and seeing and allowing without objection what was done by the Police Commissioners that the public health might not suffer from his failure.

The evidence shews, I think, satisfactorily—first, that the drains were defective in the sense of being so unfit for the purpose to which they were habitually and continuously put by the large population living in the tenement with which they were connected as to be seriously dangerous to health. Second, that the owner of the tenement failing to comply with the statutory order to carry out the necessary operations for removing the defects, the Police Commissioners executed the work which they believed to be necessary "for removing defects of structure" and preventing "risk to health." Third, that the defects were thereby removed and risk to health prevented; and fourth, that there was no extravagance or excess in the extent or course of the work thus executed. I have already said that I think it would be necessary for an owner who had failed to perform his own duty by executing the necessary work himself to establish a clear and even gross case of extravagance and excess to entitle him to decline to relieve the Police Commissioners of their actual outlay.

I have now to consider another view, which was the last which occurred in the case, namely, that the operations which were executed were not such as were authorised by clause 16 of the statute. I think it is according to the evidence that the drains were defectively constructed. I do not know what drains consist of except material and structure. The pipes are not the drains. The pipes are the material used in constructing the drains. Nevertheless defects in the pipes are, I suppose, defects of structure, and I suppose defects in the material would be defects of structure, and what other defects can a pipe have except defects of material or structure? What defects can a drain have except such defects? A defective drain is one not so constructed with such pipes so laid as to answer the purpose to which a drain is put consistently with due regard to the health of the inhabitants of the houses in the neighbourhood. When drain-pipes are of bad material, when they have no joints such as drain-pipes ought to have, and when they are so bad as not to be worth relaying, what is the remedy for that defect of structure? I think common sense would suggest to put in better material. Can any other remedy occur to any human being? That is what they did, and it is according to the evidence that that was a reasonable and proper thing to do. I do not mean that there may not be difference of opinion, that some of the witnesses might not think that some of the pipes might have been made to answer, and other pipes put in for the broken ones, and the asphalt lifted and relaid—in short, that the Police Commissioners might have repaired the existing pipes, putting in new pipes at some places and using the old at some other places, and trying to mend the joints as well as they could. But if the police authorities were advised that the most economical course, and the only sensible course—and if they believed that the economical and sensible course—was to put in new pipes better jointed, are we to say in point of law that that is a new system of drainage, and that it is not removing defects of structure? I know of no authority for that. It does not recommend itself as a reasonable proposition to my mind. Are we to inform the sanitary authorities in Glasgow and elsewhere that they cannot under this clause put in new pipes of good material and good construction in place of old pipes of bad material and bad construction without taking proceedings under a statute thirty years old as to the construction of new drains altogether? I cannot assent to that. I do not think it is reasonable, and in my view of the law the law is not so unreasonable as to take that view. But then it was said if you remove the drain-pipes, and put them further from the windows, that is not within clause 16, because it is not removing a defect of structure. I am not persuaded of that. Structure does not mean merely building. The sense of the word is not limited to that. It means placing and arrangement. But I do not need to pursue that, because they are not merely entitled, but bound, to do any act which is requisite to prevent risk to health. Now, it is an unintelligible proposition that the sanitary authorities may be rightly advised, and they were advised here, that an act certainly requisite in the opinion of very competent people to prevent risk to health was to remove these pipes further from the windows, and yet that they are not within the statute if they follow this advice. So long as they were perfectly tight they might be under the floor of the house or within the house, but then there is always the risk of leakage at any time. Well attended to drains are tested from time to time to see whether leakages are not occurring, and I suppose most sanitary authorities would concur with the witnesses here, and say that removing the drains, especially when you are relaying the pipes at anyrate, is an act necessary to prevent risk to health. If the sanitary authorities do so, are we to say they are not within the statute, which provides for the very thing if it be necessary to prevent risk to health, or are we to decide this case on the footing that that is not necessary to prevent risk to health? There may be conflicting evidence on this point, but I do not think there is. All the witnesses for the sanitary authority are very clearly of opinion that the removal was necessary to prevent risk to health, and I have noted a passage in the opinion of the principal witness for the defender, Mr Glenister, on this subject,—"As to whether or not it is objectionable to have a sewer such as this old sewer was within two feet of a building line—I say, any drain so close to houses is objectionable even although it is for waste water, but it is a very common thing in Glasgow to have ventilating traps on soil-pipes within two feet of windows. I do not, as a sanitary authority, approve of that, and I ask the sanitary authority if they approve of it." Well, they did not, and in acting upon the reasonable advice which they received, and in laying pipes of better material and proper construction, and in removing them further from the window—I say they were acting in accordance with clause 16 of the statute.

Therefore, upon the whole matter I am of opinion that the whole proceedings of the sanitary authority here were right and unobjectionable; that there is no ground of complaint on the part of the objector; that we cannot with propriety interfere with what has been done by the sanitary authority, and that there was nothing done by them which was not authorised and required to be done by clause 16 of the statute. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the Sheriff here ought to be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed.

LORD TRAYNER.—The pursuers in this case sue the defenders for payment of the cost of certain drainage operations executed by the pursuers on or in connection with the defenders' property. Several considerations were urged upon us in the course of the argument why the defenders should not be held liable in the sum sued for, but regarding which I shall make no observation, thinking them, if not irrelevant, at all events not necessary to the decision of the question before us. That question really is whether the pursuers' proceedings (under which the amount sued for was incurred) were or were not authorised by section 16 of the Glasgow Police Act of 1890, the section under which alone the pursuers proceeded, and upon which alone they base their present claim. The facts out of which this question arises are of the simplest, and may be stated in a sentence or two. The pursuers having reason to believe that the drains connected with the defenders' property were defective, gave notice of this to the defenders, and required and ordered them "to carry out all necessary operations for removing defects of structure, or to do such acts as may be requisite to prevent risk to health," within seven days from the date of notice. This notice was dated 25th September 1894, and in express terms bore that it was issued "by virtue and in terms of section 16 of the Glasgow Police (Amendment) Act, 1890." The defenders did nothing to the drains of their property in response to this order, and the pursuers proceeded to execute the works, the cost of which is now sued for. They did not, however, proceed to remedy or remove defects of structure in the existing drains, but disregarding the existing structure altogether, laid down an entirely new drain in a different site, and with a different outflow. Now, if what the pursuers did is authorised by the section of the statute under which they gave their notice, they must prevail; if otherwise, they fail, their entire proceedings being unwarrantable. Accordingly, the question to be now decided is, as I have already stated, whether the pursuers' proceedings were authorised by that section or not. In my opinion that question must be answered in the negative. It appears to me that the section of the Act referred to only authorises the pursuers to call for repairs on an existing drain in order to remove or remedy defects therein. No doubt the section also authorises the pursuers to call upon the owners of the defective drains to do "such acts as may be requisite to prevent risk to health"; but I read that along with what goes before, and regard it as authorising a demand on the owner of the drain to do such acts of the kind,—that is, acts of the nature of repair or other remedy in connection with the existing drain as will prevent risk to health. In short, the statute appears to me to authorise the pursuers to order such repairs or alterations on an existing drain as will make it efficient and safe. But it does not authorise the pursuers to require the owner to make an entirely new drain, or on his failure, to make such a drain at his expense.

Glasgow Police Commissioners v. M'Omish & Arthur.

It is not without importance, in considering the construction to be put upon section 16 of the Act of 1890, to keep in view that the pursuers had authority to call upon the defenders to build a new drain, if that was what they thought necessary in the public interest, under the 335th section of their Police Act of 1866. Accordingly, it is not presumable that the Legislature, by section 16 of the Act of 1890, was conferring a power on the pursuers which they already possessed, or was merely repeating a clause formerly enacted. It is more reasonable to suppose that these statutory provisions were intended to provide for different cases—for repairs namely in one case, and construction in another. It is also noteworthy that the conditions attending the exercise of the power conferred by these two clauses are materially different. For repairs or "removing defects of structure," under section 16 of the 1890 Act, may be ordered wherever the pursuers are satisfied that the drains are defective, and there is no appeal provided for against such an order. It must be obeyed under penalty, and if not obeyed, the pursuers are authorised themselves to execute the work and recover the expense thereof as damages from the owners of the property. Under section 335 of the Act of 1866, however, which authorises the pursuers to call on an owner of property to construct new drains, the pursuers are not left sole judges of the propriety of such an order. Taking sections 337, 321, and 322 of the Act of 1866 together, it appears that when a new drain is deemed necessary, and is required by the pursuers to be constructed, the owner called on to do this work must be convened before the Dean of Guild, who may, as seems just to him, either enforce by his order the notice which the pursuers have given, or dismiss the application. The judgment of the Dean of Guild is not declared final, and therefore either the pursuers or the owner of property convened would have an appeal against the judgment of the Dean of Guild to this Court. Now, I think the difference in procedure under the two statutes may be accounted for in this way. If repair on existing drains is all that is required, presumably at no great cost—at all events no great cost in comparison with the cost of constructing an entirely new drain—then the pursuers may reasonably enough be allowed to judge of the necessity for such repairs, and to order their execution. But where the greater expense of constructing a new drain is involved, then the owner required to construct it is to have the advantage of being heard by some other judge than the persons who are issuing the requisition upon him. These considerations, taken along with the words of clause 16, appear to me to warrant the construction I have put upon it. It only authorises repairs; the remedy of defects in an existing structure does not authorise (what is elsewhere authorised) a new construction. If my construction of section 16 of the Act of 1890 is right, then the conclusion I have reached, that the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, appears to be the only conclusion possible, consistent with the decision in the case of Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Paterson.[1]

LORD MONCREIFF.—I should have been glad to have been able to arrive at the same conclusion as the Sheriff-substitute. The drain in question was admittedly out of order, and the expenses incurred by the Police Commissioners—£80, 10s. 8d.—for which they now sue the appellants, are comparatively small. In holding the defenders not liable, I have been influenced, not only by the character of the works executed, but by the irregular and misleading nature of the procedure followed by the pursuers, which palliates, if it does not wholly excuse, the proprietor's conduct.

Apart altogether from the question of the construction of section 16 of the Glasgow Police Act of 1890, there are serious objections to the pursuers' claim for work executed. In the first place, part of the work, viz., the connection between the drain at the back of the tenements and the main sewer in Garngad Hill, was absolutely unnecessary, because, as the pursuers might and should have ascertained, there was already an exisiting connection, as shewn on the plan, between the letters A and B. The expense of that work could in no view be allowed.

Again, about a fourth of the expense is connected with repairs upon the sink conductors, which were not found to be necessary until December 1894. The pursuers state in cond. 15 that they issued notices to the defenders to remedy the defects in the sink conductors, but it is admitted or proved that those notices, if issued, were not received by the defenders; and if it was necessary to give notices, as the pursuers seem to admit, the pursuers have no claim against the defenders for the expense of that part of the work. If the pursuers had in March 1894 tested these sink conductors and found them defective, and issued their notices stating that fact, and calling upon the defenders in general terms to repair the defects in the drains, the defects in the sink conductors might have been held to be included in the defects in the drains. But in the notices of 4th April 1894 the work ordered to be done was work outside the houses, and did not include the curing of defects in the sink conductors, which, indeed, the sanitary inspector had not at that time discovered.

The remainder of the work charged for was the formation of a new drain several feet further away from the houses than the old drain, and that brings me to the question whether in making that new drain the pursuers exceeded their statutory powers.

When commissioners of police or other public body are empowered by statute to order repairs to be executed or work to be done, and on the proprietor's failing to comply, to do the work themselves at his expense, the measure of their claim for recompense, if they do the work, is that the repairs or works for the cost of which they charge are such as the proprietor was himself bound to execute under the clause of the statute founded on. If they execute works of a different description, they cannot recover, although the proprietor as well as the community gets the benefit; and it will not avail them that the proprietor has stood by and done nothing. They must act strictly within their statutory powers—Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Paterson;[1] Hillhead Commissioners v. Martin & Bruce.[2]

The only statutory warrant upon which the pursuers found is the 16th section of the Glasgow Police Amendment Act of 1890. On reading that section it appears to me that it is confined to repairs upon drains already in existence which may be in a faulty condition owing to defects such as bad material, bad jointing, or the absence of traps, or from having fallen into disrepair, and does not apply to the construction of a new drain. The sanitary inspector is empowered, with a view to discovering whether defects exist, to apply the smoke test or other test to "such drains,"—that is, to the existing drains. The smoke test will disclose defects (if they exist) in the joints, and also whether owing to the absence of proper trapping, foul air will penetrate into the building. Against this requisition there is no appeal. All this, I think, points not to a new system of drainage as the remedy contemplated, but to the repair of an existing structure, although no doubt the repairs may require to be more or less extensive according to the condition of the drain. This becomes the more apparent when the provisions of section 16 of the Act of 1890 are contrasted with sections 332 and 335 of the Glasgow Police Act of 1866, and the procedure as to notices under section 321, and also the right of appeal given in such cases by section 322, is made applicable to the formation of drains by section 337. In short, I think that section 16 of the Act of 1890 contemplates repairs which, in the interests of public health, admit of being made in an emergency in a comparatively short time, and not the formation of a new system of drainage which, as here, might require a considerable time for its proper execution.

But when, after applying the smoke test in March 1894, in virtue of powers under the 16th section, the sanitary inspector found that repairs were needed, the pursuers did not content themselves with calling upon the proprietor to remedy the defects in the existing drain and connections. They issued the notices, dated 4th April 1894, which are printed in the appendix. Now, these notices were irregular and misleading in several respects. In the first place, they called upon the proprietor not to repair the existing drain and connections, but to "lay down a new drainage system." That was the keynote of the notices. Again, this order to construct a new drainage system proceeded upon two inexcusable mistakes in point of fact. First the proprietor was told in the case of each tenement to carry a new drain through the close under the house and connect it with a public sewer in front of the house, whereas at that time no such sewer had been formed. Secondly, the proprietor was ordered to disconnect his drain from the Monkland Canal, whereas it did not drain into it, but into the main sewer in Garngad Hill to the west of the defenders' properties. This was what the proprietor was called upon to do, and I do not find that the pursuers ever departed from those notices. It is stated in condescendence 8 that on 20th September 1894 the sanitary inspector informed the defenders "that he insisted upon their executing the work specified in said notices dated 4th April 1894"; and in condescendence 12 it is stated that after fresh notices of 25th September had been given, the sanitary inspector "issued estimates for the execution of the work remedying or removing the said nuisance as specified in the notices served by the sanitary inspector on the defenders on 4th April 1894." This shews that although the notices of 25th September bear to be issued under section 16 of the Act of 1890, and do not contain particulars of the work to be done, they were not given in order to remedy the mistakes in the earlier notices; the pursuers did not depart from their original demand for a new system of drainage.

No. 174.

June 26, 1896. Glasgow Police Commissioners v. M'Omish & Arthur.

The result of all this confusion and the nature of the demand made upon the proprietor in the notices was to enable him to say that the pursuers who professed to be acting under section 16 of the Act of 1890, under which there is no appeal, would be satisfied with nothing less than the execution of the works specified in the notices of 4th April 1894.

In holding that the pursuers are not in this case entitled to recover, I do not think that we shall throw any difficulties in the way of the sanitary authorities in Glasgow in the execution of their duties. If they had made the necessary investigation as to the lie and outfall of the drain, and followed the course prescribed by the statutes, the difficulty would not have arisen. While I think that the proprietor should have more actively endeavoured to arrange as to the repairs which were needed, I do not think that, looking to the demands of the pursuers and the case of Paterson,[1] his failure to do anything or to suggest an alternative scheme to that proposed by the pursuers forms a sufficient ground for subjecting him in liability.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor, which was dated 26th June and signed 11th July:—"Find that the pursuers, having reason to believe that the drains connected with the defenders' property were defective, by notice dated 25th September 1894, issued by virtue and in terms of section 16 of the Glasgow Police (Amendment) Act, 1890, gave notice of this to the defenders, requiring and ordering them 'to carry out all necessary operations for removing defects of structure, or to do such acts as may be requisite to prevent risk to health': Find that the defenders did nothing to the drains of their property in response to this order, and that the pursuers proceeded to put the drains in question into what they considered a safe and proper condition: Find, however, that the pursuers did not proceed to remedy or remove defects of structure in the then existing drains, but, disregarding the existing structure altogether, laid down an entirely new drain in a different site and with a different outflow: Find that the pursuers' proceedings were not authorised by said section 16 of the Glasgow Police (Amendment) Act, 1890: Therefore recall the interlocutor appealed against; sustain the appeal; assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action," &c.

tioner's claim against the company, and the company and its liquidator in their answers did not admit the claim. If established the petitioner's claim amounted to about four-fifths of the whole debts of the company. The respondents averred that (apart from uncalled capital) the assets would on realisation be sufficient to meet the entire claims against the company, including that of the petitioner. The petitioner denied this.

The Court granted a supervision order, but refused to appoint an additional liquidator.

2D DIVISION.

ON 23d May 1896, at an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders of Adam, Sons, & Company, Limited, No. 129 Constitution Street, Leith, it was resolved that that company should be wound up voluntarily, and that Thomas Watson Sime, C.A., Edinburgh, should be appointed liquidator.

The nominal capital was £25,000; and the issued capital £17,000, of which £4320 was paid up.

On 9th June Arthur Penryhn Stanley Macquisten, C.A., Glasgow, presented a petition praying the Court to order the winding-up to be continued, but subject to the supervision of the Court, and to appoint an additional liquidator.

The petitioner further stated that he was a creditor of the company to the extent of £4500, as holder for value of two promissory-notes for £2000, and £2500 respectively, which both became due on 6th June 1896, and had been duly presented for payment, but had not been paid. "It is believed that the petitioner is the largest ordinary trade creditor of the said company, and that several questions may arise in the said liquidation which make it expedient that the liquidation should proceed under the supervision of the Court. . . . There are only seven shareholders of said company, and it is believed that there will be sufficient surplus assets to meet the debts of all the creditors except the petitioner. These shareholders intend, it is believed, to dispute the petitioner's claim, and the liquidator who has been appointed is a nominee of said shareholders. The heritable property of the company has been heavily mortgaged, its entire capital having been used for the purpose of providing the margin between the mortgages and cost price. The stores are too lightly built for any other trade than the wool trade, and if the mortgagees are allowed to realise for their own interests alone, very serious loss will ensue to the petitioner. It is therefore expedient that an additional liquidator should be appointed."

The company and its liquidator lodged answers.

The respondents stated that shareholders of the company representing £3680 uncalled capital were quite able to meet any calls on their shares. "The liquidator has not had an opportunity of dealing with any claim of the petitioner's upon the said promissory-notes, and has formed no opinion in regard thereto. In the meantime he is informed that the directors of the company do not admit that the petitioner is a creditor of the respondent company, or that the promissory-notes in question are ordinary trade bills. . . . The respondent company have very few debts, and these are of small amounts, and it is not expected that any questions will arise in the liquidation in regard to them, or to the realisation of the company's assets. . . . The respondent company's principal assets are the warehouses in . . . Leith, which have been valued since the liquidation . . . at £12,200. . . . These buildings are mortgaged to the extent of £7000. If the amount of the valuation is realised there will thus be a surplus from this item alone of £5200. The other assets of the respondent company, apart from unpaid capital, will amount to about £1800; while the liabilities, apart from the said promissory-notes (should the respondent company be liable therefor), will amount to about £1100. The warehouses belonging to the respondent company are suitable for other purposes than storing wool, and have been frequently used for storing grain and other merchandise. It is expected they will be readily disposed of. The interest on the bonds has been paid up to Whitsunday last."

No. 175. June 27, 1896. Macquisten v. Adam, Sons, & Co., Limited, and Liquidator.

"The shareholders have thus the real interest in the liquidation, and there are are no questions of competing diligence. The question of the respondent company's liability for the promissory-notes will be dealt with by the liquidator, and thereafter be subject to judicial determination. The judgment of the Court can be obtained in the voluntary liquidation, and a supervision order is, the respondents submit, quite unnecessary for that or any other purpose in the liquidation. The respondents further submit that the appointment of an additional liquidator is altogether uncalled for in this case, and would add unnecessarily to the expense of the liquidation. In the whole circumstances, the petition ought to be dismissed, with expenses." *

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am quite unable to see what possible injury can happen to anyone from the liquidation being placed under the supervision of the Court. If all goes well in the liquidation there will be no additional expense. If anything occurs requiring the Court to intervene the expense will probably be less under a supervision order than otherwise. Certainly it will not be more. Looking to the fact that a very large proportion of the claims against this company are at the instance of a creditor who desires such an order, I do not think we can refuse to grant the motion.

On the other hand, the appointment of an additional liquidator is a procedure which ought not to be taken except upon some special ground. Here there is a liquidator to whom no objection is stated, either personally or to his qualifications, and as regards any supposed possible bias on his part the petitioner will be protected by the liquidation being put under the supervision of the Court. I am therefore of opinion that there are no grounds here for imposing upon this company the expense involved in the appointment of an additional liquidator.

We shall grant the supervision order, but refuse the motion for an additional liquidator.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. This can scarcely be called a shareholders' liquidation. Taking a reasonable view of the position of this company as represented by the respondents, there is at least room to doubt whether there will be more than sufficient to meet debts, assuming, as we must assume at this stage, that the petitioner's claim is valid. Seeing that four-fifths of the debts of the company are said to be due to this petitioner, I think that he is entitled to have effect given to his views. There will be this advantage in having this liquidation continued under the supervision of the Court, that any disputes which may arise as to the petitioner's claim will be settled in a speedy and inexpensive manner, which would not be available if the liquidation were voluntary.

I think there is no cause for interfering with the liquidator who has been appointed, at all events in the meantime. If such cause arises—I do not suppose it will—the petitioner, under the supervision order, will have the means of readily bringing it before the Court.

It appears to me, therefore, that we should grant the supervision order craved, and remit to a Lord Ordinary, that we should refuse the application for an additional liquidator, and direct the expenses of this petition to be expenses in the liquidation.

LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Order the voluntary winding-up of Adam, Sons, & Company, Limited, resolved on by the extraordinary resolution of 23d May 1896, to be continued, but subject to the supervision of the Court, in terms of the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890: Further, direct all subsequent proceedings in the winding-up to be taken before Lord Stormonth-Darling; remit to him accordingly: Find both parties entitled to expenses, and direct the same to be expenses in the liquidation: Remit to the Auditor to tax the same, and to report to the said Lord Ordinary: Quoad ultra refuse the petition, and decern."

Succession—Faculties and Powers—Power to select articles of furniture—Testamentary exercise of power.—A testator directed his trustees to deliver to M., his widow, "such articles of jewellery, linen, silver-plate, books, and other household furniture belonging to me as she may choose to select for her own absolute use," and to allow her and his daughter and the longest liver of them the liferent use of his mansion-house of Easter Livelands, "and also such articles of household furniture, plate, . . . and plenishing of every description which shall be found at the time of my death remaining after the said M. shall have made her selection as aforesaid, or the whole in case of no such selection being made."

After the testator's death his widow and daughter lived together at Easter Livelands for a number of years, in joint possession of his plate, jewellery, and furniture. The widow did not during her life exercise the power of selection given her by the testator, but she left a settlement whereby she bequeathed to different legatees certain of the articles to which the power applied.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) (1) upon the construction of the husband's settlement, that the power of selection given to the widow was a power to be exercised within a reasonable time after the testator's death; and (2) that the power had not been exercised within due time, and had lapsed.

July 2, 1896. Macdonald's Trustees v. Bain's Trustees.

1st Division. Ld. Kyllachy.

Edwin Sandys Bain, of Easter Livelands, Stirlingshire, Sergeant-at-law, died on 30th December 1874, survived by a widow and a daughter.

Mr Bain left a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby he disponed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees for certain purposes, and, inter alia,—"(Second) That my trustees shall hand over and deliver, free of charge, to the said Mary Ann Horsman or Bain [his widow] such articles of jewellery, linen, silver-plate, books, and other household furniture belonging to me, as she may choose to select for her own absolute use, and shall allow her and the said Charlotte Elizabeth Sandys Bain [his daughter], and the longest liver of them, the free and uninterrupted liferent right and use of my mansion-house of Easter Livelands . . . and also such articles of household furniture, plate . . . and plenishing of every description which shall be found at the time of my death remaining after the said Mary Ann Horsman or Bain shall have made her selection as aforesaid, or the whole in case of no such selection being made . . . and that during all the days and years of the lives of the said Mary Ann Horsman or Bain and Charlotte Elizabeth Sandys Bain and the survivor of them." After various provisions, which did not refer to his furniture, plate, books, or jewellery, the testator lastly directed his trustees to convey the residue of his estate to his daughter Charlotte, whom failing, his widow.

After the death of her husband Mrs Bain continued to occupy Easter Livelands with her daughter Charlotte. In 1875 she married Mr Macdonald, who died very shortly afterwards. In 1876 Miss Bain married Major William Lorraine Geddes, who died in 1881, and she then returned to live with her mother. On 18th October 1882 Mrs Macdonald and Mrs Geddes executed a discharge in favour of Mr Bain's trustees containing a formal acknowledgment of delivery of the furniture, &c., in the mansion-house at Easter Livelands in the following terms:—"And further considering that we have been allowed the use of the mansion-house of Easter Livelands . . . and of the whole articles of jewellery, linen, silver-plate, books, and other household furniture which belonged to the said Edwin Sandys Bain deceased, from which I, the said Mary Ann Macdonald, have hitherto refrained from making any selection, and that the said trustees have now delivered to us the said articles of jewellery, linen, silver-plate, books, and other household furniture."

Mrs Macdonald died in December 1893, without having exercised the power of selection given to her by her husband by any inter vivos act. She left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated in 1892, whereby she bequeathed to different persons certain of the articles to which the power of selection applied.

In 1895 the trustees under Mrs Macdonald's settlement brought this action against Mrs Geddes and another, as trustees and beneficiaries under the settlement of Sergeant Bain. The pursuers concluded, inter alia, for declarator (1) that certain specified articles, which were dealt with by Mrs Macdonald's settlement, were her own property; and (2) that, in terms of the power of selection conferred upon her by her husband's settlement, Mrs Macdonald, by her trust-disposition and settlement, had made a valid and effectual selection of other articles which were specified.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The power of selection conferred upon Mrs Macdonald by Mr Serjeant Bain's settlement not having been validly exercised by her, and the articles mentioned in the second conclusion of the summons not having been the property of Mrs Macdonald at the time of her death, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor therefrom and from the remaining conclusions of the summons.

On 1st February 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the power of selection conferred upon Mrs Macdonald by her husband's settlement was not validly exercised by the disposition contained in her trust-disposition and settlement in favour of the pursuers: Quoad ultra, in respect that the parties desire an opportunity of adjusting the question of fact involved in the cause, continues the cause," &c.*

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—No limit of time was imposed by Serjeant Bain, either expressly or impliedly, upon his widow in regard to her power of selection. She could exercise it, therefore, at any time during her life, or by will.[1] The words "absolute use" did not mean that the widow was to use the selected articles per-

* "OPINION.— . . . The questions to be now decided are, I think, two (1) whether the power of selection conferred upon the widow could be exercised by will, and by simply disposing by will of particular articles; (2) whether the power of selection extended to pictures,—that is to say, to portraits and other pictures in oil belonging to Sergeant Bain.† There is a third question, but it involves proof, and cannot be now decided, viz., the question how far the articles disposed of by Mrs Macdonald's settlement were (apart altogether from her husband's settlement) her own separate property.

"As to the power of selection, that power is conferred by a direction to Sergeant Bain's trustees to hand over and deliver to his widow free of charge 'such articles of jewellery, linen, silver-plate, books, and other household furniture belonging to me as she may choose to select for her own absolute use.' And that direction was followed by a further direction by which the truster conferred upon his widow and daughter jointly a liferent of, inter alia, 'such articles of household furniture, plate, and pictures as should be left after the testator's widow made her selection, or the whole in case of no such selection being made.'

"At Sergeant Bain's death what happened was this,—the widow made no selection either then or during her survivance, the whole articles remaining all along in possession of herself and her daughter, but on her death it appeared, as I have already explained, that she had bequeathed by will various of the articles in question to different relatives.

"Now, I am not prepared to say that a power of this kind requires to be exercised expressly, or that the absence from the will of a reference to the power is material one way or the other. But the difficulty which the pursuers have to meet is, I think, twofold. In the first place, the power of selection being given for the widow's 'use,' albeit her 'absolute use,' is scarcely suggestive of a selection to take effect only at her death, and thus to operate not in favour of the widow, but in favour of third parties. In the second place, the truster directs that any articles not selected should fall under the joint liferent, and the conclusion is obvious that if the selection by the widow might be postponed until her death, and be made by will, any joint liferent of the unselected articles was an impossibility. It appears to me therefore that the difficulties in the pursuers' way are insuperable, and that I must find in terms of the defenders' contention that the power of selection conferred on Mrs Macdonald was not validly exercised. . . ."

sonally, but only that they should be her absolute property.[1] There was no necessity laid upon her to make her selection until an interest conflicting with her own arose in a third party. The daughter's interest, either as liferentrix or residuary legatee, was not of that character. The widow never renounced her power to select, and the terms of the joint discharge granted by her and her daughter eight years after the testator's death were an implied admission by the daughter that the power still subsisted at that time.

Argued for the defenders;—The trustees were directed to hold the furniture, with the sole exception of such articles as the widow might select, for the liferent use of the daughter and widow and the survivor. The liferent use thus given to the widow was alternative to the absolute right which she could acquire by selection, and if the widow failed to make her selection within a reasonable time, and the trust began to be administered on the footing that there was a joint liferent of the furniture in the widow and daughter, it was then too late for the widow to exercise the power conferred upon her. Further, the right of selection was for her "absolute use," which shewed that, according to the testator's intention, the power was to be exercised by her for her own enjoyment and use. Such a power could not be exercised by will. The discharge proved that no selection had then been made, but did not bar the daughter from objecting to any selection being made thereafter.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—Sergeant Bain died in 1874, leaving a widow and daughter. He left a settlement by which he conveyed his whole estate, including certain corporeal moveables, to trustees for certain purposes, and the present question arises under the second purpose of the trust-settlement—(His Lordship then quoted the provisions of the second purpose of the settlement).

What happened upon Sergeant Bain's death was this—Mrs Bain, afterwards Mrs Macdonald, and her daughter Mrs Geddes, had in any view a right to a liferent of these articles, and the trustees allowed them to have the use and possession of them up to the date of Mrs Macdonald's death.

Mrs Macdonald during her life never made any selection, but by her trust-disposition and settlement and codicil, dated in 1892, she directed her trustees to deliver certain of these articles to the parties therein named, and the question is, whether, having regard to the terms of Sergeant Bain's settlement, this was a valid exercise of her power of selection.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that it was not, and for the same reasons. It appears to me that the intention of the truster was that the selection should be made within a reasonable time after his death, at anyrate during his widow's life.

It will be observed that he directs his trustees to hand over to Mrs Macdonald herself (and not to any assignees or legatees) such articles as she might select for her own absolute use, which appears to me to imply a selection to be made during her life.

He then directs his trustees to allow her and her daughter Mrs Geddes a joint liferent, and a liferent to the survivor of the mansion-house of Livelands, and of such articles of household furniture, plate, &c., as should remain after Mrs Macdonald had made her selection, or the whole in the event of no selection being made. It appears to me that if no selection was made by Mrs Macdonald during her life a joint liferent, which the truster thus contemplated and directed, became impossible.

In my view, accordingly, no selection having been made by Mrs Macdonald during her life, the trustees, in terms of the settlement, are bound to allow Mrs Geddes, as the survivor, a liferent of the whole of the said articles, and for that purpose to hand them over to her.

I therefore think that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Adam.

On the main question which his Lordship has discussed, I think it right to say that my opinion is rested on the special terms of Sergeant Bain's will. I think the power of selection given to his widow could not be exercised by will, because the selection is intended to be exercised before the estate is distributed, it being provided that after Mrs Bain has made her selection the testator's remaining estate is to be shared in liferent between that lady and her daughter. In the general case where an unqualified power of selection or appropriation is given to a liferenter, I should assume in construing it that it depended for its exercise upon the same principles as any power of disposal given to a third party, and that it might be exercised at any time during the life of the donee of the power. But in construing voluntary deeds general rules are liable to be controlled by the intention of the granters as expressed in the deeds. In this case I think Sergeant Bain has sufficiently manifested his intention that the power of selection conferred upon his widow should only be exercised within such reasonable time as is allowed for putting a testator's affairs in order, and that Mrs Bain's will is therefore not a valid exercise of the power.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree that the decision of this case does not depend upon any question as to the manner in which a power may be exercised, but upon the character of the right which the testator has bequeathed to his widow.

I am of opinion with your Lordships on the construction of the disposition that the testator gives to his widow absolutely such articles as she may select, with a gift over, in the event of her not exercising the right of selection, to her and her daughter in joint liferent and to the survivor in liferent.

Now, I think the gift over took effect in consequence of the failure of Mrs Macdonald to exercise her right, and that it is too late now to disturb arrangements which we must assume to have been made advisedly during her lifetime. Her will is ineffectual to deprive the conditional legatees of the gifts which the testator has made to them, because the condition was purified when the articles in question were delivered to the joint liferenters, in consequence of her having refrained from claiming them for her own absolute use.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners v. Granite City Steamship Co. Limited.

THE ABERDEEN HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Ure—Salvesen.

THE GRANITE CITY STEAMSHIP COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—C. J. Guthrie—Craigie.

Statute—Construction—Saving clause in repealing Act—Aberdeen Harbour Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. lxxxviii.), Schedule A—Aberdeen Harbour Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. cxxxvi.), sec. 10.—Under Schedule A of the Aberdeen Harbour Act, 1879, the Harbour Commissioners were empowered to levy certain rates per registered ton upon each vessel in class third entering the harbour. The schedule further bore,—"For any vessel included in class third, which shall have made ten voyages in any one year from January to December inclusive, no rates shall be charged on any additional voyages of the description specified under class third made by it within such year."

In 1895 a new Act was passed whereby the prior Act of 1879 was repealed from 1st October 1895, and it was declared that the new Act should come into operation on that date. By section 75 the Commissioners were empowered, from and after the commencement of the Act, to levy certain rates.

Section 10 of the Act of 1895 provided,—"Notwithstanding the repeal of the recited Acts . . . and except only as is by this Act otherwise expressly provided, everything before the commencement of this Act done or suffered under or confirmed by the recited Acts . . . shall be as valid as if such Acts . . . were not repealed, and the repeal thereof and this Act respectively shall accordingly be subject and without prejudice to everything so done or suffered or confirmed, and to all rights, liabilities, debts, claims, and demands, both present and future, which, if the recited Acts . . . were not repealed and this Act were not passed, would be incident to or consequent on any and everything so done, suffered, or confirmed. . . ."

In an action for rates against the owners of a vessel in class 3, which had made ten voyages prior to 1st October 1895, and several voyages between that date and the end of the year, the defenders denied liability for rates for the voyages between 1st October and the end of the year on the ground that the Act of 1879 conferred a right of exemption from such rates, which was saved by sec. 10 of the Act of 1895. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Low) that no right of exemption had been conferred by the Act of 1879, but that the non-liability for further rates merely arose from the rating powers of the Commissioners being restricted to ten voyages, and that the rating powers of the Commissioners under the new Act being unrestricted, the vessel was liable for rates for all voyages after 1st October 1895.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Low.

THIS was an action at the instance of the Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners, incorporated under the Aberdeen Harbour Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. cxxxvi.), against the Granite City Steamship Company, Limited, for payment of £78, 4s. 9d.

The pursuers averred that the s.s. "Linn o' Dee,"—a vessel trading between Aberdeen and Hamburg, of which the defenders were owners,—had made eleven voyages to and from Aberdeen between 1st October 1895, when the Aberdeen Harbour Act, 1895,* came into

The date of the commencement of the Act was fixed by section 2 as the 1st of October 1895, and from and after that date the previous Acts of 1868 and 1879 were repealed. Under Schedule A the rates leviable for vessels operation, and 18th February 1896, and that the sum sued for was the amount of rates and dues owing to the Harbour Commissioners under that Act.

The defenders admitted that the "Linn o' Dee" had made the voyages stated, and that they were due the pursuers the sum of £33, 3s. 6d., but denied liability for the balance, which consisted of rates for the "Linn o' Dee" for voyages between 1st October and 31st December 1895.

The defenders founded upon the provisions of Schedule A of the Aberdeen Harbour Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. lxxxviii.),* and section 10 of the Act of 1895,† and averred that the "Linn o' Dee" had made ten voyages to and from Aberdeen between 1st January 1895 and 28th May 1895, and that they had paid for these voyages the rates due under schedule A of the Act of 1879.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The defenders, having paid harbour rates to the pursuers for ten voyages performed by their said vessel in 1895, acquired by virtue of the Harbour Act of 1879 a vested in class third, to which the "Linn o' Dee" belonged, are,—"For each of the first eight voyages in any year per register ton 6d., for each subsequent voyage in such year per register ton 3d." The schedule also provides that "in reckoning the number of voyages made within any year, the year shall be deemed to run from the 1st day of October to the 30th day of September. . . ."

* Vessels falling under class third of Schedule A of the Aberdeen Harbour Act, 1879 (to which class the "Linn o' Dee" belonged), were rated at 9d. per registered ton.

The Schedule also provided as follows:—"For any vessel included in class third, which shall have made ten voyages in any one year from January to December inclusive, no rates shall be charged on any additional voyages of the description specified under class third made by it within such year; and if any vessel included under class third, being a regular trader to the harbour, shall be lost or sold during any such year, any vessel substituted in the trade for such lost or sold vessel shall, in computing the number of voyages in that year, be deemed to be the vessel for which it is so substituted . . . "

† Section 10 of the Aberdeen Harbour Act of 1895 provides,—"Notwithstanding the repeal of the recited Acts and Order, and except only as is by this Act otherwise expressly provided, everything before the commencement of this Act done or suffered under or confirmed by the recited Acts and Order, shall be as valid as if such Acts and Order were not repealed, and the repeal thereof and this Act respectively shall accordingly be subject and without prejudice to everything so done or suffered or confirmed, and to all rights, liabilities, debts, claims, and demands, both present and future, which, if the recited Acts and Order were not repealed and this Act were not passed, would be incident to or consequent on any and everything so done, suffered, or confirmed; and with respect to all rights, liabilities, debts, claims, and demands which affect or might affect the existing Commissioners, the Commissioners shall to all intents and purposes represent the existing Commissioners, and may enforce and shall be liable in respect of such rights, liabilities, debts, claims, and demands in the same manner and to the same extent as the existing Commissioners could have enforced or have been liable to in respect of such rights, liabilities, debts, claims, and demands."

Section 7 of said Act enacts, inter alia, that "all contracts or agreements entered into or adopted by the existing Commissioners and any person, and all obligations and writings granted by the existing Commissioners to any person, should remain valid and effectual as if the Act had not been passed."

right of immunity from payment of all further rates for that year, except for flags and signals, for all subsequent voyages in that year.

On 18th June 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the defenders admit being due the pursuers the sum of £33, 3s. 6d., and have already consigned the sum in bank: Therefore decerns against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of the foresaid sum of £33, 3s. 6d., with bank interest thereon since the date of consignation: And as regards the remaining portion of the sum of £78, 4s. 9d. sued for, being £45, 1s. 3d., assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—Upon 1st October 1895 the old Act ceased to be operative and a new system of rates came into force. After that date the Commissioners were bound to levy the rates expressly imposed by the new Act, and just as they would have had no right to charge the defenders rates under the old schedule had these been higher than under the new, so the defenders could not plead a privilege which the repealed schedule gave them. The 10th section of the Act of 1895 could not be construed as creating an immunity from the rates which the Act expressly imposed. The intention of that clause was to perpetuate the rights and obligations of the existing trust in the person of the new body corporate, and it applied to rights of a contractual nature acquired during the subsistence of the old Act. The defenders, however, had acquired no such right. They had merely paid rates for the voyages they had made. It would have been different if they had paid a composition for the whole year

* "OPINION.— . . . Whether, notwithstanding the commencement of the Act of 1895 on the 1st of October, the 'Linn o' Dee' was entitled to the immunity from rates given by the Act of 1879, depends upon the scope of the 10th section of the former Act. That section is in the following terms:—'Notwithstanding the repeal of the recited Acts and Order, and except only as is by this Act expressly provided, everything before the commencement of this Act done or suffered under or confirmed by the recited Acts and Order shall be as valid as if such Acts and Order were not repealed, and the repeal thereof and this Act respectively shall accordingly be subject and without prejudice to everything so done or suffered or confirmed, and to all rights, liabilities, debts, claims, and demands, both present and future, which, if the recited Acts and Order were not repealed and this Act were not passed, would be incident to or consequent on any and everything so done, suffered, and confirmed.'

"That is a saving clause expressed in very ample terms, and in my opinion is sufficient to preserve to the 'Linn o' Dee' the immunity from rates for the remainder of the year 1895 which she had earned at the passing of the Act.

"In the first place, it is not expressly provided in the Act that an immunity from rates actually earned under the previous Act shall be forfeited. In the second place, the payment by the 'Linn o' Dee' of the rates specified in the Act of 1879 for the ten voyages after the 1st of January was a thing done under that Act which gave the 'Linn o' Dee' the right, as a consequent on that payment, to continue to trade free of rates until the end of the year. That is, I think, one of the rights saved by the 10th section.

"I am accordingly of opinion that the 'Linn o' Dee' was not liable in payment of rates for voyages made between the 1st of October 1895 and the end of that year, and that she did not come under the operation of the Act of 1895 until the commencement of the year 1896."

No. 177.

July 2, 1896. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners v. Granite City Steamship Co., Limited.

to 31st December 1895. If the defenders' contention were upheld, much complexity would be introduced into the harbour accounts, for the case of each vessel would require separate treatment, as even those which had not made ten voyages prior to 1st October 1895 would have been in process of earning the immunity.

Argued for the defenders;—The defenders had paid the higher rates imposed by the old Act, and had acquired a right to exemption before the new Act came into operation. They had therefore "done or suffered" something in the sense of section 10 of the new Act, and were entitled to the exemption from rates conferred by that clause. Section 10 could not be read as referring merely to rights of a contractual nature, for these were safeguarded by section 7. The immunity, having been already acquired when the new Act came into operation, could not be affected by the provisions of that Act, unless they were to be read as having a retrospective effect. But such a construction of the statute would be contrary to the usual rule.[1] Section 10 practically incorporated section 38 of the Interpretation Act, 1889.[2] The defenders' right to immunity from rates in the remainder of the year 1895 was a right or privilege acquired under a repealed enactment in the sense of section 38.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In my opinion the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary cannot be supported. His Lordship has held that there was a right vested in this trader to enter the Aberdeen Harbour without payment of any rates until the 1st January of the next year. Now, the series of statutes stands in this position. Under the Act of 1879 the Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners have right to levy the rates set out in the schedule, and from the schedule it appears that after a vessel has made ten voyages in any one year from January to December no rate could be asked for any additional voyage. Now, that seems to me to be in substance, as well as in form, merely a limitation of the powers of the Commissioners to exact rates from vessels entering the harbour. They are allowed to do it ten times; they are not allowed to do it after ten voyages have been made. Well, now, this Act is repealed by the Act of 1895. A new set of rates comes into force; the old are swept away. The rating power of the Commissioners under the old Act ceases; new rating powers are to come into operation, and they come into operation from October of 1895. The result is that the Commissioners are authorised to levy their own rates, and not the rates under the Act of 1879. But the question is, whether the trader now in Court is entitled to resist a demand for payment of the rates under the Act of 1895 on the ground that he had already made ten voyages, and by consequence that the old Commissioners were not entitled to ask from him more rates than he had already paid. It seems to me that there was no contract right—no vested right—in this trader at all, and, accordingly, the 10th section has really no application. All that he could say was, "I am not liable to pay any rates under the Act of 1879, inasmuch as I have already paid for ten voyages." But then the Commissioners who are now in Court are not
